

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COX, &co. v. ANDERSON'S ADM'R.

(Filed December 8, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Grant E. Lilly for appellants.

W. B. Smith and J. A. Sullivan for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Judge DuRelle delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The unusually able and earnest petition for rehearing filed for appellant in this case merits, and has had, our careful attention.

It is admitted in the argument in the petition that the language employed in the Gibbs will bestowed upon the widow a fee-simple title to all the testator's estate. But, it is said, this is true only because of section 2342, Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows: "Unless a different purpose appears by express words or necessary inference, every estate in land created by deed or will, without words of inheritance, shall be deemed a fee simple, or such other estate as the grantor or testator had power to dispose of."

Appellant then argues that as the widow took a fee-simple title to the testator's property, it was under a statute containing a proviso, which must be first satisfied; that in this case it does appear by necessary inference and express words that the widow should not take the fee-simple title to the testator's lands.

The section quoted, as well as section 2346, Kentucky Statutes, viz., "a contingent remainder shall, in no case, fail for want of a particular estate to support it," are both found in the chapter on "Lands," and necessarily are applicable alone to that subject. But as part of testator's estate devised was land, it is proper to consider these sections with respect at least to such portion.

We adopt, from among the excellent and approved maxims cited by appellant, the one that "in the construction of devises the intention of the testator is the pole star by which the courts steer," with the qualification that such intention must be gathered from the instrument alone; must be reasonably certain, and must not be contrary to law. As observed by Mr. Justice Miller, it is probably true that no two wills were ever written exactly alike in every particular and under precisely the same circumstances. Yet rules for the construction of language substantially similar have necessarily been evolved. Among them is the one that the law favors that construction of doubtful terms which creates a vested rather than an uncertain estate. With these in mind, we observe that it was the natural, as it was the evident, purpose of the testator in this case to provide, not incidentally or provisionally, but to the fullest extent for his widow. The whole will shows that this was not only the testator's first, but his controlling thought. He gave her the whole of his estate. No intention was manifested to restrict her in its use, or even abuse. She might have consumed the whole of it without accountability. She could have sold it and passed a perfect title. It was hers. There does not appear the slightest indication of a purpose to deny her the fullest use and enjoyment of it, of which it was capable, without let or hindrance from any source. These are the attributes of a fee-simple title (in the case of real estate) under the law of this Commonwealth. So much of the intention of the testator is clear, unambiguous, unmistakable.

The clause under which the appellant claims is the following: "When she, Sally Ann Gibbs, is done with it, I give to Mt. Zion Church as an endowment $1,000, the proceeds of which are to go towards paying the expenses of the church."

It is to be observed that testator describes his estate as consisting of "cash, notes and lands, bank stock and other stock, live stock, growing crops and household and kitchen furniture." None of this property was devised or bequeathed to the widow for her life only. She took it all alike. None of it was given subject specifically to the payment of the $1,000, nor is it stated from what particular property the $1,000 was to be raised, nor is it stated clearly when the $1,000 was to be paid. "When she was done with it," might mean at her death, or before. It might have reference to testator's cash notes, or his bank stock, other stock, live stock or growing crops. He evidently wanted the church eventually to get $1,000. It is equally clear that he did not intend though that his wife's interest, already carved out in his estate, should be diminished to provide the sum. He intended something by the use of the words quoted. He meant, we think clearly enough, that if anything was left by his wife, at her death, to dispose of it for her according to his notion to the extent of $1,000, leaving her to dispose of the remainder according to her notion. In other words, he attempted to control the statute of distribution, or the law giving the absolute owner of property, of testamentary capacity, the right to dispose of it by will. Of the two things attempted, one he could do, viz., vest his widow with a complete and fee-simple title to the estate; the other, to affect the law governing her power of disposing of what remained at her death, he could not do.

The wishes of the dead respecting their property, as expressed by their wills should be respected, when legal, but the interest of the living should not be disregarded. If the $1,000 mentioned was imposed as a remainder on any part of the testator's estate, it was upon all alike. It would have prevented the sale, maybe the full and necessary enjoyment by the widow of what he had given to her. This would have been to make a clause, at best, of doubtful meaning, and of secondary importance in the testator's desire, to override another, the testator's dominant purpose and plain attempt.

It is said in Schouler, Wills, section 476: "In construing a will the predominant idea of the testator's mind, if apparent, is heeded, as against all doubtful and conflicting provisions which might of themselves defeat it. The general intent and particular intent being inconsistent, the latter must be sacrificed to the former."

Ibid, section 477: "The courts have discarded words as surplusage which were senseless as they stood expressed in the instrument. They have rejected or modified expressions in the will which were inconsistent with the main intention, or which indicated an intention which the law would not permit to take effect."

This will does not create a precatory trust, and does not contain a devise over. The authorities cited on these points need not, therefore, be discussed. The argument that the will creates a precatory trust is not based upon anything said in the will, but is built upon the expression in the original opinion that the testator had merely "expressed a desire that when his wife was done with it, that is, when she desired to part with that sum, that she give to this congregation $1,00 out of the amount he gave her." This illustration seems to have misled counsel, and might, if left alone, confuse others. It is consequently changed in form so as to express the thought thus: "The testator's effort was to give to this congregation $1,000 of his wife's property, if she had that much when she died."

The petition is overruled.

SHANNON'S ADM'R v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed December 4, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Contributory negligence of yardmaster—S. was night yardmaster in the employ of appellee in its yards at Paris, and while engaged in coupling cars received injuries resulting in his death, to recover damages for which this action was instituted. The lower court gave an instruction equivalent to a peremptory instruction to find for appellee. The question involved on this appeal is whether the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellee. The proof showed that the engine was pushing some freight cars toward a caboose standing on the track for the purpose of coupling. Appellant stepped in front of the engine, moving along with the train with his face or side to the train, loosening a wedge in the coupler, when his foot caught in the frog, causing him to fall, when the car ran over and mashed his leg, resulting in his death. S. knew the danger of getting before a moving train. Held—That S. was guilty of such contributory negligence as to preclude a recovery of damages. The law is well settled that the servant can not recover if his injury was proximately due to his own fault in taking unnecessary risks, as by needlessly going or remaining in a dangerous place, needlessly coupling cars in motion, or needlessly trying to step on a moving railroad train.

J. M. Benton and Beckner & Jouett for appellant.

Breckinridge & Shelby and Edward W. Hines for appellee.

Appeal from Clark Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Edward Shannon, appellant's intestate, was night yardmaster in the service of appellee in its yards at Paris, Ky. While engaged with a crew of men in switching a train at night he was run over and killed, and this action was filed to recover for the loss of his life. The jury to whom the case was submitted found a verdict for the defendant. The only question that we deem it necessary to determine on the appeal is whether the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellee.

The proof introduced by the plaintiff tended to show these facts: They had thrown the caboose of the train in on the main track, and had then pulled the train southward and thrown some cars in on another track. They were then proceeding to back the engine, which had five or six cars attached to it, northward to couple onto the caboose, which was about two-car lengths north of the frog. The switchman threw the switch and was then ordered by Shannon, who was standing near by, to go down to the caboose and bring him a link. The train was backing on down, moving slowly, and the switchman started to get the link. Just before he reached the caboose he heard Shannon holloa behind him, and went back immediately and found that he had been run over, his leg being so crushed that he died soon afterwards. There was a janny coupler on the rear car of the backing train, and as the switchman walked on down he heard a knocking on this coupler, just before he heard Shannon holloa. The train was in continuous motion from the time it started back, after the switchman threw the switch, until Shannon holloaed, when it was stopped; and he was found lying on the opposite side of the track from that on which he was standing when he ordered the switchman to go for the link. There is a wedge in the janny coupler to keep the pin from falling back and this sometimes gets tight, and must be knocked loose. The engineer and another witness saw Shannon's light on the side of the train as he started back, but the light went out of sight shortly before he holloaed. When they got to Shannon he said that he hung his foot in the frog. There was proof that the frog was out of order, and there were marks on one of his shoes, from which it might be inferred that he had hung his foot in the frog and thus been caught and run over by the train. No one connected with the train knew where he was until he was heard to holloa. As Shannon was standing on the side of the track when the switchman left, and there was no one else near the end of the train, the only reasonable inference from the evidence is that, as the train came along, he got in front of it, and was attempting to knock the wedge out of the coupler, and while walking along on the track doing this, got his foot hung in the frog, which was on the inside of the rail. As the train was backing, in order to face the coupler and knock on it, he would have to be with his side or face to the train and to walk sideways or backwards as it came up to him. As yardmaster he had often warned his subordinates not to go in front of moving trains, on the ground that it was dangerous. The case then presented is, can there be a recovery for a defective condition of the frog which caught his foot, and caused him to be run over, when he placed himself voluntarily in front of this moving train and undertook to hammer out the wedge as it was backing along?

It was in the night time. In order to hammer on the coupler he was necessarily right up against the car. Although it was moving slowly, perhaps about three miles an hour, still he could but know that if for any reason he missed his footing he would be in imminent peril, and to undertake to walk in front of the train, with his side or face to it, was to place himself in a most perilous position, from which no care on the part of those controlling the train could extricate him if a mishap occurred. He was the superior officer in charge; the train was several car lengths from the caboose, and he knew it would not stop until about the time it reached the caboose, unless signaled. He knew the train was in motion, and with this knowledge deliberately went in front of it to hammer on the wedge before it had passed the switch, for his foot was caught in the frog and the caboose was two car lengths away.

The rule is elementary that the servant who voluntarily places himself in a perilous position can not recover of the master, where there is no necessity for his so doing, although he may be injured by reason of some neglect of the master, which would otherwise be actionable. The rule is thus well stated in 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 145: "Where a servant voluntarily and needlessly assumes a position of peril and is injured, he can not recover therefor, although at the time of the injury the master was negligent in the discharge of the duties which he owed to the servant."

In 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 207, the rule is thus stated: "The servant can not recover if his injury was proximately due to his own fault in taking unnecessary risks, as by needlessly going or remaining in a dangerous place, * * * needlessly coupling cars in motion, or needlessly trying to step on a moving railroad train." * * *

In Whitmore v. Boston, &c., R. R. Co., 150 Mass., 477, a crew was loading cars from a vessel, and kicking them out when loaded. There was a space between some of the cars which had been loaded and kicked out, and the plaintiff went in between them to work. While he was working there another car was kicked out, which jammed the cars together and injured him. It was held he could not recover on the ground that he voluntarily placed himself in a position of danger, although no signal was given of the kicking out of the last car. This is a much stronger case than that, for here the deceased went in front of the actually moving train and undertook the perilous task of moving along with it over the switch, a danger which he fully understood.

So in Lord v. Pueblo, &c., R. R. Co., 12 Colo., 890, the deceased attempted to pass between two cars about two feet apart, and was caught and killed by a sudden movement of the train. It was held that he could not recover, on the ground that it was a perilous undertaking which he attempted voluntarily. So, also, where the servant undertook to cross the track in front of a moving train. (Elliott v. Chicago, &c., R. R. Co., 5 Dak., 523, 8 L. R. A., 363; Loring v. Kansas City, &c., R. R. Co., 128 Mo., 349; Cooney v. Great Northern R. R. Co., 9 Wash., 292.)

Even if it be inferred that the deceased was not caught while he was hammering on the coupler, but after he had left it and was trying to cross the track in front of the moving train in an effort to get to the other side of the track, still the result is the same; for he had needlessly placed himself in a position of manifest peril, and if in extricating himself from this position, and in attempting to get across the track just in front of the moving train, he voluntarily took a risk which he should not have assumed, he must at least stand in no better light than other persons undertaking to cross a railroad track just in front of a moving train. It is urged for the appellant that instruction No. 2, given by the court, was equivalent to a peremptory instruction, and that there were errors in the other instructions, but it is unnecessary for us to consider any of the instructions under the view of the law we have indicated.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. WEAVER'S ADM'R, &c.

(Filed December 4, 1902.)

Insurance—Fraud—Appellant issued a policy of life insurance on the life of W. for $10,000. After her death suit was brought on the policy by the beneficiaries, and after the service of the summons appellant paid the amount of the policy. Afterwards appellant instituted this action against the beneficiaries to recover the amount paid, charging that the examining physician and the insured entered into a fraudulent and corrupt collusion to defraud the company; that with this intent the insured made many false and fraudulent statements as to the condition of her health, and that the physician made false and fraudulent statements in his medical report as to the physical condition of the insured upon the faith of which the policy was issued. Appellant does not allege that it did not know of the fraud before the payment of the money. Held—That appellant is not entitled to the relief sought. A party who has been induced to enter into a contract by fraud may exercise the right of rescission within a reasonable time after the discovery. If the policy was obtained by fraud a court of chancery would have cancelled it, notwithstanding the incontestible clause therein, if the suit for a rescission had been brought within a reasonable time after its issue during the lifetime of the insured upon the tender back of the premiums received by the company. But in this case appellant not only failed to take any steps looking to a repudiation of the contract during the lifetime of the insured, but when sued upon the contract, after her death, confessed liability by the payment of the principal, interest and cost.

A. E. Cole & Son for appellant.

E. L. Worthington and Thos. R. Phister for appellees.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

This case comes up on appeal from a judgment of the Mason Circuit Court. A general demurrer was sustained to the plaintiff's petition. It alleges in substance that appellant issued a policy of insurance on the life of Mary L. Weaver for $10,000, payable at her death, one half to her estate and the other half to her children; that the policy was issued upon the faith of representations made by Mary L. Weaver in her application therefor, and upon the report of the medical examiner as to her physical condition at the time; that the insured, Mary L. Weaver, made many false and fraudulent statements as to the condition of her health in this application, and that W. H. Hoard, their examining surgeon, entered into a fraudulent and corrupt conspiracy with the insured to procure the issue of said policy, and made divers false and fraudulent statements in his medical report as to the physical condition of the insured; that after the death of the insured appellee, L. C. Harrison, as administrator of Mary L. Weaver, and the statutory guardian of her children, brought suit upon the policy, which was by its terms incontestable; that after being summoned to answer, they paid the amount of the policy, with interest and costs, and a judgment was entered dismissing the suit: and charge that by reason of the fraudulent conspiracy entered into by Mary L. Weaver and W. H. Hoard, and the false representations made by them, that they had been cheated out of $10,000 paid, and subjected to other expenses; and pray a judgment for $15,000 in damages for the deceit practiced upon them by Mary L. Weaver and Dr. Hoard. They do not allege that they did not know of the fraud before the payment of the money.

The law is well settled that when a party has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract, he may have same rescinded, provided he has not acted upon it or recognized it as binding after the discovery of the fraud, but he must exercise the right of rescission within a reasonable time after the discovery. But if he delays instituting his suit for an unreasonable time, he will be held to have confirmed the contract. If, as alleged, the policy was obtained by fraud, we think there can be no doubt that, notwithstanding the incontestable clause therein, a court of chancery would have cancelled it in a suit for a rescission brought within a reasonable time after its issue and during the lifetime of the insured, upon the tender back of the premiums received by the company. But in this case appellant not only failed to take any steps looking to a repudiation of the contract during the lifetime of the insured, but when sued upon the contract after her death confessed liability by the payment of the principal, interest and cost.

It is an axiom of the law that a litigant is entitled to his day in court, but that he is not entitled to two days, and a judgment in an action necessarily determines not only every question which is presented, but every one which ought to have been presented, or such as are essentially with the subject-matter of the litigation, especially as to matters of claim and defense. (Freeman on Judgments, 2d edition, section 249). Having failed to institute a suit for a rescission within a reasonable time, or to make defense when sued upon the policy, appellant can not be permitted to relitigate questions which were necessarily concluded by the judgment. Besides, if an appellant seems to concede the incontestable clause in the policy precluded them from resisting its payment on the ground of fraud, it logically follows that it is equally efficacious to defeat any action brought against the estate of the decedent for damages by reason thereof.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. KENTUCKY AND INDIANA BRIDGE CO.
SAME v. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO., &c.

(Filed December 4, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Street Improvements—Liability of city for increase of bid beyond first contract—Statute of limitation—In an action between the city of Louisville and other parties, property holders in said city, plaintiff alleged that a contractor had executed a bond for the completion of street improvements with sufficient surety, and that the council had released the contractor from contracts that he had entered into and executed bond for, and that on a reletting of the contract the lowest bidder was given the contract at from 25 to 33 per cent. higher than the former contract, and that having paid the difference between the bids the property owners sued the city for the difference, and the courts decided that the city was liable for said sums. Appellees, who were property owners on the same street, filed their suits to recover on their claims against the city. The city relied on the five year statute of limitation as a defense. Held—That said defense was insufficient, as appellee's cause of action did not accrue until they had paid the amount due the contractors, and appellees were entitled to recover.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

W. W. Thum and Stanley E. Sloss for appellees.

Appeals from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

These appeals grow out of the case of Barfield v. Gleason, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 128. In that case, among other things, we said: "It appears that at the first letting this work was awarded to one McNaghton, who entered into a contract with good security; that after performing certain work in the same neighborhood, under like contracts, he became insolvent (it is claimed, by reason of the improper rejection of materials purchased by him to carry on the work), made application for release from his remaining contracts, and that, although his surety was ample and sufficient, the board of public works recommended his release, and the council adopted a resolution rescinding the contract. There was a subsequent advertisement of the improvement, and the appellee, Gleason, was the lowest bidder. His bid was from 25 to 33 per cent. higher than the McNaghton contract. No award was made at that time, but at a subsequent letting the contract was awarded to Gleason on substantially the same bid that he had made at the time of the second advertisement. A judgment over against the city is asked by the appellants for the difference between the McNaghton contract and the bid upon which the contract was awarded to Gleason. Does this state of facts constitute a cause of action against the city?"

Upon this question the members of the court are not in accord, but the majority are of opinion that it does so, for the following reasons: The city of Louisville in determining that Catalpa street should be improved performed a legislative function. In advertising for bids under the ordinance, making the award, executing the contract with the bidder, and requiring the performance of the work, it was, through its officers, executing a statutory power of attorney from the property holders. The contract was made with concededly good and sufficient security. The council, on the recommendation of the board of public works, undertook by resolution to release the contractor and his surety from its fulfillment. There was here no exercise, or attempt to exercise, legislative discretion a second time upon the question which had previously, in the exercise of legislative discretion, been determined, viz., whether the improvement was necessary and should be made. The extent of the council's powers in that behalf and the proper mode of their exercise need not be considered here, nor need we consider the powers of the council in a case where the contract is unenforceable either because of irregularity or because of insolvency of the contractor and his surety. The contract here is conceded to have been valid and enforceable. It was one which the city council had no power by resolution to cancel, and subsequent events showed that it was a highly advantageous contract. By the city's unauthorized action it cast upon the property holders the burden of the difference in cost between the work as provided for under the McNaghton contract and under the less advantageous Gleason contract. For this difference the property holders are entitled to a right of action, not against Gleason, who was required only to look to the validity of the ordinance which provided for the improvement, but against the city by whose unauthorized action the burden was cast upon them.

On the return of the case to the circuit court, after this appeal, judgments were entered in favor of the property owners who had asserted claims against the city for the amount of the additional burden placed on their property by the act of the city in releasing McNaghton. These judgments were paid. Appellees, who were property owners on the street, but had not then asserted their claims against the city, afterwards filed their petitions thereon. The city pleaded the five years' statute of limitation; the court sustained a demurrer to this plea and the city failing to plead further, gave judgment against it.

It is insisted for appellant that the cause of action of the property owner accrued when McNaghton was released, and that this court in effect so determined in the case above quoted, for there the property owners had paid nothing when their petitions were filed. On the other hand, it is insisted for the appellee that the property owners had no cause of action against the city until they had paid their assessments, or at least until it had been finally determined that they must pay them, which was within five years before the suits were filed.

The question whether the property owners had a cause of action against the city before they paid their assessments was not made in the other case. The only question made there was as to the liability of the city for the difference between the two bids. A surety may maintain an action in equity against his principal before paying the debt to compel the principal to discharge it. So the purchaser of property may maintain a like action against one who is primarily liable for a debt which is a lien on the property to compel him to pay the debt and relieve the property of the incumbrance, although he has not been compelled to pay anything. The former action was in equity, and was in the nature of an application to the chancellor by the property owners to compel the city to relieve their property of the burden which the city had placed upon it. It was so treated by the court, and it was not determined in that suit what form of judgment should be entered. Until the property owner paid he had no right to sue the city to recover from it a personal judgment in his favor, for if the rule were otherwise he might recover the money from the city, although by some means he might never be compelled to pay out anything. The cause of actions here was for money paid. The sum of the case is that the city in its proceedings to charge appellees' property with the improvement of the street had by its unauthorized acts placed upon the property a greater lien than was warranted, and that this additional sum appellees have been compelled to pay. As was said in the former opinion, the city was in this proceeding acting as the statutory attorney in fact of the property holders; and it is responsible for its unauthorized acts as such, but its liability was not fixed until the loss fell on appellees. There was no right to a personal judgment against the city until the money was paid, and the property owners might sue to recover the amount so paid within five years of the time of the payment.

Judgment affirmed.

PRESTON v. PRICE.

(Filed December 5, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Contested elections—Pleading—At the November election, 1901, appellant was the Republican nominee for clerk of the Johnson County Court and appellee was the Democratic nominee. The board of canvassers certified appellee's election by twenty eight majority. Appellant filed this action contesting the election, charging bribery and corruption of voters and failure of election officers to certify the result in one precinct. Appellee filed an answer, denying the allegations of the answer and making countercharges. Appellant filed a reply, but it was stricken from the record because same was not filed in the time required by law. Held—That the reply was properly stricken from the record. Under the law providing for contest of elections, time of filing pleadings is mandatory. Objection is made to the answer because it is not styled a counterclaim; also because no notice was given of filing the answer. Held—That the statute does not require that the answer should be styled a counterclaim, but permits counter grounds of contest to be set up in the answer. After the court struck out the reply and parts of the answer, the contestee moved the court to render judgment in his favor on the face of the pleadings, to which contestant objected, and offered to read the evidence taken in support of the grounds of contest set out in the petition. The court refused to hear said evidence, but sustained the motion to render judgment in favor of contestee on face of the pleadings, and dismissed the petition. Held—That this was error. Although the affirmative matter of the answer was taken for confessed, the contestant might still have recovered if he proved the averments of his petition.

C. B. Wheeler and Warren Meek for appellant.

John P. Walls and Vaughn, Howes & Howes for appellee.

Appeal from Johnson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

At the November election, 1901, appellant Preston was the Republican nominee for clerk of the Johnson County Court, and appellee Price was the Democratic nominee. The board of canvassers certified Price's election by twenty-eight votes. Preston thereupon instituted a contest for the office, alleging that he received a majority of the legal votes cast, but that the board counted for Price votes that had been cast for Preston, and votes that were not cast in the race for county court clerk; that a large number of the votes which were cast and counted for Price were procured by bribery, by the use of money and whisky on the day of the election; that in Big Gap precinct 118 votes were counted for Price, though the officers of election failed to certify any votes cast for him at that precinct, and that at various named precincts specified numbers of voters were bribed to cast their votes for Price by paying them money and giving them whisky, and that in order to see that the voters so bribed actually voted for Price they were caused to vote "on the table," in the presence of all the officers of election, without first declaring under oath their inability to mark their own ballots. The number of votes alleged to have been illegally counted for Price aggregates something over 200.

It is objected to this petition, though no demurrer was filed, that it does not state facts showing Preston to have been eligible for election as county court clerk. We do not think it necessary to consider this question, under the circumstances, inasmuch as the answer shows him to have been the incumbent of the office, and, therefore, presumably eligible.

The petition was filed on November 20, 1901. The answer was filed December 9, 1901, and contains a specific denial of practically every averment of the petition, and also sets up grounds of contest against the contestant, the counter grounds being charges of improprieties, irregularities and illegal votes in favor of contestant similar to those alleged by contestant against contestee. The illegal votes specified in the answer aggregate between forty and fifty.

Objection is made to the answer on the ground that it is not styled a counterclaim. We do not think this objection is well taken. The statute (Act of ———, 1900, section —) provides that "within twenty days after the service of summons upon him, the contestee shall file his answer, which may consist of a denial of the averments of the petition, and may also set up grounds of contest against the contestant," etc. The statute does not require that the answer should be styled a counterclaim, but permits counter grounds of contest to be set up in the answer. A reply to the answer was filed on December 19. On motion of contestee the reply was stricken from the record as not filed in time. Certain affidavits were filed and read on the hearing of the motion, but they show only that the filing of the reply was postponed to other business. The affidavit of one of the counsel shows that he does not know the date at which he received the reply from counsel at Catlettsburg, but that he prepared a typewritten copy thereof and filed the same "as soon as he could conveniently or reasonably do so, considering other matters on hand, and in which this affiant was engaged, which demanded affiant's special attention at the time." We are not called upon to decide whether for good cause shown, or for unavoidable casualty or misfortune, the time prescribed by the statute for filing a reply in an election case might be extended, for no such state of cause is shown. The whole statute, so far as it relates to contested election cases, shows the legislative intent to be that such contests should be railroaded through the courts, to the end that if the contestant should succeed in his contest he might do so in time for his success to be of benefit to himself, and possibly to the public. We are of opinion, therefore, that the time specified within which a reply may be filed is mandatory, to the extent of requiring it to be filed within the time named, unless good cause be shown. It is unnecessary to decide anything further in the present case. We do not think the use of the word "may," in reference to a reply, the reply "may be filed within ten days after the answer," etc., requires the application of a different rule from the use of the word "shall" with respect to an answer. A reply is unnecessary, if the answer makes up the issue. Therefore, the word "may" was used in regard to the reply.

On behalf of contestant it is objected that no notice was given of the filing of the answer. No notice is required by the statute. The rules applicable to the filing of pleadings in the clerk's office in vacation, in ordinary cases, do not apply in contested election cases. The time fixed for filing pleadings in these cases is short, and we think the clear intent of the statute is that the parties must take notice of such filing. But after the court struck out the reply, and on motion struck out certain parts of the answer, the contestee moved the court to render judgment in his favor on the face of the pleadings, "to which contestant objected, and offered to read the evidence taken in support of the grounds of contest set out in the petition. The court refused to hear said evidence, but sustained the motion to render judgment in favor of contestee on face of pleadings," and dismissed the petition, with costs. This was error. It seems to have been done upon the supposition that the affirmative matter of the answer being taken pro confesso, a judgment necessarily went in favor of contestee. This, however, does not appear to be correct. Even if the affirmative averments of the answer be taken as confessed, the contestant might still recover if he proved the averments of the petition. In other words, the certified majority for contestee, together with the averments of the answer, are not sufficient to offset the averments of the petition. The averment of the answer, in substance that contestee received a majority of the votes cast, is only an affirmative denial of a similar averment by contestant in the petition.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to consider the testimony and render judgment in accordance therewith.

TOWN OF CENTRAL COVINGTON v. BELLONBY.

1. Municipal government—Damages—Negligence—Appellee brought this action, alleging that C. and L. so obstructed a sidewalk with brick and sand as to make it dangerous to pedestrians, and that they failed to place any light upon said obstructions, and that by reason of same and the negligence of defendants, plaintiff, while traveling along the sidewalk, was permanently and seriously injured, for which she asked $5,000 damages. Appellant was made a defendant. Appellant, in its answer, specially pleaded that it had not authorized the obstructions, if any there were, to be placed upon the sidewalk, and that it had no notice thereof nor reasonable opportunity to discover same, and also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which negligence was denied in the reply. The jury, upon peremptory instruction, found for the defendants, C. and L., and upon final hearing the jury found a verdict in favor of appellee for $2,500 against appellant. One of the principal objections relied upon by appellant for a reversal is that the court erred in directing a finding in favor of C. and L. Held—That appellant has no grounds for complaint against appellee.

2. Verdict not excessive—The verdict is not excessive and was rendered under proper instructions to the jury.

Simrall & Arthur and Orlando P. Schmidt for appellant.

James P. Tarvin and B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

The petition and amended petitions filed herein by plaintiff charge that appellant, A. J. Craig, and Richard Lambert so obstructed a certain sidewalk in the town of Central Covington with brick and sand as to make it dangerous to pedestrians, and that said parties failed to place any light upon said obstructions, and that by reason of same, and of the negligence of the said defendants, the plaintiff in traveling along said sidewalk was permanently and seriously injured and caused to incur great expense in treatment, to her damage in the sum of $5,000, for which she prayed judgment. The answers of the several defendants may be considered a traverse of all the averments of the petitions which tended to show a right to recover. The appellant also specially pleaded that it had not authorized the obstructions, if any there were, to be placed upon the sidewalk, and that it had no notice thereof, nor reasonable opportunity to discover same, and also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which negligence was denied in the reply. The demurrers to the petition, as finally amended, were properly overruled.

The jury upon peremptory instructions found for the defendant, Craig, and upon final hearing the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500 as against the city of Central Covington. We find for the defendants, Richard Lambert and A. J. Craig."

The appellant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, it prosecutes this appeal. The grounds relied upon for a new trial are in substance as follows:

1st. Because the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence.

2d. Because the verdict was contrary to law.

3d. Because the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury at the close of plaintiff's testimony to find for the defendant, Town of Central Covington.

4th. Because the jury failed to find any verdict against the defendant, Lambert, for any sum.

5th. Because the evidence showed, and the defendant, Lambert, admitted, that he was responsible for the obstruction on the sidewalk, and the verdict of the jury in exempting the said Lambert from all damages is contrary to both the law and evidence.

6th. Because Lambert's own testimony showed that he purchased the brick, had them placed on the said sidewalk, allowed them to be retained there for a period of days and knew their condition, all without the knowledge or consent of the town of Central Covington, and by so doing became the proximate and direct cause of plaintiff's injury, and the verdict of the jury is palpably against the law and the evidence.

7th. Because by Lambert's own testimony he is the cause of the injury, by being a trespasser on the street without permission, and by the first instruction given the jury the town's undoubted right of recovery against Lambert may be lost or jeopardized.

8th. Because no sufficient knowledge was shown upon the part of the town of Central Covington as would indicate negligence on the part of said town in failing to remove the obstruction.

9th. Because the evidence failed to show that either the town marshal or the police judge has power under the charter of Central Covington or its ordinances to remove obstructions from the streets of said town, or to place lights on the same.

10th. Because the knowledge of the town marshal or police judge, unless it is made the duty of those officers to report all obstructions on the streets, is in no sense the knowledge of the town, and the jury erred in finding against the town of Central Covington.

11th. Because by the weight of the evidence it was shown that the accident occurred in the daylight and could thus have been easily avoided, and that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as should have entitled the defendant town to a verdict at the hands of the jury.

12th. Because the court erred in refusing the instructions asked for by the defendant town.

13th. Because the verdict of the jury was excessive and out of all proportion to the injury received.

It may be conceded that the testimony is conflicting as to the character of the obstruction in the street, and as to whether it was a reasonable obstruction; also as to the extent and severity of plaintiff's injuries, as well as the fact of notice to the town of the existence of the obstruction for such a length of time as to show that the town did or could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered in time to have removed the same, and the same may be said as to whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; but the jury heard all the testimony and had the witnesses before them, and we are not authorized to say that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence.

It seems that a special judge, the Hon. Harvey Myers, was finally agreed upon or selected without exception of defendants, hence the second ground in the motion for new trial is not available. From what we have already said, it is clear that the peremptory instruction should not have been given. As to the fourth ground for a new trial, which is in substance repeated in several other paragraphs, in respect to the failure of the jury to find any verdict against the defendant, Lambert, it seems to us that the appellant has no grounds for complaint against the plaintiff on that account. This record seems to show that the plaintiff in good faith earnestly sought to obtain a verdict against Lambert, as well as the appellant, and we are unable to see any reason for reversing the judgment obtained by her simply for the reason that she did not obtain judgment against as many of the defendants as she desired. As to whether the jury should have found against Lambert or not is a question that we are not called upon to discuss or decide, for the reason that appellee is not now complaining of the judgment, and the appellant not having sought any judgment over against Lambert in the court below, and he is not even made a party to this appeal. We fail to perceive wherein the appellant has any right to complain of the verdict in favor of Lambert, nor do we think it proper to express any opinion as to whether or not the appellant could, under any stated case, recover from Lambert the damages adjudged to be against the appellant in this suit.

We have carefully considered the instructions offered and refused, also those given, and we think the court did not err in any respect in regard to refusing or giving instructions. The instructions seem to have been carefully, clearly and properly drawn, and the appellant has no ground for complaint in respect thereto.

It is very earnestly insisted that the verdict of the jury is excessive, and out of all proportion to the injuries received. We can not concur in the contention of appellant in this respect. If the testimony given by the plaintiff, her doctor and others, was believed by the jury, the verdict is not excessive. It is true that some evidence was introduced tending or attempting to show that her injury was not as severe as claimed to be by her, but it is the peculiar province of the jury which hears the evidence to hear and determine the facts, and award such a verdict as the law and facts authorize. It may be that if we were the sole judges of the facts we might not render judgment for so large an amount as the plaintiff recovered in this case, but under the well-settled rules of this court and under the law governing such trials, we do not feel authorized to disturb the verdict of the jury. After a careful consideration of this entire case we fail to perceive any error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

GUSSIE KREIGER v. GOSNELL, & Co.

(Filed December 5, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Street improvements—Liens—This was a suit to enforce a lien for an apportionment warrant for the improvement of Hill street, which embraced the construction of a subway under the tracks of the L. & N. R. R. Co. The chancellor gave a judgment enforcing the lien for the entire cost of the subway; also gave judgment against the city for 10 per cent. embraced in the contract to guaranty the repair of the street for five years. The city has not appealed, but the correctness of the judgment enforcing the lien for the cost of the subway is questioned on appeal prosecuted by appellant, a property holder. Held—That the case be reversed, with directions to ascertain what proportion of the cost of construction was occasioned by making the street a subway, with which the property of appellant should not be charged.

C. B. Seymour and P. A. Gaertner for appellant.

Lane & Harrison for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

This was a suit to enforce a lien for an apportionment warrant for the improvement of Hill street, in Louisville. Separate suits were brought on each warrant, but the pleadings in this case were, by consent, adopted as the pleadings in seven other similar cases, and the evidence taken in the case of Gosnell v. Louisville Steam Forge Co. was read in all the cases growing out of that improvement. The transcript used on the appeal in that case was, by consent, made a part of this record. As will appear by reference to the opinion in the case last-mentioned (Louisville Steam Forge Co. v. Mehler, & Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1837), the territory contiguous to the improvement was naturally of a level surface; the right of way of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. crosses the street improved between the points designated for the improvement, and the work consisted in part of transforming the street at that point into a subway under a bridge, about fifteen feet deeper than the surrounding level, with an incline in the approaches of the subway of about 8 per cent., extending on either side of the bridge for a distance of some 500 feet. The making of the subway was in pursuance of a contract between the railroad company and the city, by which it was agreed that the street should be constructed under the company's tracks.

The chancellor held in all the cases that the abutting property was liable for the entire cost of the improvement, including the cost of making the street a subway. He also held, in supposed compliance with the decision in Gleason v. City, 90 Ky., 522, that 10 per cent. of the contract price of the work was not for original construction at all, but for repairs to be made under the five-year guaranty contained in the contract, and, therefore, as cost of reconstruction, chargeable against the city and not against the property holders. He accordingly rendered judgment in favor of the contractors against the property holders for 90 per cent. of the contract price, and against the city for 10 per cent. of that price.

On the appeal in Louisville Steam Forge Co. v. Mehler, this court held that the cost of the improvement, to the extent it was occasioned by the subway crossing, was not street construction which was chargeable against the property holder, and the judgment was reversed, with directions to ascertain what proportion of the cost of construction was occasioned by making the street a subway, and to relieve the abutting property from such proportion of the cost. This court also held that the guaranty clause in the contract there involved was in substance the same as that considered in City of Louisville v. Mehler, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 62; that it was a mere guaranty of the work and materials, and imposed no liability upon the city for that proportion of the cost. The case was, therefore, reversed also upon the cross appeal of the city.

The judgment appealed from in the case at bar is exactly like the judgment considered in Louisville Steam Forge Co. v. Mehler. It is erroneous in adjudging that portion of the cost of the improvement occasioned by making the street a subway a charge against appellant's property. This error is the ground for the appeal by the property holder. The chancellor was also in error, in that he gave judgment against the city for 10 per cent. of the contract price, instead of against the property holder. The city has not appealed, and the contractor has no cross appeal.

It is insisted on behalf of the contractors (appellees) that there were two errors committed by the trial court, one against the property holder, viz., charging her with the cost of making the street into a subway, and the other in her favor, viz., failing to charge her with 10 per cent. of the cost of the improvement, and that it does not appear from anything in the record that if the court had fixed the correct amount for which appellant was liable it would have been any less than the amount for which judgment was actually rendered, and, therefore, the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed. Appellees insist that it is well settled that a judgment enforcing an erroneous apportionment for the cost of improving a public way will not be reversed at the instance of the property holder unless it appear that the burden would be reduced by a correct apportionment. In support of this McHenry v. Salvage, 99 Ky., 282, is relied on. In that case it was held im-material that the apportionment was made on the assumption that the contiguous property was not divided into squares by principal streets, appellant's contention being that it was in fact so divided, because it did not appear that under the method of apportionment by squares he would be required to pay less than under the method adopted. Barret v. Falls City Artificial Stone Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 669, and Chawk v. Beville, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1769, are to the same effect. In the latter case the court said: "The rule is well settled that in order to entitle the party complaining of an apportionment to relief in cases of this character he must show that under the proper method of apportionment he would be required to pay less than under the method adopted."

These cases have no application to the case at bar. The record does show that the apportionment against appellant would have been less if it had been made on the basis which this court held proper in the Louisville Steam Forge Co. case, for there would have been a deduction made from it. The other error was not an error in the apportionment of the cost of the improvement by square feet in the quarter squares abutting, or by square feet to a designated distance from the improvement, or by the number of front feet. It is not an error in the mode of apportionment; it is an error in the person against whom the judgment was rendered, and it is an error in appellee's favor as much as in favor of appellant; and appellee is now attempting to offset an erroneous judgment in his favor against the city, no doubt already collected, against an error embraced in another judgment, also in his favor, rendered against appellant.

Our attention is also called to paragraph 7 of the amended answer, pleading an unnecessary multiplication of actions, in bringing a separate suit upon each apportionment warrant and seeking to make appellees liable for the costs thereby occasioned, under section 687 of the Code. This is a matter in which the trial court should be accorded a large discretion, and we leave it for such action as the chancellor deems proper in the premises.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed, with directions upon return of the case to ascertain what proportion of the cost of construction was occasioned by making the street a subway, with which the property of the appellant should not be charged, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

EDWARDS v. LOGAN.

1. Contested elections—Ballots as evidence—Misconduct of commissioners appointed to count ballots—At the November election, 1901, appellant was the Republican candidate for county attorney of Edmonson county, and appellee was the Democratic candidate for the same position. On the face of the returns appellant had a majority of nineteen votes. Appellee filed this action, contesting said election, alleging that the officers of the election had fraudulently or mistakenly counted votes for appellant which, in fact, were cast for appellee, and that illegal voters had been allowed to vote in certain precincts and had voted for appellant, and that when the errors or frauds were corrected, and the returns purged of illegal votes, appellee would have a majority of the legal vote cast. The answer contained countercharges of a similar nature. At a succeeding term of the circuit court the court on its own motion appointed two commissioners, one of each political party, to count the ballots, which were then preserved in the county court clerk's office, and gave them the keys and they proceeded to make a count. They declined to permit either of the parties to be present at the count, and refused admission to all others. After finishing their labors they made a report to the court, and the court set aside their report. The court thereupon ordered the ballots to be brought into court, and the judge, in the presence of counsel and the parties, counted the ballots. Objection is made that the ballots were not in evidence, and the production of same to the commissioners and the court could not be considered, as they were produced after the time for taking evidence had expired. Held—That it was the purpose of the legislature, in enacting the law providing for the preservation of ballots, and providing that they should be locked in boxes with separate locks, so that the keys to one should be in the hands of the officers of the precinct of one of the political parties and the keys to the other lock in the hands of the officers of the other political party, and that in the event of a contest the keys were to be delivered by such officers to the judge of the circuit court, to make such ballots evidence of the first importance in a contested election. When such a contest is filed the ballots become evidence by that fact for all purposes by the trial court. It was proper to consider the ballots on the determination of the questions in issue in this case. The ballots cast in an election are the primary and best evidence of the voters' will as expressed therein, and that in case of a contest, as between the certificates of the officers of election and the ballots, the ballots are the best evidence, but this is conditioned strictly upon the fact that the integrity of the ballots is clearly established. Otherwise, the certificate of the officers of election should prevail. That when the ballots are produced from the custody of the officer whose duty it is to preserve them, and are shown to have been preserved from intermeddling from unauthorized persons and are apparently unchanged, they will be received as evidence of what they may show upon their face, but where they may have apparently been tampered with, or where opportunities have been afforded to unauthorized persons, or to persons interested, to tamper with them, then the burden is upon the party producing and relying upon such ballots to establish their integrity clearly and satisfactorily by evidence. In this case the court erred in receiving the ballots as conclusive under the circumstances, and as better evidence than the certificates of the officers of election. Conceding that the court had the authority to appoint commissioners to count the ballots, it was not proper for the commissioners to have excluded the parties and their counsel from the proceedings when they were opening and canvassing the returns, nor was it regular or proper for them to have held a secret meeting for that purpose, however pure may have been their intentions. The parties to the litigation in person or by counsel, or both, were entitled to witness not merely the opening of the ballot boxes and the envelopes containing the ballots, but also to inspect their condition and verify the actions of the commissioners. Such an arbitrary rule should not be vested anywhere with respect to the returns of an election.

2. Pleadings—Amended answer—After the ballots had been counted by the commissioners, and before they were counted by the circuit judge, appellant offered to file an amended answer, in which he charged that the ballots had been altered or changed; that unauthorized persons and interested persons had access to them and opportunities for changing them, and that, therefore, they were not the same ballots that had been counted and certified by the officers of election. The court erred in refusing to permit this amended answer to be filed, as it was not a ground of either contest or of counter contest, but is a matter affecting the evidence offered. The rules of pleading regarding the time of filing grounds of contest and countercharge, do not apply in this case.

3. Certifying questioned ballots—A ballot endorsed "not counted," and signed by the clerk, which was placed in an envelope and the envelope sealed with wax, across which the election officers signed their names, could not be counted, as the provision of the election law prescribing the manner of certifying questioned ballots is mandatory, and must be strictly complied with.

4. Qualification of voters—Evidence—Idiots—Lunatics—Appellant charges that the court erred in deducting from his vote the votes of a person who is charged with being an idiot; also of one who is charged with being a lunatic. Held—That although the evidence establishes with a reasonable degree of certainty that one of said persons is an idiot, and the other a lunatic, there is not sufficient evidence to show that they voted for appellant, and the court erred in deducting said votes from appellant. The statements made by them after voting, as to how they voted, were incompetent as hearsay. The only evidence as to how either of them voted is that their party affiliation had been with the Republican party, and this was insufficient.

5. Residence of voters—The lower court improperly deducted the vote of W. from appellant, as he was a resident of the State and precinct, and had been for a sufficient time to entitle him to vote. The lower court properly deducted the vote of M. from appellant, also the vote of T. from appellee, as they lacked residence for a sufficient length of time, and should have deducted the vote of B. from appellee for the same reason.

6. Minors—Evidence—School census—The lower court improperly deducted from appellant the votes of C. and S., alleged to be minors. The only evidence before the court to show that they were minors was the testimony of the county court clerk that a school census, on file in his office, showed that each of the voters were born within twenty-one years before the date of the election. Held—That the school census is not evidence of the date of the birth of these people for any other purpose than school purposes.

7. Marking ballots—The lower court rejected a ballot which was marked with a pencil within the circle under the Republican device, then cross marks with a stencil in the squares after several of the candidates, but none after the name of any candidate for county attorney on the opposite ticket. Held—That the court erred in the rejection of this ballot. The proof shows that appellant received a majority of the legal votes cast for the office of county attorney.

W. B. Gaines, John E. DuBose and Edward W. Hines for appellant.

Wm. Cromwell, Wilkins & Lay, D. W. Wright and M. Hazelip for appellee.

Appeal from Edmonson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This contest involves the election to the office of county attorney of Edmonson county. The election was held in November, 1901. On the face of the returns, as certified to by the officers of election, appellant had a majority of nineteen votes. Within the time allowed by statute appellee filed a petition in the Edmonson Circuit Court, in which the validity of the certificate awarded by the election commissioners to appellant was attacked upon two general grounds. One was that the officers of election of each of the precincts in the county had fraudulently or mistakenly counted votes for appellant which, in fact, had been cast for appellee. The other was that illegal voters had been allowed to vote in certain precincts and had voted for appellant, and that when the errors or frauds first mentioned were corrected, and the returns were purged of the illegal votes last mentioned, the result would have been that appellee would have received a majority, and, therefore, did receive a majority, of the legal votes cast at that election for the office of county attorney. Appellant, within the time prescribed, also by the statute, filed an answer, containing countercharges of a somewhat similar nature. The charges were not as specific, probably in either instance, as they should have been, but the parties seem to have joined an issue, and to have developed the case by proof upon the averments as made. After the time allotted by statute for the introduction of proof by the respective parties had expired, and at a succeeding term of the circuit court, the judge of the court, upon his own motion, appointed two commissioners, one selected, it is said, from each of the political parties represented by the claimants to the office in dispute, whom he directed to begin upon a day certain named in the order to then count the ballots, which were preserved in the county court clerk's office, and which had not been filed in the circuit court up to that time, so far as the record discloses. Exceptions were saved to each party by the order of the court. The commissioners so appointed having procured the keys to the ballot box from the circuit judge, met upon a day subsequent to that first fixed in the order, and proceeded to count the ballots. They declined to permit either of the parties to be present at the count, and refused admission to all others. They reported to the court the result of their labors, in which they stated that they found that the ballots in the ballot boxes showed that appellee had received 950 votes, and appellant had received 948. This did not take into account any of the ballots returned by the election officers as questioned. The officers of election had certified by certificates, regularly and duly entered on the night of the election at the close of the polls, that appellee had received 935 votes and appellant 954 for the office in question. How the discrepancy occurred is not explained.

Exception to the report of the commissioners was sustained upon a ground not now material. Thereupon the court, a special judge presiding, the regular judge having declined to sit in the case, ordered the ballots brought into court, and then proceeded, in the presence of counsel, and the parties, to count the ballots. The result of that count was that each of the litigants was found to have received 949 of the unquestioned ballots.

The first question presented by this appeal is whether, in the first place, the ballots were properly before the court as evidence, and, in the second place, whether the court's action concerning the custody, inspection and counting of the ballots was authorized by law. For appellant it is insisted that the ballots not having been produced and proved within the time provided by the statute for the taking of proof in the case, could not be subsequently introduced, because to so allow would be to permit the introduction of evidence for the party so using them after the time allotted by the statute for that purpose. The court is of opinion that it was the purpose of the legislature in enacting the law providing for the preservation of ballots, and providing that they should be locked in boxes with separate locks, so that the keys to one should be in the hands of the officers of the precinct of one of the political parties, and the keys to the other lock in the hands of the officers of the other political party, and that in the event of a contest the keys were to be delivered by such officers to the judge of the circuit court of the circuit having jurisdiction of the case, to make such ballots evidence of the first importance in a contested election. When such a contest is filed, the ballots become evidence by that fact for all proper purposes before the trial court, to be introduced and considered upon such issues as may be legally joined under the provisions of the act. We, therefore, decide that it was proper to consider the ballots on the determination of the questions in issue in this case in so far as they shed light thereon, and subject to the rule announced below.

Whether the court should have appointed commissioners to aid it in tabulating and counting the ballots is a matter not entirely free from doubt. It may well be argued that the duty of canvassing returns of an election can only be exercised by those officials specifically charged with it, who are in the first place the officers of election of the several precincts, then the commissioners of election of the county, and then in the case of contest, the circuit court upon whom jurisdiction is conferred by the statute. The expression in that act, that "the action shall proceed as an equity action," would seem to have reference more especially to the manner of the production of evidence which is by deposition exclusively under the Civil Code in equitable cases, and dispensing with the jury, for in no other particular do the actions appear to be tried as equitable actions. In fact in many particulars, noticeable in the terms of the statute, they are quite dissimilar from equitable actions. From the expression above referred to it has been thought that the court found its power to appoint commissioners. But whether this is true or not, it was not proper for the commissioners to have excluded the parties and their counsel from the proceedings when they were opening and canvassing the returns in litigation, nor was it regular or proper for them to have held a secret meeting for that purpose, however pure may have been their intentions. Certainly the parties to the litigation in person or by counsel, or both, were entitled to witness, not merely the opening of the ballot boxes and the envelopes containing the ballots, but also to inspect their condition and verify the actions of the commissioners. Such an arbitrary right should not be, and we hold is not vested anywhere with respect to the returns of an election. The rule may be stated to be that where the ballots are preserved so that their identity is assured, they can be counted during a contest, and they are undoubtedly better evidence of the vote cast than the returns, and should prevail where there is a difference. (Hughes v. Holman, 28 Oregon, 481; Owens v. State, 64 Tex., 500; People v. Holden, 28 Cal., 123.) But before a recount of the ballots should be allowed to rebut the presumption of the correctness of the official returns it should be proved satisfactorily that the ballots had not been tampered with since the election, and that those offered in evidence are the identical ones cast. On this point it was said in the case of People v. Holden, 28 Cal., 123: "We must presume that the officers of election honestly performed their duty in the premises; that they did not mutilate any of the ballots, but, on the contrary, strung them in the condition in which they were found in the ballot box on a thread, and sent them in that condition to the clerk's office. The same presumption exists in relation to their custody by the clerk. * * * The legislature could have had no other design in thus providing for the preservation of the ballots than to make them evidence of their own contents and a test of the correctness of the returns made up from them by the officers of the election. They are in fact made a part of the returns, for it is expressly provided that they shall be sealed up with the poll list and tally paper, with the certificates of the officers attached, and endorsed 'election returns.' "

That presumption of integrity of the ballots can not attach, however, until it is first shown that they came from the officer whose duty it is by law to have and preserve them, and that they are apparently in the condition of preservation prescribed by the statute. When that much is shown, the legal presumption as to their integrity attaches. On the contrary, however, if it be shown either that they have been tampered with, or that access has been afforded to them to persons unauthorized by law, then the burden shifts, and it thereupon becomes the duty of the person offering and relying upon such ballots to prove affirmatively not only that they are the identical ballots cast in the election, but they have not been mutilated, changed nor tampered with.

In People v. Livingston, 79 N. Y., 288, it was said: "The statute requires the ballot boxes to be preserved undisturbed and inviolate, and it is incumbent upon the party offering the evidence to show that they had been so kept, not beyond a mere possibility of interference, but that they were intact, to the satisfaction of the jury. The burden was upon the relator to satisfy the jury that the boxes had remained inviolate. The returns are the primary evidence of the result of an election. They are made immediately upon canvassing the votes, and the votes are canvassed at the close of the polls in public, and presumably in the presence of the friends of both parties. * * * After the election it is known just how many votes are required to change the result, the ballots themselves can not be identified; they have no earmark. Everything depends upon keeping the ballot boxes secure, and the difficulty of doing this for several months, in the face of temptation and opportunity, requires that the utmost scrutiny and care should be exercised in receiving the evidence. Every consideration of public policy, as well as the ordinary rules of evidence, require that the party offering this evidence should establish the fact that the ballots are genuine. It is not sufficient that the mere probability of security is proved, but the fact must be shown with a reasonable degree of certainty. If the boxes have been rigorously preserved, the ballots are the best and highest evidence; but if not, they are not only the weakest, but the most dangerous, evidence."

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitation, 625, announces substantially the same rule. (People v. Sackett, 14 Mich., 320; People v. Clcott, 16 Mich., 283, 97 Am. Dec., 141.)

The authorities are abundant that where ballots have been so exposed as to have offered opportunity to be tampered with, and have not been guarded with that zealous care which will contravene all suspicion of substitution or change, they lose their presumptive purity, and are no longer to be relied on as evidence in a contest or judicial inquiry as to the result of an election. (McCrary on Elections, 475, etc.; Powell v. Holman, 50 Ark., 94; Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan., 177, opinion by Brewer, J.; Hartman v. Young, 17 Oregon, 150.)

Another fact in this case is that at the same general election in Edmonson county, out of which this contest grows, the office of the clerk of the county court was also in contest, that is, the incumbent who had received the certificate and who continued in office having the custody of the ballots in question, was interested in the result and condition of these ballots, because his office was also then being contested. The ballot boxes, though locked, it is suggested, were wooden boxes so constructed that they could have been entered by the use of a screw driver, taking off the hinges, which were exposed.

In Albert v. Twohig, 85 Neb., 563, it was said that although "the ballots cast constitute the primary evidence to determine the rights of the respective parties, it must appear, however, that they have been preserved substantially in the manner and by the officers prescribed by the statute. If they have been placed in a position to be tampered with by interested parties, the burden of proof is on the party offering them in evidence to show that they are in the same condition as when sealed by the several election boards. And in the absence of such proof it was held that the ballots were properly rejected as evidence."

In this case, after it had become apparent that the court was going to count the ballots which had been in the hands of the commissioners, appellant offered to file an amended answer, in which he charged that the ballots had been altered or changed; that unauthorized persons and interested persons had access to them and opportunities for changing them, and that, therefore, they were not the same ballots that had been counted and certified by the officers of election. This amendment was rejected by the court, doubtless upon the theory that the statute governing the pleadings in this particular class of cases requires that the grounds of contest shall be stated in the petition, and those of counter contest shall be stated in the answer, and that none other shall be considered by the court. In its strict sense this is not a ground either of contest or of counter contest, but is a matter affecting the evidence offered on the grounds already set out. The court is of opinion that the pleading should have been allowed, and the facts stated therein should have been permitted to be proved, even without the pleading.

From these authorities this court holds that the ballots cast in an election are the primary and best evidence of the voters' will, as expressed therein, and that in case of a contest, as between the certificates of the officers of election and the ballots, the ballots are the best evidence, but that this is conditioned strictly upon the fact that the integrity of the ballots is clearly established. Otherwise, the certificate of the officers of election should prevail. (Bailey v. Hurst, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 504.) That when the ballots are produced from the custody of the officer, whose duty it is to preserve them, are shown to have been preserved from intermeddling from unauthorized persons, and are apparently unchanged, they will be received as evidence of what they may show upon their face; but where they may have apparently been tampered with, or where opportunities have been afforded to unauthorized persons, or to persons interested, to tamper with them, then the burden is upon the party producing and relying upon such ballots to establish their integrity clearly and satisfactorily by the evidence. In this case the court erred in receiving the ballots as conclusive under the circumstances recited, and as better evidence than the certificates of the officers of election. However, in view of the conclusion to which we have arrived upon other points, the case will not be remanded for a new trial because of this fact, for the reason that to do so would be only to afford an opportunity to the successful party to increase his majority already established.

There were a number of so-called "questioned" ballots returned by the officers of the election, there being some from every precinct in the county, excepting perhaps one. The certificate required by the statute to be attached to these questioned ballots was not attached in any instance. The statute on this point reads as follows (Act to further Regulate Elections, Acts General Assembly, 1900, section 10): "That if there are any ballots cast and counted, or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of the election, said ballots shall be placed in the large linen envelope furnished by the county clerk for that purpose, and sealed up, and across the seal thereof the officers of the election shall plainly write their names, and at the point of the seal indicated for that purpose the judges of the election shall, in the presence of the clerk and sheriff, place the county election seal in hot wax, as above described, so that it can be plainly read, and the same shall be returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election, for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted; and if counted, what part and for whom."

The learned trial judge rejected all of these contested ballots except two, because the statement required by the closing clause of the section of the statute above quoted was not made. As to the two excepted, and which he counted for appellee, the only statement as to how they were voted was this, written on the back of each ballot: "Not counted. Questioned. W. H. Hack." Hack was the clerk of the election at that precinct. These ballots were enclosed in an envelope, and the envelope was endorsed as required by the statute, that is, the officers signed their names across the seal on the envelope which had been sealed with wax, and stamped; but there was no other statement as to how these ballots were voted save the one of the clerk above quoted. Now, was the statute complied with as to the certificate required by the statute showing how they were counted, or whether at all counted by the officers of the election? In Struss v. Johnson, 100 Ky., 319, this identical question of certificate was under consideration. The court held that this provision of the statute was mandatory, and that "to render doubtful or questioned ballots admissible as evidence in a judicial or other investigation we are of opinion that they must be sealed and returned with the statement of the officers of election as required by the statute." This was followed in Banks v. Sergeant, 104 Ky., 849, and Anderson v. Likens, 104 Ky., 699. We are of opinion, therefore, that the court erred in counting the two ballots in question.

Among the illegal votes cast at this election was one cast by Lewis Hill, who is conclusively shown to have been an idiot. Copies of inquests finding him such were produced in evidence. Under the Constitution and statutes of this State idiots and lunatics are not permitted to vote, and this person should have been excluded from the polls. The trial court upon the evidence, which we will notice, deducted his vote from appellant. That evidence was that this person claimed to belong to the same political party of which appellant was the nominee, and that afterwards the idiot had stated that he had voted the straight ticket of that party. On the other hand, appellant proved by another witness, that while the idiot had told him that he had voted the straight ticket of the party, yet when describing how he voted that ticket, he showed that he voted it by placing the stencil mark under the emblem of the opposite party. Manifestly the statements of this idiot should not have been received, or if received at all, the result is that each cancels the other. What a voter may say after the election, and after he has voted, as to how he voted, is at best but hearsay. An idiot, of course, is one who is destitute of mind, and has been since his birth. Such a person would not be competent as a witness. Certainly his statement out of court could have no more legal force than his statement made in court under oath. We are of opinion that the court erred in deducting this vote from appellant.

George Parsley is shown to have voted at this election. It was claimed that at the time he was a lunatic. Two questions in his case are, therefore, presented: First, was he disqualified; and, second, how did he vote? The evidence is conflicting as to the state of his mind on the day of the election. One witness gave it as his opinion that he had not mind sufficient to know the nature of a vote or to transact business. Another, on the other side, gave it as his opinion that he was competent and qualified. Another gave his opinion that he was disqualified, and he judged that fact from what the voter said, and detailed what the voter said. The matter detailed does not of itself show him mentally deranged. The evidence is substantially the same as to the mental capacity of this witness as was shown in regard to that of his father and a brother, all of whom had at times been afflicted with this unfortunate malady, and all of whom had at times been confined in asylums for the insane. All of them, however, had previous to this election been discharged. On the day following the election this voter was by a verdict of a jury in a trial then had, and that day begun, found to be of unsound mind, and was directed to be confined in an asylum. When his malady reappeared so as to justify this action does not appear, independent of the testimony above referred to.

The question whether he is a competent voter is not entirely free from doubt. The political affiliation of this voter, so far as he had always claimed to have one, was proved. Other than this there is no evidence in the record as to how he voted. This court held in Tunks v. Vincent, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 475, that the declarations of a voter made after the election as to how he voted were incompetent as hearsay. In that case, however, it was held that if the voter was placed upon the witness stand as a witness, and was willing to state how he voted, but the opposite party interposed an objection, and told him that he need not answer unless he wanted to, and that thereupon the witness refused to answer, these facts, coupled with the further proof of his party affiliation, that he had been an active and strenuous partisan, were sufficient circumstances to justify the finding that the witness had voted for that party with whom he had affiliated, and whom he had accommodated by refusing to answer a question which he had previously expressed a willingness to answer. In this case, however, a number of these elements are lacking. The only fact that would indicate how this voter voted is the one of his previous party affiliation. Now if he was insane, and so insane as to be classed as a lunatic, that is, did not have mind sufficient to know or to comprehend his act, or will power to control it, it is as probable that he voted against as for his party affiliation; at least there is no reasonable probability that could be ascribed to his secret conduct when in such deranged condition because of his judgment and opinions entertained when in a rational and sane state of mind. We know as a matter of fact that lunatics frequently, if not generally, do exactly the contrary while insane to what they would have done when of sound mind. It is the opinion of the court that the trial court improperly deducted this ballot from appellant.

Virgil S. Wolf voted for appellant. His vote was deducted by the trial court because it found that he was an illegal voter. The facts appear to be that he was an unmarried man, and had previously lived in Edmonson county in the precinct in which he voted, but had sometime during that year gone to Evansville, Ind., to work. He remained there a few months' returned to Edmonson county, and was living there when this election occurred. The voter testified that when he left Kentucky he left with the intention of returning; that he then claimed, and has always since claimed, Edmonson county as his home, and that while in Indiana he did not vote there, and did not claim his residence there; that his absence was but temporary. His brother testified that the voter had previously made his home with him, and had returned to his place, and was making his home there before and at the time of the election, and that before he left for Indiana he expressed an intention to retain his residence in Edmonson county. Section 1478 of Kentucky Statutes, regulates this question of residence. The first subsection is: "That shall be deemed his (the voter's) residence where his habitation is, and to which when absent he has the intention of returning. He shall not lose his residence by absence for temporary purposes merely."

The court is of the opinion that this witness was a legal voter at this precinct.

Stanley S. Minton is shown to have voted for appellant. Previous to the election he had removed to Indiana with his family; expressed his intention to remain there permanently. Afterwards he evidently changed his intention and returned to Edmonson county, but within a year before the election. His vote was deducted from that given to appellant, and we think rightfully.

James Cook and Andrew W. Skaggs voted evidently for appellant. Their votes were deducted upon the theory that they were minors at the time of the election. The only evidence before the court that they were minors was the testimony of the county court clerk that a school census on file in his office showed that each of these voters were born within twenty-one years before the date of the election. The court is of the opinion that this school census is not evidence of the date of the birth of these people for any other purpose than school purposes. Who gave it to the school assessor or trustee, and who reported it, was not shown, nor indeed was the report or the census itself offered in evidence. It was merely the clerk's statement of what he had found the state of the record to disclose. The court is of opinion that these two votes were improperly rejected.

Marcellus Bailey is shown to have voted for appellee. Within sixty days before the election he removed from the precinct in which he had been living for some months into another precinct in which he had not lived, and voted in the latter precinct. He is the only witness on the subject. He testifies that he did not move until the 12th day of September, 1901 (the election occurred on the 5th of November); that on the 12th of September he sold his property and removed his home. This vote was not excluded from appellee, but should have been.

Rufus Tarter is shown to have voted for appellee, and the court deducted the vote upon the ground that he was an illegal voter. No complaint is made that this action was not proper. The record is pretty clear that he was an illegal voter. The facts in the case of this voter are substantially the same as Stanley S. Minton's, above discussed.

There was one ballot rejected that had been marked thus: The cross mark was made with a pencil within the circle under the device under which appellant was a candidate, then cross marks were made with the stencil in the squares after several of the candidates, but none after the name of any candidate for county attorney on the opposite ticket. This court has held in the cases of Houston v. Steel, 28 Ky., 596, and Graham v. Graham, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 548, that a mark with a pencil at the point where the stencil should have been made is equivalent to a mark with the stencil. It would, therefore, appear that this mark was sufficient in law to have voted the ballot for all of the candidates, including county attorney under the ticket under the emblem of which the pencil mark was made, except as to those candidates where the stencil mark had been made opposite the names of the candidates of the other ticket. One ballot was counted for appellee which had been marked under both of the party devices or emblems, and also opposite the name of appellee. By marking his ballot so indicated an intention, as shown, in our opinion, to not vote either party ticket, but to vote for the person alone opposite whose name he had marked. The ballot was properly counted.

There are other questions presented in the record, but which do not appear to affect the result, and which are not argued in briefs. We refrain, therefore, from discussing them. The result is that appellant received a majority of the legal votes cast for the office of county attorney, and the judgment should be rendered accordingly.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

TICHENOR v. WOOD, &c.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Decedents' estates—Judicial sales—An action was brought to enforce a purchase-money lien on land sold in 1878. The vendee having died the suit was brought against his widow and heirs and a decree rendered and sale made. A child, who was an infant, seeks to set aside the decree and sale for various errors.

2. Affidavit purging claim—It is urged that the affidavit filed with the petition purging the claim was defective. Held—That the failure of the personal representative to raise this objection was a waiver of it.

3. Description of land—Description of the land in the petition, and the judgment which follows the description in the deed to the grantee, is sufficient.

4. Appraisement—Failure to appraise the land before sale did not avoid the sale for the debt created in 1873. The act of 1878 requiring appraisement of real property before making a judicial sale for debt does not apply to a debt created in 1873.

H. P. Taylor for appellant.

M. L. Ward for appellees.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit was brought to enforce a purchase-money note, a lien to secure which was retained on land sold in 1873. The vendee having died before suit, his administrator, widow and heirs at law were made defendants. This appeal is by one of the heirs, who was an infant at the time of the proceedings. The following questions are presented:

1st. the affidavit of the plaintiff (creditor) filed with the petition, purging the demand sued on, did not say, in the words of the statute, that there was no set-off to the demand.

The proper practice is for the personal representative to file an affidavit showing that no demand has been made of him before suit brought, accompanied by the affidavit required by the statute, and thereupon a rule would have been awarded against the plaintiff to show cause why his petition should not be dismissed. (Thomas v. Thomas, 15 Ben Mon., 178; Nutall v. Brannin, 5 Bush, 11; Rogers v. Mitchell, 1 Met., 22.) By not making that question before submission the defendants waive the omission to make demand. (Usher v. Flood, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 721.)

2d. It is argued that the description of the premises in the petition and judgment are insufficient. The language in which the land is described in the petition and judgment seems to have been adopted from the deed conveying this land to appellant's ancestor. It is as follows: "Two undivided two-eighths two tracts or parcels of land lying and being in Ohio county, Kentucky, on Green river, just below Hogs Falls, and known as the Daniel Tichenor land, on which he died. The land is supposed to contain 150 acres."

We are of opinion that the description is sufficiently definite. "That is certain which may be made certain."

3d. The commissioner executing the judgment of sale did not have the land appraised as required by the statute of 1878. (General Statutes, 885, edition 1887.)

The debt for which this land was sold was created in 1873, at which time no appraisement was provided for in such sales. It has been held by this court that the act of 1878 did not apply to debts created before the act took effect; that as to such debts the act was unconstitutional. (Sullivan v. Berry, 88 Ky., 198; Collins v. Collins, 79 Ky., 88.)

These being the only objections urged against the judgment, we are of opinion that it should be affirmed.

DEPPEN, &c. v. GERMAN-AMERICAN TITLE CO., &c.

Fraud—Mortgages—Estoppel—In 1895 appellant subscribed for 400 shares in appellee company of the par value of $25 per share, agreeing to pay therefor $10,000; but it was known and understood at the time that appellant did not have the money to pay for the stock, and it was agreed that he should execute his twenty promissory notes for $500 each, payable five years after date to appellee company, secured by mortgage on real estate. The notes and mortgages were thus executed. As a further part of this agreement and stock subscription it was agreed that appellant was to be employed in some capacity at a salary of $150 per month. He continued in this employment for about a year, until appellee company made a deed of assignment for the benefit of its creditors. After the assignment appellant D. instituted this action, seeking a rescission of his contract of stock subscription and a cancellation of his notes and mortgage on the ground that they were obtained by fraud, covin and deceit practiced upon him by the president of the company. Appellees, in defense, pleaded that they were innocent purchasers of the notes without notice of any infirmities in same, and sought to collect the notes by an enforcement of the mortgage lien and plead an estoppel by appellant by his knowledge and acts from securing a cancellation of his stock subscription and notes and mortgage. Held—That the notes were not placed on the footing of foreign bills of exchange, and defenses may be set up against same. Appellant is entitled to a cancellation of his stock subscription, notes and mortgage on account of the fraud practiced upon him. The scheme to employ appellant at $150 per month to render services worth $50 per month was a part of the fraud practiced. Appellant was not estopped by his acts from seeking a rescission of his contracts, as he knew nothing of the condition of the appellee company or the value of the stock, but he should be required to pay $1,000, the excess for value of his services; also the amount of a loan made to him, but he should not be charged with $300 premiums credited to him as interest.

S. J. Boldrick and J. W. S. Clements for appellants.

H. M. Lane for appellee Hess.

Barnett & Barnett for appellee Louisville Banking Co.

Ernest Macpherson, Arthur Peter and Geo. A. Brent for appellee In.

D. I. Heyman for appellee Western Bank.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

In May, 1895, appellant, R. O. Deppen, subscribed for 400 shares of stock in the German-American Title Co., of the par value of $25 per share, agreeing to pay therefor $10,000. But it was known and understood at the time of this subscription that Deppen did not have the money to pay for the stock, and so it was agreed that he should execute his twenty promissory notes of $500 each, payable five years after date to the German-American Title Co., or bearer, in payment of said stock subscription. These twenty notes were to be secured by a mortgage on real estate executed to the German-American Title Co., as trustee for the holder of these notes. As a further part of this agreement and stock subscription it was agreed that Deppen was to be employed in some capacity by the title company.

This agreement was finally closed, the notes and mortgage executed June 15, 1895, and Deppen began to work for the title company on that date as clerk in the office, his salary being $150 per month. Deppen continued to work for the title company until it made an assignment in May, 1896, and for some time before the assignment he was a director. He was elected a director probably in January, 1896, the exact date not appearing. The employment of Deppen required that he should keep a book showing the location of bonds, notes and mortgages executed to the title company. However, it appears that the notes executed by himself were never put on his book. While Deppen was employed in the office of the title company some of the notes were sold to purchasers and the remainder were pledged to banks to secure loans thereon. A part of Deppen's business was to assist in making sales of notes and mortgages executed to the title company and payable to it or bearer, similar to his own notes. It appears from the proof that he offered to sell his own notes to persons, who did not purchase.

After the assignment in May, 1896, appellant Deppen instituted this action in equity against all parties in interest, seeking a rescission of his contract of stock subscription and a cancellation of his notes and the mortgage, on the ground that they were obtained by fraud, covin and deceit practiced upon him by the president of the German-American Title Co., by falsely and fraudulently representing to appellant that the stock of the German-American Title Co. was worth par (the price agreed to be paid), when in fact and truth the stock was not worth anything.

Appellees, by answer, pleaded that they were purchasers for value before maturity of these notes, and that they had no notice of any infirmity in the notes or of any defense appellant had thereto, and, therefore, contended that there could be no defense presented to them. Appellees also denied the allegations of fraud and deceit that induced appellant to execute the notes, and pleaded that appellant by his conduct in executing the notes and mortgage, knowing they were to be negotiated, and his subsequent conduct in remaining silent for nearly eleven months after their execution and delivery to the title company, with full opportunity to learn the true condition of the affairs of the title company and the value of his 400 shares of stock therein, and from the further fact of his proposing to sell these notes for the title company, and of having been credited with dividends of 3 per cent. semi-annually in January, 1896, was estopped from a cancellation of the notes and mortgage as to them, and pleaded further that, having delayed filing his action for rescission until after the known insolvency and assignment of the corporation, and even after an action to settle the affairs of the corporation had been brought by the assignee, he was not entitled to a rescission.

Appellees then sought by cross petition to obtain judgment and decree of foreclosure of the mortgage. Appellant denied the plea of estoppel. Upon these issues the proof was taken and upon trial the court dismissed appellant's petition, and rendered judgment on the cross petitions, decreeing foreclosure of the mortgage. To reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The duties of the appellant when employed by the title company were not such as would give him information of the general affairs of that company, of its condition financially, nor of the actual value of the shares of stock. It is not pretended that he had actual knowledge of the affairs of the company, nor of the value of the stock he purchased until the day the deed of assignment was executed. In fact appellant testifies without contradiction that he had no idea that the stock was worth less than par at any time up till the deed of assignment was made. It is insisted that as to appellees, purchasers for value, appellant must have exercised diligence to ascertain the condition of the corporation, and to have demanded a rescission or gave notice of his defense to the notes as soon as he learned he had been defrauded; that for his negligent failure so to do he is estopped to plead the fraud practiced on him, as he was silent when he should have spoken.

In answer to that it is urged that it is shown that it was difficult to learn after an examination of the books of the corporation its exact financial condition. We have examined all these questions presented with much care, and after much difficulty and with some hesitancy we have concluded that the question of rescission is immaterial, as the same relief can be granted to appellant as a defense to the cross actions seeking to foreclose the mortgage liens, if appellant be entitled to relief at all. We are also of opinion that these notes never became bills of exchange, and that, therefore, appellant may present such defenses thereto as he could were they owned and held by the German-American Title Co., unless by some act he has estopped himself to make such defense subsequent to the original execution and delivery thereof to the title company. (Louisville Ins. Co. v. Hoffman, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 2016; Sohnable v. German-American Title Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1063; Ritchie v. Cralle, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 160; Waggoner v. German-American Title Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 215; Levy v. Rudolph, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 258. In these cases bonds and notes like these in controversy were held not to be placed on the footing of bills of exchange.)

Although the action is begun by appellant Deppen seeking a rescission of the stock subscription and a cancellation of his notes and the mortgage, effect of that action is to force appellants to seek collection of the notes. The stock subscription can not be rescinded, the corporation is defunct, passed into insolvency before appellant sought relief, and he can not now be restored to his petition. (Olsen v. Bank, 67 Minn., 267; Turner v. Ins. Co., 65 Ga., 649; Howard v. Turner, 155 Pa., 858; Bissell v. Heath, 98 Mich., 472; Chuff v. Upton, 91 U. S., 685.)

The action is then to be treated as one to enforce the mortgage lien, with appellant presenting his plea of fraud and failure of consideration as a defense, with appellees pleading estoppel. We are of opinion clearly that appellant was defrauded when he purchased the stock. The shares were represented to him as being really worth above par, when in truth the corporation was then insolvent, and the stock worth nothing. It was pledging the notes received for stock to make good its overdrafts. It never had the stock that it was represented to have, and some stock that had been issued were given away, and of the true condition appellant knew absolutely nothing, and from an examination of the books of the company, if he had made such, he would have been unable to learn the true condition. The chief bookkeeper, and also the assignee, testified in this case, and neither could give the real condition of the company at any date. As an inducement to him to take this amount of stock and to lend color to the representations of the business and condition of the company, appellant was offered and given a position in the office at a salary of $150 per month, for services shown to have been worth not exceeding, at a liberal estimate, $50 per month.

This was a part of the scheme. So then, from the plain, undisputed facts shown herein, we conclude that the notes and mortgage were obtained by fraud and deceit, and if they were owned by the title company and suit was instituted by that company this plea would be a defense to their collection.

We conclude also that appellant is not estopped for pleading this fraud as a defense to the notes, from the mere fact that he was an employe in the office of the title company, and was for a time director therein, nor from the fact that he may have at some time offered these notes for sale to persons, others than these appellees, and who did not purchase such notes. There is no proof that appellant sold or recommended any of these notes to any of the holders thereof. However, appellant in presenting his defense seeks equity, and to obtain it must do equity.

As a part of the fraudulent transaction by which the notes and mortgage were obtained appellant was to be, and was, paid a salary in excess of the real value of his services, and was also to receive, and did obtain, a loan from the company with his stock deposited as collateral, and was afterwards credited with dividends of $300 as payment of interest, we are of opinion that appellant should be required to pay the salary received in excess of the value of his services, which excess we find to be $1,000; and also to pay the amount due on his loan of $600, which was nominally secured by pledge of shares of stock, but really secured by the notes and mortgage here in controversy. To this extent we are of opinion appellant has received consideration and benefit for the notes and mortgage. These sums should be adjudged to be due appellees pro rata on the amount of notes held by each, and to secure payment judgment of foreclosure may be had. The $300 credit as interest paid by dividend should be eliminated from the calculation as nothing was in fact paid.

For the reasons given the judgment appealed from is reversed and cause remanded for judgment consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

BAILEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Malicious cutting and wounding—Instructions—Appellant escaped from the Danville workhouse, where he had been confined for some time for some misdemeanor. C., who was deputy keeper of the workhouse, found him in Lexington, and attempted to arrest him without a warrant. Appellant drew a knife and attempted to cut C., but C. seized the hand in which appellant had the knife, and in this way his little finger was cut. At the same time appellant seized the hand in which C. had a pistol. Appellant was indicted, tried and convicted of the offense of malicious cutting and wounding (but from which cutting and wounding C. did not die) under section 1166, Kentucky Statutes. The jury fixed his punishment at two years' confinement in the penitentiary, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Errors in instructions are relied on for a reversal. Held—That the court erred in giving the fifth instruction, by not requiring the jury to believe the cutting and wounding was done with intent to kill before they could convict.

2. Arresting without warrant—Self-defense—The instruction on self-defense should have been amended by adding to it the statement that C., who was a peace officer of Boyle county, was not authorized to arrest appellant in Fayette county, who had committed only a misdemeanor, and that if he attempted to do so it was the privilege of appellant to resist such attempted arrest by the use of such force as was necessary, or reasonably appeared to appellant to be necessary, to preserve his liberty and no more, and to that end had the right to use force to repel force so far as same was necessary, or to the appellant in the exercise of a reasonable discretion appeared to be necessary, for his protection.

George Denny for appellant.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was tried and convicted under the charge of cutting and wounding Thomas Connelly with a knife with intent to kill him, and from which cutting he did not die. The jury fixed his punishment at two years' confinement in the penitentiary. In view of the conclusions at which we have arrived we will set forth all the evidence in the case, it being the testimony of three witnesses introduced by the Commonwealth, as follows: "Thomas Connelly: I live at Danville, Boyle county, and I am deputy workhouse keeper of Danville, Ky. On the — day of June I was in Lexington, Ky., and was looking for the defendant, Robert Bailey, who had escaped from the workhouse, in which he was confined, some months before. As I was going to the depot, at a grocery store, and when I looked at him and recognized him, he started away, and I followed him, and he went behind a meat block in the store and picked up a knife from the meat block, and tried to cut me, cutting a slit in my coat on the side; he then drew the knife back to cut me again, when I seized his hand with my left hand, and my little finger was cut by the knife, and at the same time, I had a pistol in my right hand and the defendant caught my right hand and was holding that; he tried to get his hand in which he had the knife loose from me, and I was trying to get my right hand in which I had my pistol loose from him, and that his left little finger was stiff from the cut and he exhibited the finger to the jury; that he had no warrant for defendant's arrest, and that his hand was not cut until he caught the hand of the defendant which held the knife."

"George St. Clair: He was present when the man, whose name was said to be Connelly, came, and when Connelly came in the defendant went rapidly to that part of the grocery where the meat was cut, and Connelly followed, and the defendant picked up the knife and Connelly seized the hand which held the knife, and it seemed to me that was how his hand was cut; that in catching the hand with the knife in it Connelly's hand was cut by his hand coming against the blade of the knife. Connelly had a pistol in his right hand, and the defendant was holding Connelly's right hand in which he held the pistol, and Connelly was holding defendant's right hand in which he held the knife; that it looked to him that Connelly's hand was cut by his hand going against the knife blade when he caught the defendant's hand."

"Chas. Leach: Went to Connelly when he was holding the defendant by the hand which held the knife and that part of Connelly's hand was against the blade of the knife; and that he took hold of the defendant, and that he tried to cut him (the witness), and that he and Connelly held the defendant until a policeman came and arrested him; that the defendant kept moving his hand in which he held the knife, as if he was trying to get it loose; that Connelly had a pistol in his right hand which the defendant was holding."

Upon this evidence the court instructed the jury first as to the felonious cutting, and then as to the cutting in sudden affray. The court gave to the jury the following instruction as to self-defense: "If the defendant did cut and wound Thomas Connelly with a knife, but at the time he did so the defendant believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he was then and there in danger of death or of suffering some serious bodily harm at the hands of said Connelly, and it was necessary, or to the defendant reasonably appeared to be necessary, to cut said Connelly to avert the danger, or what reasonably appeared to the defendant to be such danger, this was a cutting and wounding in self-defense. And if the defendant did cut and wound Thomas Connelly, yet the jury should find him not guilty unless they believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that said cutting and wounding was not done in self defense."

The fifth instruction given to the jury is as follows: "By cutting and wounding with a knife is meant the intentional infliction of a wound by one person upon another by cutting the person of such other with a knife. The defendant has not been proved guilty, even if a wound was inflicted upon the person of Thomas Connelly by defendant with a knife, unless such wound was so inflicted in the execution of a purpose on the part of the defendant to wound said Connelly by cutting his person with a knife."

We are of opinion that the fifth instruction should have followed the language of the statute, section 1166, Kentucky Statutes, in which it is provided: "If any person shall willfully and maliciously cut, strike or stab another with a knife, * * * with intention to kill, if the person so cut, stabbed or bruised die not thereby," etc.

The words "with intention to kill" are omitted from the instruction in this case, although that idea is contained in the first instruction given. But the court, in this instruction, is defining to the jury what constitutes the technical offense of cutting and wounding with a knife as covered by the law of this case, and the jury might have inferred, and doubtless did, that the intentional infliction of a wound by one person upon another, by cutting the person of such other with a knife, is all that was required to justify a conviction in this case.

In Head v. Commonwealth, 4 Ky. Law Rep., 824, it was held that it was not a felony to willfully and maliciously cut and wound another unless with intent to kill, and that omitting the words "with intent to kill" was reversible error.

The instructions of the court in all other respects are a clear and accurate exposition of the law, but we think the court should have added to the self-defense instruction given, under the circumstances of this case, the statement that Connelly was not authorized to arrest appellant, a mere misdemeanant, in Fayette county, Connelly being a peace officer of Boyle county only, and that if he attempted to do so, it was the privilege of appellant to resist such attempted arrest by the use of such force as was necessary, or reasonably appeared to appellant to be necessary, to preserve his liberty, and no more, and to that end had the right to use force to repel force so far as same was necessary, or to the appellant in the exercise of reasonable discretion appeared to be necessary, for his protection.

One making an assault with a knife with the intent to kill may be guilty under the statute in question of cutting and wounding such person assaulted with the intent to kill him, if the person so assaulted is wounded alone by grasping the weapon with which he is assaulted, and in attempting to defend himself from the assault, but where the one doing the cutting is assaulted with a deadly weapon undisputably, without warrant of law, and there is no conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances attending it, and in repelling such assault he uses a knife or other similar instrument, and his assailant is wounded by grasping such knife, the one doing the cutting under such circumstances is not necessarily, and does not appear in deed and in fact to be, guilty of this offense. It would rather appear, so far as he is concerned, to be an accidental cutting, or at least a justifiable one.

Judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

Illegal contracts—Conspiracy to violate law—R., who was operating a lottery in Cincinnati, O., as agent of S., came to appellant, who was operating another lottery in said city, and represented to appellant that in order to obtain immunity from the laws of Ohio it would be necessary for them to pay a large sum monthly to C., and that he agreed to pay to R. for this purpose $150 per month, and under said agreement he paid said monthly sums, which amounted in the aggregate to $16,075, no part of which R. paid to C., as agreed. Appellant instituted this action to recover said sum from R. The lower court sustained a demurrer to the petition and dismissed the petition, from which appellant prosecutes this appeal. Held—That the court properly dismissed the petition. Both parties clearly entered into a conspiracy or partnership for the purpose of enabling them to violate the laws of the State of Ohio, and to corrupt or bribe the officers of the law. The transaction set up in the petition must be treated as the formation of a partnership for an illegal purpose, greatly to be condemned from any standpoint. A corruption of the authorities of a great State or city should not be tolerated. The payment of money to defeat the enforcement of the criminal laws is one of the most heinous of crimes, and no court should afford any relief to the parties engaged in such a nefarious business. The operation of lotteries is, by common consent, regarded as contrary to public policy and highly immoral, and plaintiff has added to that unholy business a still greater crime of bribing public officers, and paying money to prevent the enforcement of the criminal laws of a sister State. Both parties, according to the petition, are guilty of a great crime, and the courts should not hear the complaints of either in respect to the illegal business conducted by them.

H. P. Whitaker and M. M. Durrett for appellant.

Harvey Myers for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Kenton Circuit Court in the suit of the appellant against the appellees. The court having sustained a demurrer to the petition as amended, and appellant failing to plead further, his action was dismissed. The sole question presented for decision is whether the petition, as amended, stated a cause of action, or, in other words, whether upon appellant's own showing he was entitled to relief from a court of equity. So much of the petition as is material to plaintiff's cause of action reads as follows:

"2d. Now comes W. B. Smith, the plaintiff, and for his amended petition herein states: That on and before the — day of May, 1890, the defendant, M. J. Richmond, represented to this plaintiff that he, the said Richmond, was the employe and agent of S. T. Dickinson & Co., and their associates, who then were operating and carrying on a lottery business in the city of Cincinnati, O., under the charters of what were known and designated as the Kentucky State Lotteries; that one Louis Davis, since deceased, was at said time and thereafter operating and carrying on a lottery business in said city by permission of the said S. T. Dickinson & Co., and their associates, and of this plaintiff; that this plaintiff was at said time and thereafter operating and carrying on a lottery business in said city as the sole owner of the Colorado State Lottery, for which he had obtained a charter from the State of Colorado; that at said time the said defendant, M. J. Richmond, approached this plaintiff and represented to him that it would be necessary for plaintiff and the said lottery companies represented by said defendant to pay one George B. Cox, a citizen and resident of said city, certain sums of money in order to procure immunity from arrest and prosecution by the State and municipal authorities of the State of Ohio and said city, for operating and carrying on said lottery business aforesaid; that shortly after said representations so made as aforesaid by Richmond to this plaintiff, to wit, on or about the — day of May, 1890, a meeting was held in the city of Cincinnati at which plaintiff, said Richmond, acting in his capacity of employe and agent as aforesaid, and Louis Davis were present; and it was then and there agreed that plaintiff should pay $150 per month, the companies represented by said Richmond should pay $150 per month, and said Davis should pay $50 per month to said Cox for the purpose aforesaid; and it was further agreed by and between the parties at said meeting that the several sums above mentioned should be delivered to said Richmond, to be paid by him to said Cox for the said purposes, and this the said Richmond agreed to do. Plaintiff further states that pursuant to said agreement he did deliver to said Richmond in each and every month from May, 1890, to April, 1892, both inclusive, the sum of $150, and that pursuant to said agreement, and on the representation to this plaintiff by said Richmond that it was necessary for plaintiff to pay to said Cox for the purpose aforesaid a further sum of $75 per month, plaintiff did deliver to said Richmond in each and every month from May, 1892, to April, 1895, both inclusive, the sum of $225; and that pursuant to said agreement this plaintiff did deliver to said Richmond in each and every month from May, 1895, to May, 1897, both inclusive, the sum of $175, making a total sum of money so delivered to said Richmond to be paid to said Cox for the purpose aforesaid of $16,075. Plaintiff further states that said defendant, M. J. Richmond, failed to pay said sum of money, or any part thereof, to said Cox, and fraudulently converted the same, and all of it, to his own use, and refuses to return said money, or any part thereof, to this plaintiff although plaintiff has demanded same. Plaintiff reiterates herein each and every allegation of his original and first amended petition, and makes same part hereof."

We copy the opinion of the court below as one of the means of making a clear statement of the contentions of the parties hereto: "The cause is submitted on demurrer to petition as amended. There are some depositions taken on behalf of plaintiff in the record, but they are not read or considered on this motion. There is no ascertainment of the facts, and the allegations of the petition as amended are taken as true only for the purpose of this demurrer. The facts so taken as true are as follows: On the year 1890, or prior thereto, the plaintiff, Smith, was engaged in the business of conducting a lottery in the city of Cincinnati, O. S. T. Dickinson & Co. were at the same time engaged in the same business in the same city. M. J. Richmond, defendant hereto, was the employe and agent of said Dickinson & Co. One Lewis Davis was also conducting the same business at same time and place. The plaintiff, Smith, and said Davis and said Richmond representing said Dickinson & Co., held a meeting, at which it was agreed that the several parties engaged in said business should each month pay to said Richmond a certain sum of money to be applied by said Richmond in bribing and corrupting the authorities of the State of Ohio and of the city of Cincinnati, to thereby procure immunity for those engaged in said business. The said Smith, pursuant to said agreement, paid to said Richmond from May, 1890, to May, 1897, the sum of $16,075, but the said Richmond, instead of using said money in the bribery of Ohio officials (assuming for the purposes of this demurrer that such a thing were possible), retained the money and converted it to his own use.

"This action is instituted by Smith to recover of Richmond said sum of $16,075, and on demurrer to the petition as amended the question arises as to whether the law and the courts will furnish relief to one occupying the position held by the plaintiff, Smith. This action is in equity. It is contended by the defendant on this demurrer that where the consideration of a contract is an agreement to hinder, impede or defeat the administration of the criminal or penal laws, the contract is against public policy, is void and that no party thereto can enforce it by process of law.

"The plaintiff, on this demurrer, admits the existence of this principle contended for by defendant, but says it applies only as between the parties to such a contract, and does not apply as between one of the parties, and his agent, or the agent of all the parties, acting as go between in carrying out the vicious provisions of the contract. The plaintiff quotes and relies upon the opinion of the Kentucky Court of Appeals in case of Martin v. Richardson, 94 Ky., 183. Martin was the agent of a lottery company. He sold to Richardson some tickets in his lottery, one of which drew a prize, and while Richardson was ignorant of this fact Martin induced him to exchange the tickets he held for other tickets, and Martin collected the prize from the lottery company. Richardson sued Martin for the money and the Court of Appeals held that he could recover; that even assuming the purchase and sale of the lottery tickets to have been an illegal transaction, Richardson could not avail himself of that fact as a defense. It seems to me that it would have been strange had the Court of Appeals held otherwise. The purchase and sale of the lottery tickets constituted a transaction that was at most illegal. The act of Martin in procuring an exchange of the tickets was a crime. The Court of Appeals simply refused to permit the commission of an act, at most illegal, by one 'to be plead as a defense to the commission of a crime by another.' It refused to permit the commission of a lesser wrong by one to be used as a defense to the commission of a greater crime by another. This opinion in that case is not applicable to the case at bar.

"The plaintiff quotes and relies upon Wharton on Agency, and the opinion of several State courts, from which it may be assumed to be the rule that an agent who has in his hands money belonging to his principal on a closed account can not set up as a defense in an action by the principal for money had and received the illegality of whole or a part of the transaction. In all the extracts from these authorities quoted in brief for plaintiff the word 'illegal' is used in speaking of the contract. Plaintiff's counsel has not provided this court with the facts of any of the cases he has referred to. The only reference made in any of the extracts set out in plaintiff's brief is to 'illegal' contracts. It appears certain that if Smith had furnished this money to Richmond as his agent for the purpose of conducting a lottery, and that Richmond retained and converted the money, Smith could recover of him, even in a State where the conducting of a lottery was unlawful. But in the case at bar the plaintiff was, for seven years, continuously engaged, not only in conducting an unlawful business, but in attempting, and as he believes successfully attempting, to bribe and corrupt the authorities of Ohio and Cincinnati, and to that end he delivered to Richmond over $16,000. For the seven years this plaintiff was engaged in the commission of an act that this court may fairly assume to be a crime in the State of Ohio, the place of its commission, counsel for plaintiff has not furnished this court a single instance in which any court has given relief to one in such a position as against a defaulting agent. I believe there is a broad distinction between contracts illegal and contracts criminal, even when considered in reference only to the relations and respective rights of one of the parties thereto and his agent. This plaintiff is asking the law and the courts of Kentucky to aid him in recovering back money that he paid out for seven years, believing it was being used in the bribery of the authorities of a sister State. This does not seem to be the purpose for which the courts of this State are created or are existing. It is but rarely that such an unblushing confession is seen as in the plaintiff's pleadings in this case. It may be observed that Richmond in putting this money in his pocket and keeping it there, although in so doing he defaulted, was guilty of an offense much less than that he would have been guilty of had he carried out the purposes of his principal. In this connection the fact is emphasized that as to Richmond there is no evidence that these things are true, and that they are assumed to be true solely for the purpose of this demurrer. It appears by his own pleading that the hands of Smith are so unclean that he is not entitled to ask any relief in any court, and the demurrer to the petition as amended is sustained. The plaintiff declines to plead further, the petition herein is dismissed, and it is adjudged that the defendant recover of the plaintiff his costs herein, to which plaintiff excepts, and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted."

It is evident from the pleadings of the appellant that he, the appellee, Richmond, and Davis were engaged in operating lotteries in the city of Cincinnati, which was a violation of the criminal laws of the State; that in order to procure immunity from arrest and punishment, or, in other words, to corrupt the officers and to defeat justice, they made the agreement set out in the petition, and Richmond was to receive and pay over the money to procure the desired immunity from arrest and prosecution; and that the business was so conducted for about seven years, during which time the sum, aggregating $16,075, was paid over to Richmond. It may be inferred from the petition that the desired protection was secured, as it is nowhere claimed that the object of the agreement was defeated.

Appellant refers to a number of decisions of this and other courts in his two able briefs, which, he claims, sustain his contention in this case. Upon examination of the various cases it will be found that they cover what may be called three classes of cases. One is where a party simply employs a man as agent to go and pay money to a third party for an illegal purpose; another class is where a party may be engaged in an illegal business, and have realized considerable pecuniary profit, in the shape of money or other property, which is in possession of the other party to the crime, in which case some courts hold that such party has in his hands money or property which justly belongs to the other parties; and although it is the fruit of illegal business, yet he will not be allowed to have the same simply because the business which procured the property is illegal. The other class is where employees, who are simply the servants employed to carry on and conduct an illegal business, will not be permitted to withhold from the owner property which was placed in their hands by him for the purpose of conducting or carrying on such illegal business.

The case at bar does not fall within the rule announced in any of the cases referred to. In this case these parties clearly entered into a conspiracy or partnership for the purpose of enabling them to violate the laws of the State of Ohio, and to corrupt or bribe the officers of the law. These parties were in reality partners in the venture or undertaking specified, and in the general course of business, be it legal or illegal, one of the parties only would handle the money or pay out at a time. In other words, all the parties would not be expected to go together and pay out or receive money together, but the act of one is the act of all. We conclude, therefore, that the transaction set up in the petition must be treated as the formation of a partnership for an illegal purpose greatly to be condemned from any standpoint. A corruption of the authorities of a great State or city should not be tolerated. The payment of money to defeat the enforcement of the criminal laws is one of the most heinous of crimes, and no court should afford any relief to the parties engaged in such a nefarious business. The operation of lotteries is by common consent regarded as contrary to public policy, and highly immoral, and this plaintiff has added to that unholy business a still greater crime of bribing public officers and paying money to prevent the enforcement of the criminal laws of a sister State. Both parties, according to the petition, are guilty of a great crime, and the court should not hear the complaints of either in respect to the illegal business conducted by them. To allow such would in effect be to wink at, if not to sanction, the most corrupt of practices. We think the opinion of the court below is in accord with nearly all, if not quite all, the authorities respecting such transactions, and in accord with the principles announced in the recent case of Central Trust and Deposit Co. v. Respass, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1905.

To allow the appellant to recover in this case would in effect be saying to all parties that you can go on with reasonable safety, furnish money to a person for illegal and criminal purposes, and after you have derived the benefit therefrom, sue the so-called agent and recover back the money, unless he, perchance, was able to prove to the satisfaction of the court that he in like manner had paid over the money for the said unlawful purposes. As before stated, we do not think that Richmond was the agent of plaintiff in the legal sense of agency, but was simply one of the partners in crime; and we know of no court that has ever sustained a suit of one partner for an accounting the money invested in an unlawful purpose, especially if such purpose was to violate the criminal laws of a State and shield offenders from punishment, or corrupt public officers.

Judgment affirmed.

Whole court considered this case.

MORTON'S EX'OR v. TRUSTEES OF THE CHURCH HOME FOR FEMALES AND INFIRMARY FOR THE SICK.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Legacies—Interest—A testator left to appellee a legacy of $60,000 upon the death of his wife, to whom he had devised the income of his estate for her life. The widow renounced the provisions of the will and thus precipitated the payment of the legacy to appellee, and the court decided that same become due October 15, 1892, and the question involved on this appeal is the method of computing interest on said legacy from the date it was due. Held—That under section 2065, Kentucky Statutes, a legacy shall carry interest after it is due, and the proper method is to calculate the interest as on other debts, applying payments first to the satisfaction of the interest due.

Barnett & Barnett for appellant.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

John P. Morton devised the net income of his estate to his wife for her life. Upon her death, and in certain contingencies named and not necessary to be here enumerated, he gave to appellee the sum of $60,000. Mrs. Morton renounced the will. Appellee claimed its bequest was then due. On a former appeal (99 Ky., 819) it was held that the effect of the widow's renunciation of the will was to precipitate the maturity of legacies that were by the will postponed till her death. In that opinion it was held that the bequest to appellee was due October 15, 1892.

The executors paid appellees in installments from time to time, finally extinguishing the claim in December, 1897. The trial court held that these partial payments should be applied first to the payment of interest accrued on the principal sum, and then to the principal. Appellants insist that the legacy was not a debt, and consequently the statute, section 2219, subsection 3, as follows: "Partial payments on a debt bearing interest should be first applied to the deduction of the interest then due," does not apply; but that the $60,000 should be counted at 6 per cent. per annum interest from October 15, 1892, till December 1, 1897, aggregating $78,890; that the partial payments made by the executors to appellee should be counted at the same rate of interest from the date they were respectively made, to December 1, 1897, by which it is claimed for appellants they paid $1,891.88 in excess of the $78,890.

The theory is advanced that the trustees "borrowed" from the estate of Morton the sums represented by these partial payments till the time when the whole legacy became satisfied. It is not claimed that any such arrangement was in fact entered into between these litigants, or contemplated by them. The fiction is adopted to effect the avoidance of the usual customary application of the rule declared by the statute, supra, concerning the application of partial payments to an interest-bearing demand.

Although the statute uses the word "debt," in our opinion it was intended to include every interest-bearing obligation or demand. When this bequest became due, that is collectible by appellees from appellants, so far as its interest-bearing quality was concerned it was a debt. The estate had and enjoyed for those years a large sum of money which this court has held was due to appellees. It is right in law and conscience, therefore, that the estate should pay for the use of money which it properly should have paid to appellees October 15, 1892. Besides, Kentucky Statutes, section 2065, provides that specific legacies shall carry interest after due. There is no good reason presented, or to us apparent, why the ordinary rule, the one stated in the statute, and applied by the circuit court, is not applicable to this case.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. HART, JR., BY, & CO.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—A section boss on appellant's road, with a crew of hands and a train of cars, were engaged in ditching in a cut, and in order to prevent a train dashing into his train, placed on the track a torpedo to give warning of its approach. The torpedo was placed on the track at a point which was not used as a walk-way, and was not frequented by persons not employed by appellant. While the hands were engaged at work appellee and another boy climbed onto the track and found the torpedo, and appellee loosened it from the rail and carried it home, where he exploded it and a piece of gravel flew into his eye, injuring it so that the eye had to be removed. This action for damages was brought, and a recovery of $1,000 was awarded to appellee. Held—That the court should have given a peremptory instruction to find for appellant. It was not negligence to place the torpedo on the track as it was placed. The use was a proper one. The torpedo was properly in use at the time of its removal from the track. No greater safeguards could have been adopted than were adopted.

John S. Kelley and Edward W. Hines for appellant.

Nat W. Halstead and Morgan Yewell for appellees.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court

The road of appellant railroad company, a short distance from the station at Bardstown, passes over what is, in that neighborhood, called the "little trestle," which is about 180 feet long and 29 feet high at the highest point. Some distance further away from the station what is known as the "big trestle" passes over the Bloomfield pike, being about 71 feet high at the highest point and nearly 600 feet long. Still further away from the station the road passes through a long cut and makes a sharp curve. The ground along this part of the road is very rough and uneven. The right of way is fenced in and protected by barbed-wire fences, and cattle gaps and sign boards are placed conspicuously, warning trespassers. There is no highway except the highway of the railroad, and, while the greater part of this part of the railroad right of way is within the corporate limits of Bardstown, there is no showing that it is used as a passway from one part of the town to another. Everything that could reasonably be expected seems to have been done to prevent people going upon this unusually dangerous part of the right of way. Nevertheless it appears that, possibly from the very fact that the surface of the ground is broken and irregular, and that there are warnings against trespassing thereon, young people did go there from time to time and use the right of way as a walk for pleasure. There is no evidence to show that the railroad company consented in any way to this use. On the contrary, all the testimony indicates that the company endeavored to prevent it.

In October, 1899, the section boss having occasion to do some ditching in the cut before mentioned, placed a torpedo on the track between the trestles and a signal flag. The torpedo was flattened metallic shell, from an inch and a half to two inches in diameter, charged with explosive, and having flexible metallic arms, to be bent around the top of the T-rail so as to hold it in position until it should be exploded by the impact of the wheels. The object of thus placing the torpedo was to give warning to the engineer of the expected train, in the event the signal flag should fail to attract his attention. These torpedoes, when exploded, make a loud report, like the report of a gun, the great object of their construction being to make a noise when exploded. When the section boss and his gang quit work for dinner they took up the flag and torpedo, replacing them when they returned to work.

On the afternoon of that day two little boys, about eight years of age, went down the bluff to the Bloomfield pike, went out the pike to the big trestle, climbed the hill and went upon the track, along which they walked to and across the little trestle, when they turned and retraced their steps. On the way back one of them saw the torpedo, detached it from the rail and gave it to his companion. They then went back by the same way over which they came, until they were nearly at home, when they separated. The boy who had the torpedo went out the pike again, and some unknown fool whom he met on the pike seems to have told him that if he would hit the torpedo with a hammer a gold dollar would fly out of it. He then went to his own home, procured a hatchet from the kitchen, and in company with his brother and the appellee, who was a child under six years of age, pounded the torpedo until it exploded. A piece of gravel was thrown into the appellee's eye, destroying the sight and necessitating the removal of the eye.

Suit was thereupon brought against the appellant railroad company and a trial had, resulting in a judgment and verdict for $1,000, from which this appeal is taken. It is unnecessary to follow counsel through the various questions which have been elaborately argued in this case. It is perfectly evident from the testimony that if there is any place on the road where it is proper to use such a contrivance, it was proper at the point at which it was used. The place was out of the way of ordinary travel, was in itself a dangerous place, and was protected and safe-guarded to as great an extent as could possibly be done. There is no question that if the use of such a contrivance was proper at this point, it was proper to use it for the purpose for which it was used on this occasion, to wit, to warn the engineer of the expected train that there were workmen upon the track who might be injured unless the train was stopped. We think, therefore, that it was not negligence to place the torpedo as it is shown by the record in this case to have been placed. The use was a proper one. The torpedo was properly in use at the time of its removal from the track. No greater safeguards could have been adopted than were adopted. It is, therefore, readily distinguishable from those cases where explosives were carelessly stored when not in use, and from the turn-table cases, where the injury took place when the appliance was left carelessly unsecured when not in use.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the argument upon the question whether there was an intervening cause for the accident.

The peremptory instruction should have been given, and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to award appellant a new trial and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

DAVIS' ADM'R v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO., &c.

Corporations of other States becoming corporations of this State—Constitutional law—Removal of actions to Federal courts—This action was brought against appellee to recover damages for injuries resulting in the death of appellant's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellee, its agents and servants, in the operation of its train of cars in Lewis county. The petition alleges that pursuant to section 211 of Constitution and section 841, Kentucky Statutes, the appellee became a corporation, citizen and resident of this State, by filing in the office of the secretary of state and in the office of the railroad commission copies of the charters or articles of incorporation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., organized under the laws of Virginia and West Virginia, authenticated by its seal and by the attestation of its president and secretary, by virtue whereof said company at once became, and is now, a corporation, citizen and resident of this State, and that thereupon a certificate of said incorporation was issued to appellee by the secretary of state. At the succeeding term of the court appellee filed its petition and bond for the removal of the action to the United Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, upon the allegation that it was and always had been a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of Virginia. The lower court ordered a removal of the action, from which order this appeal is prosecuted. The sole question presented on this appeal is whether or not appellee, having complied with the requirements of the Constitution and statutes above referred to, has become a resident corporation, which would prevent a removal of the action to the Federal court. Held—That by compliance with the provisions of section 841, Kentucky Statutes, there was created and organized a railroad corporation, the appellee herein; that corporation so created and organized is a citizen and resident of this State, and as this domestic corporation was made defendant in the original petition, there existed no grounds to authorize a removal to the United States Circuit Court. Both the plaintiff and defendant were citizens and residents of this State. The authority acquired by the appellee was not a mere license to carry on its business in this State. The whole question is one of legislative intent, and there can be no question as to the intention to create a corporation when section 841 is complied with.

A. E. Cole & Son for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and E. L. Worthington for appellees.

Appeal from Lewis Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

This is an action for damages for the death of Henrietta Davis, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellee, its agents and servants, in the operation of a train of cars in Lewis county.

The petition was filed September 18, 1901, and summons was served September 19, 1901. The January term, 1902, was the appearance term, at which the defendant was required to answer. On October 5, 1901, an amended petition was filed, making Wm. Lewis, the engineer, Bracken, conductor, and Henry Inskip, brakeman, all alleged to have been in charge of the train that killed Henrietta Davis, parties defendant. In due time, at the January term, 1902, the appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., filed its petition and bond for removal of the action to the United States Circuit for the Eastern District of Kentucky, upon the allegation that it was, and had always been, a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the State of Virginia, and upon the allegation that no such person as Lewis, Bracken and Inskip, or either of them, were on the train, or in charge of the train, that killed Henrietta Davis, and the amendment making such persons parties defendants was done for the fraudulent purpose, if possible, to defeat a removal to the United States Court.

The appellant offered to file a second amendment making the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co. a party defendant, which the court refused to permit. The cause was then, on appellee's motion, ordered removed to the United States Circuit Court, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted.

The original petition filed herein describes appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., as a corporation of this State, and pleads in these words: "Plaintiff states that on the — day of December, 1898, pursuant to section 211 of the Constitution of Kentucky, and section 841, Kentucky Statutes, the defendant, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., became a corporation, citizen and resident of this State by filing in the office of the secretary of state, and in the office of the railroad commission, copies of the charters or articles of incorporation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., organized under the laws of Virginia and West Virginia, authenticated by its seal and by the attestation of its president and secretary, by virtue whereof said company at once became, and is now, a corporation, citizen and resident of this State, and that thereupon a certificate of said incorporation was issued to defendant by the secretary of state."

In the petition for removal the allegation is made that the defendant was, at the time of the filing of this suit, a corporation created, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Virginia, and of no other State. The facts pleaded by plaintiff as to compliance with section 841, Kentucky Statutes, by filing copies of the charter, etc., are not denied or in any way put in issue. The legal question presented on the petition for removal then is whether a compliance with the provisions of section 841 of Kentucky Statutes and section 211 of the Constitution created a corporation in this State, so that it was then a citizen and resident herein.

Section 211 of the Constitution provides: "No railroad corporation organized under the laws of any other State, or of the United States, and doing business, or proposing to do business, in this State, shall be entitled to the benefit of the right of eminent domain, or have power to acquire the right of way or real estate for depot or other uses until it shall have become a body-corporate pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of this Commonwealth."

Section 841 of Kentucky Statutes provides: "No company, association or corporation created by or organized under the laws or authority of any State or country other than this State shall possess, control, maintain, or operate any railway, or part thereof, in this State until, by incorporation under the laws of this State, the same shall have become a corporation, citizen and resident of this State. Any such company, association or corporation may, for the purpose of possession, controlling, maintaining or operating a railway, or part thereof, in this State, become a corporation, citizen and resident of this State by being incorporated in the manner following, namely: By filing in the office of the secretary of state, and in the office of the railroad commission, a copy of the charter or articles of incorporation of such company, association or corporation, authenticated by its seal and by the attestation of its president and secretary, and thereupon, by virtue thereof, such company, association or corporation shall at once become, and be, a corporation, citizen and resident of this State. The secretary of state shall issue to such corporation a certificate of such incorporation."

The allegations of the original petition of appellant are that all these provisions of the law were complied with, and that a certificate of incorporation was issued by the secretary of state, and the defendant is sued as a Kentucky corporation. It is quite clear from the statute quoted that the legislature intended that the foreign railroad company should become a corporation of this State, and then an easy and convenient means of so doing was provided. Having complied with the provisions of that law and become, so far as that law can or does create, a corporation, citizen and resident of this State, the question is presented, has the original or first corporation the right to remove suits brought against the alleged Kentucky corporation upon the allegation of diverse citizenship? If in this case there are two corporations, although of the same name, it is clear that the foreign corporation can not remove, for it is not made a party, but if there be only one corporation, and that a Virginia corporation, the right of removal would not be defeated by an allegation that defendant was a corporation, citizen and resident of this State.

This is a question of law that was properly presented by the original petition and the petition for removal, and upon hearing the lower court necessarily held that there was but one corporation, and that one was created by and organized under and by virtue of the laws of Virginia. This question is one of great importance to the State and the public as well as the parties hereto, and it seems has never been decided by this court. In some form or other this question has been presented to the United States Supreme Court and to the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, and to the circuit courts under various statutes of the different States, and has been decided.

In the Supreme Court, in the case of Gerling v. Railroad Co., 151 U. S., 673, Mr. Justice Gray classified the different states of case on which removal depended thus: "A railroad corporation created by the laws of one State may carry on business in another by virtue of being created a corporation by the laws of the latter State; also, as in Railway Co. v. Vance, 93 U. S., 450; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S., 581; Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S., 436; Stone v. Trust Co., 116 U. S., 307, and Graham v. Railroad Co., 118 U. S., 161, or by virtue of a license, permission or authority granted by the laws of the latter State to act in that State under its charter from the former State. (Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall., 65; Railroad Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S., 5; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. L. & T. H. R. Co., 118 U. S., 290; Mare v. Railroad Co., 127 U. S., 117.) In the first alternative it can not remove into the circuit court of the United States a suit brought against it in a court of the latter State by a citizen of that State, because it is a citizen of the same State with him. (Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, above cited.) In the second alternative, it can remove a suit because it is a citizen of a different State from the plaintiff." (Railroad Co. v. Koontz, above cited.)

To which of these two classes does this case belong? Was the foreign railroad corporation licensed, permitted and authorized to do business in this State under its foreign charter? Or was a new corporation created by the law (section 841) and compliance therewith by the appellee? It is clear from the section of the Constitution, and the wording of the act itself, that the legislative intent was to create a new corporation, that would be a citizen and a resident of this State, and be in fact a Kentucky corporation. We say there can be no doubt that such was the intention of the act, but the inquiry arises, does the law accomplish what the legislators had in mind to do?

In 1889 the legislature of Georgia passed an act providing for a releasing of the Western & Atlantic Railroad and for its operation by the lessee. That act, passed November 12, 1889, provided, among other things, as follows: * * * "The persons, associations or corporations accepted as lessees under this act, if not already a corporation created under the laws of Georgia, shall from the time of such acceptance, and until after the final adjustment of all matters springing out of this lease contract, become a body-politic and corporate under the laws of this State, under the name and style of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Co., which body-corporate shall be operated only from the time of their taking possession of said road as lessees; and it shall have the power to sue and be sued," etc.

The Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad Co., a Tennessee corporation, became the lessees under the act and the question coming before the Supreme Court of Georgia (16 S. E. Rep., 347), that court held that the act of 1889 created a new corporation in the State of Georgia, known as Western & Atlantic Railroad Co., and that for an injury in Georgia, an action would not lie against the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railroad Co., but should be against the home corporation, viz., Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. The same question as to whether the act of 1889 of Georgia created a new corporation, came before the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, before J. J. Taft, Lurton and Barr, district judge in the case of Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v. Roberson, 61 Fed., 592. It was there held that the act of Georgia created a corporation, and an action might be maintained in the United States Court in Tennessee by a citizen of Tennessee for an injury done in that State, because there was diverse citizenship shown.

In Railroad Co. v. Vance, 96 U. S., 450, the facts appear to be that the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Co. was an Indiana corporation, and leased the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad, which was an Illinois corporation.

The legislature of Illinois passed an act confirming and ratifying the lease. The act provides: "The said lessees, their associates, successors and assigns, shall be a railroad corporation in this State, under the said style of 'The Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Co.,' and shall possess the same, or as large, powers as are possessed by said lessor corporation, and such other powers as are usual to railroad corporations."

The Supreme Court, by Mr. Justice Harlan, said: "The Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Co., as lessee of the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Co., was thus created by apt words, a corporation in Illinois. The fact that it bears the same name as that given to the company incorporated by Indiana can not change the fact that it is a distinct corporation, having a separate existence, derived from the legislation of another State."

In an action between these two railroad corporations, styled St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Co. v. The Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Co., before the circuit court, 9 Bissel, 144, and styled Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Co., in the Supreme Court, 118 U. S., 290, a question of jurisdiction was presented depending on whether the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Co. was a corporation of Indiana.

The Supreme Court, by Mr. Justice Miller, said: "It does not seem to admit of question that a corporation of one State, owning the property and doing business in another State by permission of the latter, does not thereby become a citizen of this State also. And so a corporation of Illinois, authorized by its laws to build a railroad across the State from the Mississippi river to its Eastern boundary, may by the permission of the State of Indiana extend its road a few miles within the limits of the latter, or, indeed, through the entire State, and may use and operate the line as one road by permission of the State, without thereby becoming a corporation or a citizen of the State of Indiana. Nor does it seem to us that an act of the legislature conferring upon this corporation of Illinois, by its Illinois corporate name, such powers to enable it to use and control that part of the road within the State of Indiana as have been conferred on it by the State which created it, constitutes it a corporation of Indiana. It may not be easy in all such cases to distinguish between the purpose to create a new corporation which shall owe its existence to the law or statute under consideration, and the intent to enable the corporation already in existence under the laws of another State to exercise its functions in the State where it is so received. The latter class of laws are common in authorizing insurance companies, banking companies and others to do business in other States than those which have chartered them. To make such a company a corporation of another State, the language used must imply creation or adoption in such form as to confer the power usually exercised over corporations by the State, or by the legislature, and such allegiance as a State corporation owes to its creator. The mere grant of privileges or powers to it as an existing corporation, without more, does not do this, and does not make it a citizen of the State conferring such powers.

In a case where the corporation already exists, even if adopted by the law of another State and invested with full corporate powers, it does not thereby become such new corporation of another State until it does some act which signifies its acceptance of this legislation and its purpose to be governed by it." We think what has occurred between the State of Indiana and the Illinois corporation falls short of that."

The same court, but a few days later, decided the case of Graham v. Railroad Co., 118 U. S., 161, and by Mr. Justice Blatchford said, page 167: "This act (of New York) professes in its title to be an act to consolidate the three companies. It authorizes the sale to the Boston, Hartford & Erie Co. of the franchises and property of the other two corporations (which were New York corporations), and provide that such sale shall pass the title to such franchises and property, and that such purchasing company shall thereby 'become possessed of the rights of charter and property sold,' and thereafter have, hold and use the same in its 'own name and right.' As a purchaser of what this act authorized to be sold to it, the company purchasing became a New York corporation, by its then existing name."

Following the doctrine announced in these cases, and they have not been overruled, we are of opinion that by compliance with the provisions of section 841, Kentucky Statutes, there was created and organized a railroad corporation, the appellee herein. That corporation, so created and organized, is a citizen and resident of this State, and as this domestic corporation was made defendant in the original petition there existed no grounds to authorize a removal to the United States Circuit Court. Both the plaintiff and the defendant were citizens and residents of this State. We recognize the distinction between license and authority granted to a foreign corporation to do business here and an incorporation as provided in section 841.

In the case of the Commonwealth v. M. & O. Railroad Co., 23 Ky. Law

Rep., 784, there were presented facts showing a license to that corporation to do business in this State under its foreign charter, by act of the legislature of this State in February, 1848. That company was indicted in the Carlisle Circuit Court under section 842 for a failure to comply with the provisions of section 841, and for operating a railroad without such compliance. The court held that under the act of 1848 there was a grant of license or authority to the railroad company to do business and acquire property in this State as a foreign corporation, and, therefore, it could not be compelled to incorporate here or to do anything additional than had been required under the act of 1848.

The court said, per O'Rear, J.: "If section 841 is applied to appellee, it will be required, in order to continue the use and enjoyment of the privileges granted to it in 1848, to do something in addition to that required by terms of the grant. It will be compelled to take up the burdens of a citizenship which it has not hitherto had to bear, and deprive itself of privileges deemed by many, or all similarly situated, to be of considerable pecuniary value."

The court had in that opinion previously said: "One of the advantages now thought to pertain to its nonresidency is the privilege of claiming the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in certain actions."

It will thus be seen that the difference between a grant of license and authority to a foreign railroad company to do business in this State and an incorporation under section 841 of Kentucky Statutes has been recognized by this court.

In the argument of that case learned counsel for the railroad company conceded that the effect of a compliance with section 841 was to create a corporation by and under authority of the laws of this State. The opinion so holds, and that holding was necessary to reach the conclusion therein expressed. If a compliance with section 841 was merely formal, a police regulation, and affected no change in status, or of substantial right, the railroad corporation might have been required to comply therewith, and for a failure to do so been subjected to the penalties of section 842. But as the court held that a compliance with section 841 made a material change in the position of the railroad and required it to surrender a valuable right, that of claiming the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in certain cases, the court held it could not be required to comply with section 841 because of its contract created by the acceptance of the grant of 1848. But it is said by learned counsel for appellee that the cases of Railroad v. James, 161 U. S., 545, and Louisville, & Co., R. R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 174 U. S., 552, hold that by compliance with section 841 the company so complying does not become a domestic corporation of this State.

In our opinion neither of the cases go to the extent claimed by counsel. The case of Railroad v. James was an action by a citizen of the State of Missouri against the railroad for an injury done in the State of Missouri and brought in the Federal court. The allegation of the petition was that the railroad corporation was a corporation of the State of Arkansas. By answer it was denied that the defendant was a corporation of Arkansas, and the allegation was made that it was a corporation of Missouri. This plea presented a question of jurisdiction in the United States Circuit Court.

We confess there are utterances in that opinion that would go to the extent of holding that a corporation already in existence can not be reincorporated by another State, but that persons must always be named as corporators. Yet we find in the opinion the following: "It is competent for a railroad corporation organized under the laws of one State, when authorized to do so by consent of the State which created it, to accept authority from another State to extend its railroad into such State and to receive a grant of powers to own and control, by lease or purchase, railroads therein, and to subject itself to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the second State. * * * Such corporations may be treated by each of the States whose legislative grant they accept as domestic corporations."

Again, at page 565, the court said: "But whatever may be the effect of such legislation in the way of subjecting foreign railroad companies to control and regulation by the local laws of Arkansas, we can not concede that it availed to create an Arkansas corporation out of a foreign corporation in such a sense as to make it a citizen of Arkansas within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, so as to subject it as such to a suit by a citizen of the State of its origin. In order to bring such an artificial body as a corporation within the spirit and letter of that Constitution, as construed by the decisions of this court, it would be necessary to create it out of natural persons, whose citizenship of the State creating it could be imputed to the corporation itself."

By this we understand the court to mean that the legislature by the laws of one State can not, out of a corporation already in existence in some foreign State, make a corporation, but that to create this artificial body there must be used in its creation some natural persons. Most assuredly that is true. The legislature of this State can not, by any sort of enactment, remove an artificial body, created solely by reason of the law of some other State, out of the State of its creation into this State, and likewise, if the corporation has been created once by the law of any State, that corporation can not be created by our law. It can not be recreated, because it has an existence. It can not migrate because the laws of the State which created it can not have force beyond the territorial boundary of such State. But that opinion does not deny the right of any State to create a corporation having the same name and powers and composed of the same stockholders of a corporation existing in another State. Indeed it is expressly said this may be done if persons are used to form the corporation. So far as we are advised it is always necessary to use natural persons to organize a corporation. Such we understand to be the meaning of section 841. The stockholders and persons composing the foreign railroad corporation, company or association shall organize into a domestic corporation before they can own, control or operate a railroad.

This corporation so organized and created is a citizen and resident of this State. For convenience in organization and to save expense these stockholders and persons are permitted, instead of complying with our general statute as to the organization of railroad companies, to file the copies of their articles of incorporation or charter granted them, properly identified as such by the certificate of the president and secretary of the company. When this is done, by the very words of the statute, a corporation, resident and citizen of this State, is created and organized. The statute uses the words company, association or corporation. These words necessarily mean an association of natural persons into one common undertaking. Whether it be a partnership, spoken of as company, a joint stock association or a regularly chartered corporation that composes the foreign railway company, when it comes into this State it must be, and becomes, a domestic corporation, a citizen and resident of this State, which can only be done by being created and organized under our law into a corporation. These persons might organize regularly under the provisions of the general corporation statute into a corporation if they choose, but being already engaged in the business of owning, controlling and maintaining or operating railroads, it is presumed their articles already signed are sufficient, and our statute accepts such articles in lieu of new ones. There is nothing in the case of Louisville, &c., R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 174 U. S., 552, contrary to this view.

That opinion was written by Mr. Justice Gray, who had written Gerling v. Railroad Co., 151 U. S., 673, and also the opinion in Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S., 581, and instead of overruling either case, or in any way offering a criticism as to their correctness, he makes extracts from these opinions, and also cites 96 U. S., 450, Railroad Co. v. Vance; 108, U. S., 436, Clark v. Barnard; 118 U. S., 161, Graham v. Railroad Co., and that line of cases to support his position. The real question determined in the Louisville R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co. case was the right of an Indiana corporation to sue in the Federal court in Kentucky a corporation of Kentucky, when the same stockholders and persons composing the Indiana corporation had also been incorporated in Kentucky under the same name and for the same purposes. The right was upheld and jurisdiction was sustained. So here the Virginia corporation might have been sued, in which case a right of removal would have existed. This was not done, however. The corporation was sued that was organized and created by the filing in the offices of the secretary of state and railroad commission copies of the articles of incorporation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. as provided by section 841, and which corporation being thus created and organized, was a corporation, citizen and resident of this State; and while its powers, duties, objects and stockholders were the same as in the Virginia corporation of the same name, this was a separate and distinct corporation because created by a different sovereignty.

So far as we have examined the adjudicated cases and the text-writers on the subject, it seems to be universally conceded that the question of whether a corporation has been created is never one of power in the State so to do, but always one of legislative intent.

In the case of Railroad v. Harris, 12 Wallace, —, where the Supreme Court differs from the Court of Appeals of Virginia, and of West Virginia, as to whether by an act of the Virginia Legislature the Baltimore & Ohio Railway Co. became also a Virginia corporation, it was fully conceded that such might have been done if the legislature had so intended. The Virginia courts had concluded that the intention was manifested in the act, but the Supreme Court thought otherwise. The legislation of this State furnishes ample illustration of the difference between a license to a foreign railroad company to do business in this State and an act reincorporating a railroad corporation of another State. Let us take an example. By an act of March, 1872, entitled "An act to authorize the Mississippi Central Railroad Co. to extend their road into and through the State of Kentucky," the corporation was declared a body-politic and corporate and authorized to construct and operate its road through Kentucky to the Ohio river. This, under the rule of the Supreme Court, was a mere license to a foreign corporation to do business in this State. The Mississippi Central Railroad Co. at that time existed under the laws of Mississippi, of Tennessee and of Louisiana.

In 1877 these corporations were consolidated by enabling acts of the three States in one company, called Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railway Co., and in March, 1878, the legislature of this State ratified the former act, and the consolidation of the three corporations into one, and granted a charter to the consolidated company. In an action brought in this State by a citizen, a removal was taken to the United States Circuit Court upon a petition alleging that the defendant, Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Co., was a foreign corporation, its habitat being Louisiana.

Upon motion to remand Hammond, District Judge, 5 Fed. Rep., 545, held: it was a corporation of this State, and remanded the case, because that court had no jurisdiction.

Subsequently, in 188-, the legislature of this State passed an act authorizing the Illinois Central Railroad Co., an Illinois corporation, to acquire and operate, by lease or purchase, the line of the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railway Co., and it is a matter of common knowledge that in compliance with that legislative permission a lease for a long term of years was executed to the Illinois Central Railroad Co., and that company now operates the line of road. This latter act authorizing the acquisition by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. was a mere license to the foreign railroad corporation to do business in this State. Since the passage of that act section 841 has been passed, and suppose now that the Illinois Central Railroad Co. desires to build a line of road for itself in this State, and in order to place itself within the constitutional provision so as to exercise the power of eminent domain its stockholders comply with section 841, Kentucky Statutes.

In such case no court would be justified in holding that that act by the company's stockholders did no more than was done by the act of the legislature authorizing the lease. This history of one line of railroad, and the different acts of the legislature of this State in relation thereto, show clearly the distinction and difference between the intent to license and to create a corporation. It has been repeatedly said by all the text-writers and authorities that no particular form of words is necessary to create a corporation or to grant corporate powers. If the act shows that it was the intention to create a corporation, such has always been held to be the effect.

In the case of Grangers Life and Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper, in 78 Ala., 325, the question arose as to whether the insurance company was a corporation of the State of Mississippi as well as the State of Alabama, where the first charter was granted. The court concluded that it was a corporation in Mississippi and said, page 344: "This act (of Mississippi) authorized the company to establish in that State one or more departments. But no department could be established until citizens of the State had subscribed for-and paid or secured, to the satisfaction of the president and general board of directors, a capital stock of $100,000; and the directors of each department were required to be citizens of the State. Upon the establishment of a department it was declared the corporation was to be regarded as a home company, and should be entitled to have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions of life insurance companies incorporated by the laws of Mississippi. Under this act a department was organized, and it may perhaps be inferred from the averments of the bill that it was for stock of the department, and not for the capital stock of the company in this State, the appellees were subscribers. The effect of this act was not merely to license or to enable the corporation formed in this State to transact business and exercise its powers in Mississippi. It is of far wider operation, and creates a corporation having the same name, and like franchises, as the corporation formed in this State, whenever there was an organization in pursuance of its provisions, a domestic corporation, in the words of the act, a home company. * * * When there was an organization in pursuance of its provisions a corporation existed, having its own capital, its own members, its own domicile, its own governing body; and its corporate powers were derived not from a foreign power, or by reference to the powers a foreign power may have conferred on a corporation of its creation, but were the rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions of life insurance companies incorporated under the laws of Mississippi. The act, when accepted, when there was an organization under its provisions, became a contract between the State and the corporators."

In the case of McGregor, qui tam. v. Erie Railway Co., 85 N. J. Law, 115, the Supreme Court of New Jersey held that the Erie Railway Co. was a domestic corporation by reason of certain acts of the legislature. The court said: "The title of the act of 1862 declares that it is an act not only to confirm the sale under the foreclosure of the property, rights and franchises of the New York & Erie Railroad Co., but to complete the organization of the Erie Railway Co., and the powers and provisions of that act, with the preliminary act of 1860, are such as necessarily to give the Erie Railway Co. the character of a corporation of this State, although it is not so expressly declared. (10 Wall., 567.) There is not a mere incidental power conferred or confirmed, but the intrinsic nature of the franchises and privileges the Erie company is authorized to possess and enjoy in its corporate name, as well as the liabilities imposed by the act of 1862, were such as, ipso facto, to make it a domestic corporation."

In the case of Debnam v. Southern Bell Tel. Co., decided by the Supreme Court of North Carolina June 7, 1900, 38 S. E. Rep., 269, the court, after a careful review of all the Federal authorities, held that the Southern Bell Tel. Co. was not entitled to a removal because it had been created a corporation by the laws of North Carolina. The court, by Douglas, J., after quoting from the case of Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 174 U. S., 562, as follows: "This court has often recognized that a corporation of one State may be made a corporation of another State by the legislature of that State, in regard to property and acts within its territorial jurisdiction (citing 1 Black, 286; 12 Wall., 65; 13 Wall., 270; 96 U. S., 450; 107 U. S., 581; 103 U. S., 433; 116 U. S., 307; 118 U. S., 161; 151 U. S., 673, and again on the same page), but this court has repeatedly said that in order to make a corporation already in existence under the laws of one State a corporation of another State, the language used must imply creation or adoption in such form as to confer the power usually exercised over corporations by the State or by the legislature, and such allegiance as a State corporation owes to its creator. The mere grant of privileges or powers to it as an existing corporation without more does not do this, said: 'This clear and concise statement of the law would meet our unqualified approval, even if it had come from a different source. Applying this rule in its strictest form, we are clearly of opinion that the act now under consideration does not pretend to be a mere grant of privileges or powers, but is, in legal intent and effect, a creation or adoption in such form as to confer the power usually exercised over corporations by the State or legislature, and such allegiance as a State corporation owes its creator. The act says in express terms that every telephone * * * company incorporated, created and organized under and by virtue of the laws of any State or government other than that of North Carolina, desiring to own property or to carry on business or to exercise any corporate franchise whatsoever in this State, shall become a domestic corporation of the State of North Carolina by filing, etc.; that when any such corporation shall have complied with the provisions of this act above set out, it shall thereupon immediately become a corporation of this State, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges, and be subject to the liability of corporations of this State, the same as if such corporation had been originally created by the laws of this State. * * * We are of opinion that as the defendant has become a domestic corporation of the State of North Carolina, and in contemplation of law a citizen thereof, and as the plaintiff has sued the defendant as a North Carolina corporation upon a cause of action which discloses no Federal question whatever, the case can not be removed into the circuit court of the United States.'

The cases might be multiplied to sustain this view that section 841, Kentucky Statutes, is not a mere license to a foreign corporation, but was in itself a creative statute, providing when certain formalities are complied with a corporation is created in this State. The whole question is one of legislative intent, and as we said above, there can here be no question as to the intention to create a corporation when section 841 is complied with.

Appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., having complied with that section, became a corporation of this State, a citizen and resident herein, and being such and sued on a cause of action presenting no Federal question, was not entitled to a removal to the United States Circuit Court.

We are aware that Judge Barr, in the case of Talyor v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 89 Fed. Rep., 119, took a different view from the one here expressed, and while we greatly admire and respect his ability as a judge, we can not agree with him as to the purpose, meaning and effect of our statutes. It is suggested that section 841, Kentucky Statutes, is unconstitutional because in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. We are of the opinion that there is no conflict, and if there be the same conflict would exist between section 211 of our Constitution and the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. There is nothing in section 211 of the Constitution, or section 841, Kentucky Statutes, that in any way interferes with interstate commerce. So far as section 841 provides, the appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., may carry all articles of commerce that it may receive outside the State to any point it pleases, in or out of the State, but it can not do an intra State business without a compliance with this section.

This is like our statute providing for separate coaches for the white and colored passengers. That law is valid, and has been upheld as to all passengers from points in this State to other points in the State, but would not apply to passengers taken outside of the State. Does not apply to interstate business. The question as to the validity of this statute was directly before this court in the Mobile & Ohio Railroad case, supra, and it was therein expressly held not to violate the Constitution. The foreign railroad corporation may, under a license or by mere acquiescence, engage in interstate commerce through this State; but it could exercise no power of eminent domain for any purpose whatever. Nor could the legislature grant to such foreign corporation the power of eminent domain because of section 211 of the Constitution. If the power and right of eminent domain is to be exercised, it is necessary that the railroad corporation that exercises it be a corporation of this State.

The Virginia corporation could not exercise the power of eminent domain, and by incorporating in this State under the provisions of section 841, Kentucky Statutes, this valuable right and great power is conferred on the incorporators. By compliance with this provision there was a right conferred, and power given, that could only be given to a domestic corporation, and we hold that at the same time, and in order to acquire this right of eminent domain, a corporation was created. It is to be presumed that the corporators, stockholders and directors who voluntarily complied with section 841 desired to possess the right of eminent domain, and as that could only be obtained in this State by a domestic corporation, voluntarily sought to be, and was, created and organized into a corporation by compliance with section 841.

We conclude, therefore, that appellee is a corporation of this State, and as such was sued, and its petition for removal to the Federal court was insufficient, as there was no showing of diverse citizenship.

The order and judgment of removal was, therefore, erroneous, and is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

Judges DuRelle, Burnam and O'Rear dissenting.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following dissenting opinion:

This is an action brought originally against appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., by appellant for the death of appellant's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligent act of appellee in the operation of its railroad train in Lewis county. Subsequent to the filing of the original petition the persons alleged to have been in charge of the train as engineer, fireman and brakeman were made defendants, but they have not been served with process and are not before the court, and in the petition for a removal it is alleged that they were not upon or in charge of the train at the time of the accident. Later the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co. was joined as defendant, it being the owner and lessor of the track and right of way over which appellee is operating its road, but it has not been brought before the court.

The sole defendant at the time of the removal proceedings was the appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co.

The majority opinion assumes the proposition in this case to be, and I think correctly, alone whether appellee's compliance with section 841 of the Kentucky Statutes constitutes it a domestic corporation. If it does, appellant being also a citizen of Kentucky, the cause is not removable to the Federal court. This question might be divided for consideration into these two heads:

1st. Is it competent for the legislature to deny a continuance of the privilege to a foreign corporation already within its borders and engaged in the business of carrying on interstate commerce, unless such foreign corporation shall, under such onerous penalties as to practically amount to confiscation of its property, become a citizen of this State?

2d. If such foreign corporation should accept the terms so prescribed by the legislature, would it thereby become a citizen of the State of Kentucky in the sense employed in the Federal statutes, so that a suit against it by a citizen of this State would not be removable into the United States Courts?

The complex nature of our government has first and last been the source of much discussion and occasional conflict of jurisdiction between the State and Federal authorities. Without attempting to enter upon an analysis or a discussion of this question, I hold to the opinion that in those matters where the Federal Constitution reserved to the Federal government exclusive jurisdiction, the rights of the States over such may not be extended beyond legitimate and proper taxation and the exercise of its police power. In other respects, the Federal control of the question is, and from the very nature of the case must be, ample, complete and exclusive, and may be exercised as if State lines did not exist. Among these subjects is that of interstate commerce. It is not pretended in this case that section 841 of the statute under discussion was intended to be, or is, an exercise of either the taxing power or that it is a police regulation by the State government. The record in this case discloses the fact to be that prior to the enactment of section 841 there existed in this State a railroad corporation created by the laws of this State, known as the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., which owned a right of way and roadbed extending from Boyd county, Kentucky, to Covington, Kentucky; that appellee, before the enactment of the statute mentioned, acquired from the Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., by lease for a long term of years its roadbed and properties, and has since been, and is now, operating same under that lease; that appellee Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. is a corporation originally created by the State of Virginia, with an enabling act by the State of West Virginia. Thus it would appear, and it is not questioned in this case, that appellee was engaged in carrying interstate traffic between the States of Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio. Appellant's petition alleges the lease above referred to in such terms as to permit us to indulge the presumption in this record that the lease was regularly entered into by the permission of this State. Whether such permission is evidenced by a general enactment, or by special act authorizing it, it will amount at least to a license at the time the contract of lease was made. Allowing these facts to be true, then was it competent for the legislature of this State to prohibit appellees continuing the enjoyment of the property it had acquired under the provision referred to, and its use in carrying on interstate commerce, without appellee should become incorporated as a citizen of Kentucky, and give up the privileges and rights attaching to its then existence as a citizen solely of another State? I maintain that it could not. If the State could legally require that all persons engaged in interstate traffic within the borders of this State should become first citizens of this State, it would be equivalent to saying that none but citizens of this State could engage therein in such traffic. The penalty of $1,000 per day denounced by statute against all who refuse or fail to first become citizens of this State before they can operate, or continue to operate, a railroad in or through this State is manifestly prohibitive. By statute none but corporations can acquire in this State the right to operate railroads. If no corporation but one created by this State, in every sense of the word a domestic corporation, can operate a railroad in this State, then it necessarily follows that this State not only could, but would by the operation of the statute quoted, if given the effect ascribed to it by the majority opinion, effectually control all commerce within and through this State. If it be conceded that the State may say who may and who shall not carry on the business of a common carrier within its borders, it must of necessity follow that such State exclusively controls and regulates the matter of all commerce therein. In all other things than that of interstate commerce a State may regulate the entrance, or even deny altogether the admission, of foreign corporations to do business therein. It has been definitely settled, too, that a corporation is not a citizen within the meaning of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, providing that citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

The precise question of the power of a State to regulate the conduct of interstate commerce by first requiring a license of a common carrier engaged therein, although such carrier was a foreign corporation, was directly presented and determined in the case of Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S., 47. In that case the court said: "If a partnership firm of individuals should undertake to carry on the business of interstate commerce between Kentucky and other States, it would not be within the province of the State legislature to exact conditions on which they should carry on their business, nor to require them to take out a license therefor. To carry on interstate commerce is not a franchise or a privilege granted by the State; it is a right which every citizen of the United States is entitled to exercise under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the accession of mere corporate facilities as a matter of convenience in carrying on their business can not have the effect of depriving them of such right, unless congress should see fit to impose some contrary regulation on the subject."

In Norfolk & Western R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S., 114, the facts were that the State of Pennsylvania undertook by an act of the legislature to require all foreign corporations having an office or offices in that Commonwealth to pay an annual license fee, and providing a penalty for the failure. The Norfolk & Western R. R. Co. was a corporation created by the laws of Virginia and West Virginia, and engaged in the carrying on of interstate traffic through other States, and by traffic arrangements into the State of Pennsylvania. Having failed to take out the license prescribed by the Pennsylvania act, judgment was rendered against the railroad company for penalties. Upon appeal the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, held: "It is well settled by numerous decisions of this court that a State can not, under the guise of a license tax, exclude from its jurisdiction a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce, or impose any burden upon such commerce within its limits."

It would seem to follow as a consequence that if a State can not regulate or exclude from its jurisdiction a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce by the adoption of "the guise of a license tax," it could not do so by any guise.

In Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co., 117 U. S., 84, the State of Tennessee sought to impose a license tax upon a Kentucky corporation, which was engaged in furnishing cars for the transportation of passengers between the States. The Tennessee statute was held to be invalid as being an interference with interstate commerce.

Whether a foreign corporation proposing to engage, or being engaged, in carrying interstate commerce would have the right to enter any State without its permission, and to acquire a right of way therein, is a question not presented in this case, and one that has not, so far as I am advised, been expressly determined.

In the case of St. Louis & San Francisco Ry. Co. v. James, 161 U. S., 554, opinion by Mr. Justice Shiras, it was intimated that the right existed, at least the question is there clearly shown to be an open one so far as the Federal authorities are concerned. If the States can not require first a license from a foreign corporation or person engaged in interstate commerce before they can enter such States and do business there, it as certainly follows that such State can not require more than taking out a license, that is, it could not require such person or corporation to become a citizen of the objecting State. Although a foreign corporation or person engaging in such traffic has taken out such license, or has conformed to the statute containing the terms set forth in section 841, supra, it can not be held to be a voluntary act when done under the coercive influence of the highly penal statute, threatened to be enforced upon a failure to conform to the statute. Kentucky did not create this corporation; can not terminate its existence; could not liquidate its affairs at the instance of a creditor or stockholder, even upon showing otherwise justifying it. Its existence as a corporation is not due in any part to the sovereign or creative power of this Commonwealth. The utmost that this State could have done was to confer upon the existing corporation, resident conclusively in the eye of the law in another State, certain privileges supposed to be necessary, or at least desirable to be so conferred. The fact of the legal residence of a corporation may be a fiction of the law. But it is a necessary one, and one that is well established and understood. But to say that the same corporation may be for identical purposes a resident at the same time of two States seems but a fancy. At any rate, even if the fact could be accomplished, it should not be unless the fact is that the corporation both intends, to and does, obtain legal vitality and existence as a corporation from both sovereignties.

It seems that a corporation, so far as the Federal authorities go, may be created, having power granted to it, and deriving corporate existence and authority in part from two or more States (Louisville, &c., Ry. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 174 U. S., 560), although this court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Hargis, in Covington and Cincinnati Bridge Co. v. Wooley, 78 Ky., 523, seems to have taken an opposite view. Nor does it seem to be an open question that the same incorporators may incorporate under the same name in two or more States; but I do not conceive that either of these propositions is involved here. The majority opinion goes to the extent of holding that by a compliance with section 841 of the statutes a foreign corporation engaged in operating a railway in this State thereby becomes a corporation created by this State. There can be but two reasons for an enactment of the statute in question. One is to confer upon foreign corporations proposing to operate railroads in this State the right as such to do so. The other is to deny any person, except a corporation of this State, to engage in that business. The latter, in my view, under the authorities above referred to, would be an unconstitutional requirement. Therefore, the first must have been the purpose of our legislation. In other words, it is an enabling act to confer upon corporations already created, and existing and deriving their authorities from, and owing allegiance and responsibility to, some other State to operate a railroad in this State.

The case of the St. Louis & San Francisco Ry. Co. v. James seems all but conclusive of this question. In that case the railroad corporation was created by the State of Missouri. It owned and operated a railroad line extending into and through the State of Arkansas, and also partly through the State of Missouri. The legislature of Arkansas enacted a statute permitting foreign corporations to operate railroads in that State, provided that before they should be "permitted to avail itself of the benefits of this act, or any part thereof, such corporation shall file with the secretary of state of this State a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, if incorporated under a general law of such State or Territory, or a certified copy of the statute laws of such State or Territory incorporating such company, where the charter of such railroad corporation was granted by special statute of such State; and upon the filing of such articles of incorporation or such charter, with a map and profile of the proposed line and paying the fees prescribed by law for railroad charters, such railroad company shall, to all intents and purposes, become a railroad corporation of this State, subject to all the laws of the State now in force or hereafter enacted, the same as if formally incorporated in this State." * * *

In a litigation between a citizen of Missouri and the railway company, brought in the United States Court for the Western District of Arkansas, this question was presented, and was certified by the Circuit Court of Appeals of that circuit to the Supreme Court for decision, and there decided: "In view of the provisions of the act of the general assembly of Arkansas, approved March 13, 1889, did the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Co., by filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation under the laws of Missouri with the secretary of state of Arkansas, and continuing to operate its railroad through that State, become a citizen of the State of Arkansas, so as to give the circuit court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas jurisdiction of this action, in which the defendant in error was, and is, a citizen of the State of Missouri?"

In the elaborate opinion, in which all the authorities affecting that question seem to have been reviewed, the court thus stated the effect of the act above referred to: "It is competent for a railroad corporation organized under the laws of one State, when authorized to do so by the consent of the State which created it, to accept authority from another State to extend its railroad into such State and to receive a grant of power to own and control, by lease or purchase, railroads therein, and to subject itself to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the second State. Such legislation on the part of two or more States is not, in the absence of inhibitory legislation by Congress, regarded as within the constitutional prohibition of agreements or compacts between States. Such corporations may be treated by each of the States whose legislative grants they accept as domestic corporations. The presumption that a corporation is composed of the citizens of the State which created it accompanies such corporation when it does business in another State, and it may sue or be sued in the Federal courts in such other State as a citizen of the State of its original creation. We are now asked to extend the doctrine of indisputable citizenship, so that if a corporation of one State, indisputably taken, for the purpose of Federal jurisdiction, to be composed of citizens of such State, is authorized by the law of another State to do business therein, and to be endowed, for local purposes, with all the powers and privileges of a domestic corporation, such adopted corporation shall be deemed to be composed of citizens of the second State, in such a sense as to confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts at the suit of a citizen of the State of its original creation. We are unwilling to sanction such an extension of a doctrine which, as heretofore established, went to the very verge of judicial power."

The language of the act in the Arkansas case was no stronger, and the purpose no more manifest, than in the case at bar. The facts as to whether the foreign corporation becomes a citizen of the State whose privileges it accepts are analogous to this case. Whatever may be the views of the members of the court, or of other courts of the States on this subject, we must, and cheerfully should, put ourselves in accord with the declarations of that court of final resort having jurisdiction of this question. For that reason I hold that the learned circuit judge correctly ordered this case to be removed into the United States Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, and his judgment should have been affirmed.

SWICE'S ADM'R v. MAYSVILLE & BIG SANDY R. R. CO., &c.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

A. E. Cole & Son for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth and E. L. Worthington for appellees.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

The question of removal to the United States Circuit Court presented in this case is identical with that presented in the case of Davis' Admr v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., ante, 1125, this day decided.

For the reasons there given the judgment and order of removal herein is erroneous and is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

TURNER v. TURNER.

(Filed December 9, 1902—Not to be reported.)

New trial—In this action to quiet the title to a tract of land an answer was filed to the petition, to which no reply was filed. At a subsequent term of the court the answer was taken for confessed and the petition dismissed. A petition for a new trial was afterwards filed, setting up reasons why plaintiff did not appear and file a reply to the answer. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition and dismissed it. Held—That allegations in the petition for a new trial are sufficient, and the court erred in dismissing it.

J. G. Forrester and J. B. Kinnaid for appellant.

W. F. Hall for appellee.

Appeal from Harlan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

In November, 1899, the appellant filed suit against the appellee in the Harlan Circuit Court to quiet title to a certain tract of land. At the November term, 1899, no order seems to have been made. It also seems that no service of summons was had on the appellee, but at the August term, 1900, of said court the appellee filed his answer. No action seems to have been taken at the February term, 1900, and the case stood continued until November, 1900, at which term the cause was submitted, and the answer taken for confessed, and plaintiff's petition dismissed. On the 12th of February, 1901, the appellant filed his petition in the circuit court for the purpose of obtaining a new trial of the action aforesaid, giving reasons why he did not appear and reply to the answer of the appellee, then, as now, the defendant in said suit.

The court below sustained a demurrer to the petition, and appellant failing to plead further, his action was dismissed. To reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. We deem it unnecessary to recite in detail the ground for a new trial relied on in appellant's petition. Suffice to say that after a careful consideration of the same we are of opinion that the facts stated in the petition, which, on demurrer, must be taken as true, entitle the appellant to a new trial.

The judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

BARNES v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 4, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Excusing juror—After twelve jurors on the trial of appellant for murder had qualified, but before the attorney for the Commonwealth had exercised the right of peremptory challenge, the court did not abuse its discretion in excusing a juror on the motion made by the Commonwealth on the statement of the attorney that the juror would be needed as a witness.

2. Evidence—Statement of the accused made before the killing, that he intended to kill some one, was competent evidence, although the person threatened was not indicated. The accused having admitted that he had a loaded pistol in his cell; he claimed that the pistol belonged to another prisoner.

The Commonwealth introduced the prisoner, who denied that the accused had his pistol. It is objected that the Commonwealth was permitted to contradict the accused on a collateral issue. Held—That said evidence was competent.

3. Evidence of flight of the accused is competent—The character of the accused, who testifies for himself, may be impeached the same as any other witness, and witnesses were properly introduced for this purpose. Counsel for appellant cross-examined them to ascertain the information upon which their opinion was formed. In doing so, certain answers were made in response to questions asked which indicated that the defendant had been accused of certain misdemeanors, moral delinquencies and unneighborly conduct. The defense had the right to expose or develop the ground of their opinions. When the witnesses gave them the defendant had no right to have the answers excluded from the jury.

4. New trial—The lower court refused to grant a new trial on the alleged ground that one or two jurors had expressed their opinion as to the guilt of the accused before they were accepted as jurors. This is objected to on appeal. Held—That the action of the court on this question is not subject to exception, under section 281, Civil Code of Practice.

John S. Kelley for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is the second appeal of this case (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1802). The appellant was indicted for the murder of W. B. Nicholls. The first trial resulted in a life sentence. On the last trial he was found guilty and sentenced to the penitentiary for five years.

The reasons for which a reversal is sought will appear from the consideration of the questions herein discussed. While the jury was being empaneled, John W. Mahoney, a regular jurymen, was sworn and examined touching his qualifications as a juror. Eleven others were likewise examined, and the twelve were found to be qualified. Before exercising his right to make peremptory challenges, the Commonwealth's attorney announced to the court that he desired Mahoney to be excused, as the Commonwealth wished to introduce him as a witness on the trial of the case. Over the objection of the defendant, the court excused him from the jury. He was not introduced as a witness by the Commonwealth, nor does it appear why he was not introduced. It is insisted that the effect of the action of the court was to give the Commonwealth a peremptory challenge in addition to those allowed by law. This objection is based upon the idea that the Commonwealth wished to get rid of Mahoney without the loss of one of its peremptory challenges, and that he was acting in bad faith. The fact that the Commonwealth's attorney did not introduce the witness does not authorize the inference to be drawn at the time he moved the court to excuse him that he did not intend to do so. It was a matter of sound discretion with the court as to whether he would excuse the juror, and he did not abuse it in relieving the juror from service.

The Commonwealth introduced Jacob Lowe, who testified that he heard the appellant say: "I will kill the God dam son of a bitch before sundown." At the time he made that statement he did not mention the name of the deceased, but it was before and on the same day of the homicide. This expression having been made under the circumstances, showed the purpose of the appellant to injure or kill some one, and the jury was authorized to infer from it that the deceased was the object of his murderous design. (Brooks v. Commonwealth, 100 Ky., 194; Howard v. Commonwealth, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 612.) On the cross examination of the accused he admitted that he had a loaded pistol in his cell in the county jail, but he claimed that it had been left in pawn by Emmett Hardin, who had been confined in the jail as a prisoner. The purpose of this testimony was to show that the accused had a design to break jail and escape. The Commonwealth introduced Emmett Hardin, who testified that the pistol found in the appellant's cell was not the one which he left. It is insisted that the court allowed the Commonwealth to contradict the defendant on a collateral issue. The defendant sought to break the force of the testimony of the Commonwealth by showing that another prisoner had left the pistol in the jail. The testimony of the Commonwealth tended to show that he probably had two pistols there instead of one, which tended to show a desperate effort was contemplated to break jail and make his escape. It was always competent to prove that one accused of crime fled to avoid prosecution, or that he had attempted to do so. The Commonwealth had the right to impeach the character of the appellant the same as any other witness. (McDonald v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky., 13; Commonwealth v. Harrigan, 89 Ky., 807.) Witnesses were introduced for that purpose who qualified themselves to do so. Counsel for appellant cross examined them to ascertain the information upon which their opinion was formed. In doing so certain answers were made in response to the questions asked, which indicated that the defendant had been accused of certain misdemeanors, moral delinquencies and unneighborly conduct. The defense had the right to expose or develop the ground of their opinions. When the witnesses gave them the defendant had no right to have the answers excluded from the jury. It was the province of the jury to determine the weight and credibility of the evidence of the witnesses introduced upon the subject of character. It follows that the Commonwealth's attorney's remarks on this evidence were legitimate.

One of the grounds for a new trial was that one or two of the jurors had expressed opinions as to the guilt of the accused before they were accepted as jurors. The action of the court on this question in refusing a new trial is not subject to exception. (Civil Code of Practice, section 281; Howard v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1855.)

The judgment is affirmed.

CALLENDER'S ADM'R v. CALLENDER.

(Filed December 10, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Decedent's estate—Pleading—Exceptions to claims—C. died intestate, leaving surviving him his two sons and a tract of land worth about $4,000 or $5,000. Appellant, the oldest son, qualified as his administrator, and instituted this suit to settle the estate, and alleged that the appellee claimed that the estate owed him a considerable sum, the exact nature of which plaintiff did not know. In his answer appellee claimed that the estate owed him a considerable sum, without setting it up, but alleged that it was filed with the commissioner. The commissioner made his report, allowing the claims of appellee, the principal item of which was a note for $6,000, alleged to have been executed by the intestate. Exceptions to the report of claims were filed and overruled and the claims allowed. On appeal it is insisted that the note should have been set up by pleading, as required by sections 114 and 115, Civil Code of Practice. Held—That the better method would have been to set up the claim in the pleading, but as the issues were tried on the exceptions the informalities will be disregarded. The proof shows that the intestate expressed and carried out his purpose to execute the note to appellee for an amount sufficient to cover his entire estate, but as the defense that the note was executed without consideration was made, and the proof failing to show any consideration the note is rejected.

Geo. B. Winslow, Henry M. Winslow, Winslow & Winslow and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellant.

John S. Gaunt and Thos. W. Bullitt for appellee.

Appeal from Carroll Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

Joseph Callender died intestate in August, 1900. Two sons, J. R. Callender and A. L. Callender, survived him, and were his only heirs at law. He owned at his death about 100 acres of land, worth, perhaps, $4,000 or $5,000, and a little personal property. The oldest son, J. R. Callender, qualified as administrator of the estate, and instituted suit for a settlement thereof in the Carroll Circuit Court, making his brother, A. L. Callender, a defendant. After reciting the extent and character of the estate, and the debts due by his intestate, he alleged that A. L. Callender "claimed to hold a considerable indebtedness against the estate, the exact nature of which he had not been able to ascertain," and asked that the cause be referred to the master commissioner to ascertain the indebtedness. In the first paragraph of the answer A. L. Callender admits that "he holds a considerable indebtedness against the decedent, which he says he had filed, properly proven, with the master commissioner." In the second paragraph he claims that all the personal property which had been taken possession of by the plaintiff, as the property of decedent, belonged to him. Contemporaneously with the filing of his answer in the clerk's office he filed with the master commissioner a paper, in words and figures as follows:

"September 10, 1889.

"On day after dait i promise to pay to louis Callender the sum of six thousan dallars * * * of him.

"JOSEPH CALLENDER."

On the 25th of January, 1901, the master commissioner made a report, certifying that this claim, amounting in the aggregate to $10,075, was properly proven and vouched. Plaintiff thereupon filed exceptions to the master's report, in which he denied that the alleged note was either executed or delivered by J. R. Callender to the defendant, A. L. Callender, and also upon the ground that there was no consideration for its execution. At the same time a general demurrer was filed to defendant's answer, which was overruled. He thereupon tendered an amended petition, in which he denied the execution and delivery of the note, and alleged that there was no consideration therefor. The court refused to permit several amended petitions along this line to be filed. The plaintiff thereupon filed a reply, in which he denied all the allegations of the answer and all statements filed with the note in the affidavit. A general demurrer was sustained to the reply upon the ground that all the defenses relied upon by appellant could be considered upon the exceptions.

It would have been better practice to have required the defendant to set out his claim on the note in a plea in conformity with sections 114 and 115 of the Civil Code. (Horner v. Harris' Ex'ors, 10 Bush, 361.) But as the testimony has been fully taken and the issues tried out upon the exceptions, and judgment rendered, we will disregard the informalities in the pleading and consider the case upon its merits. It is shown in the evidence that both appellant and appellee lived with their father, Joseph Callender, until January, 1891, except for a short interval. At that time the plaintiff left his father's home, and until his death led the hard and precarious life of a cropper of other people's land. The younger brother, A. L. Callender, continued to make his home with his father until his death, assisting in the cultivation of the land, under his father's direction, when not engaged in operating a steam thresher. He was living in his house when his father died, and held possession of it and all of his father's papers until the appellant demanded their possession under his appointment as administrator, and for the first time, so far as this record shows, claimed that his father was indebted to him on the obligation in controversy.

Three distinct and separate issues are raised by the exceptions and evidence: First, was the note signed by J. R. Callender; second, was it delivered by him during his lifetime to A. L. Callender; and, third, was it without a good and valuable consideration? All of them are questions of fact which must be determined from the evidence. Upon the question as to the genuineness of the note the appellee introduced J. M. Giltner and J. A. Donelson, who testified in substance that they were familiar with the handwriting of the decedent; and that, in their opinion, the note was in the handwriting of Joseph R. Callender. Whilst, on the other hand, Fielding Vories testifies that he knew the handwriting of decedent, and that he had in his possession a deed signed by him, which he filed; and that, in his opinion, the paper in controversy was not in the handwriting of decedent. Several photographic copies of admitted signatures of decedent are filed by L. R. Baker, an expert photographer, and A. J. Bruce, clerk of the Carroll County Court, the original of which are before us upon this appeal, and we must admit that the testimony as to the genuineness of the document is scanty, and not satisfactory.

The only witness who testified as to the delivery of the note by J. R. Callender in his lifetime to his son, A. L. Callender, is L. T. Callender, a nephew of decedent, who lived in Texas at the time he gave his deposition. He testified that he was present when Joseph Callender delivered the note to his son, A. L. Callender; that J. R. Callender said: "Take this note, Louis, and keep it, and at my death I want you to have this much money."

The time and place of this delivery were not stated by the witness. And his testimony is largely discredited by that of the witnesses, Orr, Abbett, Fox and Stubbins, all of whom testify that L. T. Callender, shortly after the death of Joseph R. Callender, informed them that he assisted A. L. Callender to look through his father's papers after his death, and that they found this note among them at that time. Whilst Humphrey Smith, who was a tenant of decedent for two years immediately preceding his death, testified that when A. L. and L. T. Callender came back from the funeral of Joseph R. Callender they went up stairs together; and that when they came down A. L. Callender said to him: "Here is a note with my father's name to it; can't you swear to the handwriting;" that he answered: "No," and said to him: "Can't you find no will;" that both of them answered: "No; this is all I can find;" that they said that they had found the note in an envelope; he remarked that it did not look like it had been written long, and that L. T. Callender had a pencil behind his ear at the time, and said that where writing was kept dry it would not fade; that about three or four weeks after A. F. Callender informed him that he had found the note in an old red pocketbook in the bureau drawer. U. S. Ford testified that A. L. Callender told him that he found the note in his father's papers about a couple of months after his death. Whilst George A. Haden testified that he asked the appellee how he got the note, and that he replied that he found it among his father's papers after his death. The only witness, except L. T. Callender, who testifies as to the delivery of the note, is the witness, J. A. Donelson. He says: "Joseph Callender, deceased, came to my office on one occasion, I can't state the exact year, but I recollect that it was late in the summer, and said that he wanted to fix his property so that his son Louis would get all of it at his death; that Louis had been with him and promised to remain with him so long as he lived. I suggested that he wanted a will written. He said no; that they break wills sometimes, and he could beat a will. I said how. And he said by a note. I explained to him the difference between a will and a note; that a will spoke from his death, and a note from delivery, and told him that he could change a will, but could not change a note. He talked also of having a deed written, but I told him that the danger of that was that Louis might become involved, and the property would be taken from him.

"He left after talking a while longer about it, saying that he thought he could fix it up without a lawyer. In a short time thereafter he returned, that is, within a few weeks, and talking with me for a while, he said I have just fixed up my business; I have just written a note, 'One day after date I promise to pay to Louis Callender' (the amount I will not now state, as it has passed from my memory), but it was so many thousand dollars for services. Then the discussion arose as to the amount named in the note. I recollect saying to him that it was more than he was worth; he said he knew it, but that he wanted Louis to have all that he had; and that he did not expect to be worth any more than that. I said to him limitation will bar that note in fifteen years, and it is probable that you will live longer than that; he said he could fix that; he would make a payment on the note, and have it credited on it. I told him he ought to have a witness to the delivery of the note, as he and Louis were living in the same house. He said that he had delivered it to Louis in the presence of a witness, with the understanding that he was to take it and not collect or use it until after his death. On several occasions since then he has spoken to me about the note, but that was all he could remember well."

But even if be conceded that the note in controversy was executed by Joseph R. Callender, the decided weight of the testimony is that it remained in the old man's possession during his life, and was found by appellee in his papers after his death, and was intended by him to take the place of a will. This conclusion is fortified by the testimony of the only person who claims ever to have heard the old man speak of the note. The testimony of the witness, Donelson, quoted supra, would seem to be conclusive on this question. And L. T. Callender says that when the old man delivered the note to A. L. Callender he said to keep it and at my death I want you to have this much money. There was no talk of any consideration for the note, and it was plainly intended, if credence is to be given to the testimony of these witnesses, as a gift to take effect at the death of the old man. And the law is well settled that promissory notes given by the father to his children can not be enforced against the estate after his death, where a plea of no consideration is interposed. (Richardson v. Richardson, 26 L. R. A., 305, in the note to which the authorities on this subject are very fully collated.)

After a careful consideration of the testimony in the case we have arrived at the conclusion that the chancellor should have disallowed so much of appellee's claim as was founded upon this note. And we are also of the opinion that appellee's claim to the cow and bull calf should be disallowed.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

KREMER v. LEATHERS, &c.

(Filed December 10, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Streets—Action to enforce apportionment warrants—Practice—Motion to set aside judgment—Appellant brought this action to recover on two apportionment warrants for street improvements, and to enforce a lien on the property of owners abutting on the improvement. but no certified copies of the ordinance, contract or apportionment were filed with the petition. An answer was filed, and on the 17th day of February, 1900, the court rendered a judgment dismissing the petition. On the 26th day of February appellant filed affidavits, alleging that copies of the papers had been prepared, but by an oversight the same were not filed, and made a motion to set aside the judgment and file copies of the necessary papers which accompanied the affidavits. The court did not decide the motion until the 28th day of April following, when it overruled same, from which order this appeal is prosecuted, and it is insisted that as the courts of Jefferson county continue in session sixty days the court had no authority in April to set aside a judgment which had been rendered in February. Held—That the motion to set aside the judgment having been made within the sixty-day term the court retained jurisdiction of the action, and should have permitted the exhibits to be filed as they were in their nature formal, but necessary, as their substance had been alleged in the petition.

Carroll & Carroll and M. S. Tyler for appellant.

Lane & Harrison and H. L. Stone for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

This action was brought by appellant, Henry L. Kremer, as assignee of Valentine Humploh, to enforce liens for two apportionment warrants issued by the city of Louisville for the construction of a sidewalk on both sides of Broadway, between First and Second streets, in the city of Louisville under an ordinance approved April 23, 1898. One of the warrants was against the property of the defendant, John S. Branin, and the other against the property of the defendant, the Second Presbyterian Church. The substance of the ordinance, contract and apportionment under which the work was done, and warrants issued, are fully set out in appellant's petition, but no certified copies of the ordinance, contract or apportionment were filed with the petition. The city of Louisville was made a party with a view of taking a judgment against it in case no recovery could be had against its co-obligees for the several amounts apportioned against their property. The property holders filed a joint answer to the petition, in the first paragraph of which they in substance deny all of the material allegations of plaintiff's petition. The second and third paragraphs were demurred to by appellant, and the demurrer to the second paragraph sustained on the 6th of January, 1900, to which defendants excepted, and on their motion were allowed two weeks' time in which to amend. No action appears to have been taken by the trial court on the demurrer to the third paragraph. On the 30th of January, 1900, defendants declined to amend their answer, and moved a submission of the case upon its merits. On the 17th of February, 1900, the court rendered judgment dismissing plaintiff's petition on the ground that the first paragraph of the defendant's answer put in issue the averments of the petition, and the exhibits necessary to make out a prima facie case under section 2888 of the Kentucky Statutes were not in the record. On the 26th day of February, 1900, plaintiff moved that the order of submission and judgment dismissing their petition be set aside, and in support thereof filed the affidavits of A. J. Carroll and J. Bruce Kremer. Both affidavits state that certified copies of the ordinance, contract and apportionment had been ordered for the purpose of filing as exhibits; and that they believed that they had actually been filed before submission, and with the affidavit of Kremer there was tendered certified copies of the missing paper. On the 28th of April, 1900, plaintiff's motion was overruled and their petition dismissed, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is insisted by appellees that the circuit court had no jurisdiction on the 28th of April, 1900, to set aside the judgment rendered on the 17th of February, as more than sixty days had elapsed from its rendition. This contention is based upon the fact that the Jefferson Circuit Court is a court of continuous session; and that after the expiration of sixty days it lost all power over judgments previously entered. This proceeding was in equity, and the effect of the motion made by appellant on the 26th of February, 1900, to set aside the judgment was to suspend the judgment until it was overruled.

"Any other construction of the law would deprive the parties of the right to appeal in all cases where a court, for prudential reasons or otherwise, saw proper to continue the motion from one time to another, a right that the court can exercise and over which neither counsel nor client have any control." (Louisville Chemical Co. v. Commonwealth, 71 Ky., 182; Trapp v. Aldrich, Receiver, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2482.)

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court did not lose jurisdiction over its judgment of February 17 by the mere fact that it was not acted upon until the 28th day of April; and that the chancellor erred in not sustaining plaintiff's motion to set aside the order of submission, and judgment for the purpose of allowing certified copies of the ordinance, contract and apportionment to be filed. Thompson on Trials, section 848, says: "Where the plaintiff has inadvertently omitted to introduce a formal, though necessary, document until after the close of its evidence, it will be an abuse of discretion to refuse his application to be allowed to introduce it."

The affidavits of both counsel filed in the case state that certified copies of the omitted papers have been ordered to be filed in the record; and that both believed that they had actually been so filed. They were perhaps to some extent misled in this matter by the request on the part of appellees for time to amend the paragraph of their answer to which a demurrer had been sustained, and the sudden abandonment of this purpose, accompanied by a motion to submit the case upon its merits on the 20th. It seems to us that there has been a miscarriage of justice in this case, attributable to the belief of counsel that certified copies of the ordinance, contract and apportionment were in the record. The filing of these papers were largely formal, as their substance had been fully recited in the petition; and that the ends of justice require that plaintiffs should be given an opportunity to have the case tried upon its merits.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to set aside the order of submission and to allow plaintiffs to file the tendered records, and for other proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MT. STERLING IMPROVEMENT CO. v. COCKRELL, &c.

(Filed December 10, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Surety—Release—Appellees were sureties on a supersedeas bond executed by O. on appeal from a judgment against him, and the judgment was affirmed. An execution was issued on this judgment and the sheriff levied on land belonging to O. sufficient in value to satisfy the debt. The sheriff indorsed on the execution that it was held up by order of plaintiff. O. in the meantime sold the land to H. This suit was afterwards instituted on the bond, and the defense set up was that as the sheriff held up the execution by order of plaintiff and the debt was lost thereby, that they are released from liability on the bond. Issue was joined on this defense, and the jury found for the defendant. On appeal, Held—That the verdict will not be disturbed as the proof is conflicting. The law is well settled that when a plaintiff issues an execution against the defendant, which is levied upon property sufficient to satisfy it, a lien on the defendant's property enures to the benefit of the security, and if that lien is discharged or lost through the negligence or misconduct of either the plaintiff or the sheriff the execution is considered paid in so far as the surety is concerned.

H. C. McKee and Tyler & Apperson for appellant.

Hazelrigg & Chenault and H. R. Prewitt for appellees.

Appeal from Montgomery Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

In 1895 the Mt. Sterling Improvement Co. recovered a judgment against J. H. Oldham for $250, from which he prosecuted an appeal to this court and executed a supersedeas bond, with the appellees, M. O. Cockrell and H. K. Green, as his securities. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed, and the improvement company filed the mandate issued thereon in the lower court, and on the 25th of June, 1898, had an execution issued upon the judgment, which was levied by the sheriff of Montgomery county on the 29th of June, 1898, on a tract of land belonging to J. H. Oldham of sufficient value to have satisfied it. On the 23d of July, 1898, after the levy of the execution, Oldham sold the land for a cash consideration to one Hall, and on the 1st day of August, 1898, the improvement company by its attorney endorsed on the execution these words:

"The sheriff is directed to hold this execution until further orders. August 1, 1898.

"MT. STERLING IMPROVEMENT CO."

And in January, 1899, this action was brought against the appellees on the supersedeas bond. The defendants, Cockrell and Green, answered, admitting that they signed the supersedeas bond, and set out in detail the facts recited above, with the further allegation that neither the plaintiff nor the sheriff had complied with the requirements of subsection 2 of section 2358a of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that "no attachment or execution hereafter issued, nor any levy or sale under either, shall in any manner affect the right, title to, or interest of a subsequent purchaser, lessee or incumbrancer without notice thereof of any real estate or any interest therein upon which such attachment or execution may be or may have been levied, except from the time there shall be filed in the office aforesaid a memorandum, showing the number and style of the action in which said attachment or execution issued, the court from which it issued, the number, if any, of such attachment or execution, the date thereof, and the name of the persons in whose favor and against whom respectively it issued."

And in an amended answer they allege that whilst the execution was in the hands of the sheriff, and in full force, they ordered the sheriff, pursuant to an agreement made with J. H. Oldham, to hold up said execution until further orders, and that by reason of such agreement and direction given the sheriff he failed to comply with the requirements of subsection 2 of section 2358a of the statutes. The plaintiff, in its reply, denied that they agreed to hold up the execution, or that they had directed the sheriff to do so, and plead that it was the defendant's duty to have filed the notice required by subsection 2 of section 2358a. The trial court by its instructions confined the case to the defense relied on in the amended petition, telling the jury to find for the company unless they believed from the evidence that, after the execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff and levied upon property of the defendants sufficient to have satisfied same, it directed the sheriff not to proceed with his levy; and that in consequence of such directions the sheriff failed to collect it before the 23d of July, 1898.

The testimony is conflicting. Oldham testified that both the president and secretary of the company consented to suspend the collection of the execution until there could be a settlement of the affairs of the company; and that with their consent, and by their direction, he communicated this fact to the sheriff, and that he thereafter sold the property to Hall. The sheriff to some extent corroborated the statement of this witness. Whilst Childs, the secretary of the company, emphatically denies that either he or Baum, the president, ever agreed that the collection of the execution should be suspended, or that they so instructed the sheriff. Upon this issue, sharply drawn both by the testimony and the instructions, the jury found for the defendant.

The law is well settled that when a plaintiff issues an execution against the defendant, which is levied upon property sufficient to satisfy it, a lien on the defendant's property enures to the security, and if that lien is discharged or lost through the negligence or misconduct of either the plaintiff or the sheriff, the execution debt is considered paid in so far as the surety is concerned. (Dills v. Cecil, 62 Ky., 579; Herman on Executions, 254; Brandt on Suretyship and Guarantee, 1st edition, section 373.) The appellant was under no obligation to appellee to have sued out the execution against Oldham; they could have looked, if they had so elected, directly to the supersedeas bond for a satisfaction of their judgment. But having elected to proceed by execution, and having acquired by their levy a lien upon the property sufficient to have satisfied their judgment, they were not at liberty to abandon the security so obtained for the payment of their judgment; and if by their orders the sheriff failed to proceed with the collection of their execution, and in consequence thereof their security was lost, they can not look to appellees for its payment.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. McNAUGHTON, USE, &c.

(Filed December 10, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Street improvements—Liens—Statute of limitation—Contracts—Appellee entered into a written contract for the original construction of a street, at a fixed price, both parties expecting that the abutting property owners were liable under the statute for the cost of said improvement. The courts having decided that no liability rested on the property holders for same, appellee brought this suit on his contract against the city to recover said costs. Appellant relies on the statute of limitation of five years as a bar to the action. Held—The action was not barred as it was not based on a liability created by statute, but upon a written contract which is not barred until after fifteen years.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

Lane & Harrison for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The city of Louisville entered into a contract, evidenced by a writing with the appellee, by which he agreed to improve a certain street by original construction. The city agreed that he was to have a certain compensation for the improvement which he contracted to make. The city was authorized to make the contract, but a controversy arose with the abutting property owners as to their liability for the cost of construction. It culminated in a suit which reached this court, where it was held that the abutting property owners were not liable for the cost of construction. (City of Louisville v. McNaughton, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 169b.) Following many other cases, this court in that case held that as the city had ordered the improvements made, and accepted same after it was completed, it was liable to the contractor for so much of the cost of improvement for which he could not have a lien upon the abutting property. McNaughton failing to recover $2,760.52 from the abutting property owners, he brought this action against the city to recover the same.

It is urged that because this court has held the five years' statute of limitations applies to actions against abutting property owners for the cost of street improvements (section 2515, Kentucky Statutes, Kirwin v. Nevin, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 947), that it likewise applies to an action by a contractor against the city. Section 2515, Kentucky Statutes, does not apply to an action upon a writing, for such action is expressly excepted from its operation. This is not an action created by statute, but it is based upon a written contract which was entered into between the city and the appellee. The city could only be bound when it was authorized to and did make a contract in writing. It is true the city expected that the abutting property owners to relieve it from liability by paying the contract price, but the statute did not impose such an obligation upon them. If it had, then it would have been a liability imposed by statute, as they were not the contracting parties. (Gosnell v. City of Louisville, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 522; Kerwin v. Nevin, supra. In effect the city by its contract in writing agreed that if the abutting property owners did not pay the contract price it would do so. As this is an action on a contract in writing, the fifteen-year statute of limitation applies.

The judgment is affirmed.

Whole court sitting.

SPEARS, &c. v. THOMAS, REC'R.

(Filed December 10, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Allowance to receivers—This appeal involves the correctness of an allowance of $15,000 made to appellee as receiver of an estate worth about $200,000. The affidavits filed with appellee's motion for an allowance show that he managed the estate entrusted to his care admirably, and increased its value about $36,000, and was, therefore, entitled to a good allowance. Held—That the Court of Appeals is inclined to defer to the judgment of the chancellor in the exercise of his inherent right to fix the allowance of his receivers as he is in possession of the facts, enabling him to fix a reasonable allowance, and will disturb it only where the chancellor has abused his discretion. In this action the allowance is reduced to $10,000. The statute fixing fees and allowances to commissioners and receivers has no application to cases of this kind.

McMillan & Talbott and E. M. Dickson for appellants.

T. L. Edelen and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellee.

Appeal from Bourbon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

A controversy over the will of Thomas Woodford resulted in the appointment of Claude M. Thomas as receiver by the circuit court. The estate consisted of $186,000 in promissory notes, more than $12,000 in bank stocks, and real estate of the value of more than $40,000. At the time the property of the estate was placed in the hands of the receiver its estimated value was about $200,000. The receiver managed the estate in the most successful way, and after holding it about three years it was valued at two hundred and forty odd thousand dollars. The receiver made a detailed report as to the management of the estate and as to its condition, with that he filed exhibits and also some affidavits showing the value of the estate and the admirable manner in which it had been managed. The receiver's report was considered upon his motion for an allowance for his services. No other evidence was offered on the question; thereupon the circuit court allowed him $15,000.

This appeal was prosecuted to have the action of the circuit court in making the allowance reviewed. The conduct in the management of this estate shows that the circuit court selected one eminently fitted to perform such important duties. In accepting the appointment the receiver assumed a great responsibility. The circuit court being acquainted with the character of the receiver and the services performed, was well prepared to fix the amount of compensation to pay him. Under such circumstances the circuit court has a large discretion, and only when we are convinced that he has erred in its exercise will we disturb his finding. The following rule is enunciated by High on Receivers, section 781: "The power of courts of equity to fix the compensation of their own receivers is well established, and results necessarily from the relation which the receiver sustains to the court, he being its officer or agent, deriving his functions only from that source. In the absence, therefore, of any legislation regulating the receiver's salary or compensation, the matter is left entirely to the determination of the court from which he derives his appointment. And in passing upon the compensation of a receiver an appellate court will ordinarily defer much to the judgment of the court below by which the receiver was appointed, that court having had the supervision of his conduct."

The United States Supreme Court, in Stewart v. Boulware, 133 U. S., 78, said: "Nor is there any doubt of the power of courts of equity to fix the compensation of their own receivers. That power results necessarily from the relation which the receiver sustains to the court, and in the absence of any legislation regulating the receiver's salary or compensation, the matter is left entirely to the determination of the courts from which he derives his appointment."

"The compensation is usually determined according to the circumstances of the particular case, and corresponds with the degree of responsibility and business ability required in the management of the affairs entrusted to him, and the perplexity and difficulty involved in that management."

But it is urged that our statute fixes the compensation of receivers that the court must allow only such compensation as fixed by it; that however important the duties which are to be performed by the receiver, or how great the responsibilities, he must be limited by the amount fixed by the statute to compensate master commissioners and receivers. This court has not considered that statute controls in the allowance to receivers in cases like this and other cases that the court can see might arise. That statute allows only $3 a day to a receiver for certain duties, and $10 per tract for sale or renting land, etc., and a certain per cent. for collection and distribution of money. In Sherley v. Mattingly & Sons, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 289, this court approved the allowance of 25 per cent. of the entire amount realized for the estate. The court said: "In view of the extraordinary services rendered by Mr. Sherley, as shown by his report to the commissioner, he is allowed $500 as compensation for his services. It is true that this sum is more than 25 per cent. of the entire amount realized by him for the estate, and when added to the expenses allowed him by the commissioner will very nearly absorb that sum; but, under all the circumstances, the court is of opinion that such an allowance is reasonable.

"The amount to be allowed in cases of this character is peculiarly a question within the chancellor's discretion, and it will not be interfered with in matters of doubt. The chancellor, from the nature of the case, must understand much better than this court the nature of the services rendered by the officer, the value of such services in the community, and equities of the whole case. In this case we have only appellant's report and a partial transcript of the record to guide us. It would seem that he has done a good deal of work and been at considerable trouble, involving both loss of time and mental labor, and if the estate were larger we would think he ought to have a larger sum. But the whole amount collected by him and more will be absorbed in paying his costs and the allowances already made, leaving a deficit to be paid by his successor. In appointments of this character it is understood that if the receiver is fortunate in his management and realizes for the estate a large sum, his allowance will be swelled; but if, on the other hand, the amount coming to his hands is small, although it is due to causes beyond his control, where a great loss will inevitably fall on the creditors in any event, the court should cut down the costs of administering the fund as low as justice to the officers will permit. In measuring the value of services it is always proper to take into consideration not only the work done, but the result accomplished for the estate by it. In view of the other allowances made by the court, the amount received by appellant, and the condition of the estate, we do not feel warranted in saying, on the record before us, that there was an abuse of discretion in the allowance made."

If the petition of the attorneys for the appellant is correct, then a great railroad might be put in the hands of a receiver of great ability and fitness to perform such service, and still he could only be allowed $3 per day for his services. The same might be true if an immense manufacturing plant was placed in the hands of a receiver. While we recognize the large discretion of the circuit court in making allowances to receivers in cases like the one under consideration, still this court has the right to review the matter and fix a different compensation for the receiver, if in its judgment the circuit court erred in making the allowance. We have examined the report of the receiver and the evidence accompanying it, and have determined that $10,000 is a sufficient compensation for the services which he performed.

This case is reversed, with directions to the lower court to allow the appellee $10,000 for his services and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

OTTER VIEW LAND CO.'S REC'R v. BOLLING'S EX'TX.

Res judicata—Judgments of sister States—Statute of limitation—Appellee's intestate subscribed for one hundred shares of $10 each of the capital stock of the appellant company, and paid only $400 on the subscription. Appellant having become insolvent, and a receiver appointed to take charge of its assets, a decree was rendered by the Virginia Circuit Court in a suit instituted by the receiver by him on June 10, 1893, making an assessment on the stockholders. In an amended petition against several subscribers of said stock a recovery of said assessment was sought. Defendants filed a plea of the three years' statute of limitation, under the statute of Virginia, as a defense. The lower court and the Supreme Court of Virginia held said defense as valid, and released said stockholders. Appellee's intestate was a resident of Kentucky at that time, and until his death, and was not a party to said action. This action was instituted in this State to recover the amount of the assessment against appellee's intestate. The lower court dismissed the action, under section 2541, Kentucky Statutes, and the question involved on this appeal is, does the statute of limitation constitute a bar to the action, and what effect has the judgment of the Virginia court upon the rights of appellee? Held—That neither the statute of limitation of Virginia of three years, nor the five-year statute of this State are sufficiently pleaded. The judgment of the Virginia court, in so far as it fixes the liability of the stockholders on the subscription, is binding on all the stockholders alike, whether they were parties to the proceedings or not, but it does not conclude any liability of a stockholder who may be released by the lapse of time. The plea of the statute of limitation is a personal plea, and the release of stockholders in Virginia on such plea can not enure to the benefit of appellee, who was no party to that proceeding, and she is entitled to set up such defense if she is entitled to it.

W. W. & J. R. Watts for appellant.

Caruth, Chatterson & Blitz for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee's testator, Wm. H. Bolling, had subscribed for one hundred shares of $10 each of the capital stock of the Otter View Land Co., which was a Virginia corporation. Presumably the contract was made or consummated in Virginia, nothing to the contrary appearing. Payments upon the subscription to the extent of $400 have been made.

This is a suit by the receiver of the corporation, it having become insolvent, against the stockholder upon an assessment made by the judgment of the circuit court of Bedford county, Virginia. The assessment was made by a decree June 10, 1893. This suit was brought by the receiver in the Jefferson Circuit Court of this State in March, 1898. Appellee was a resident of Kentucky at the time of the proceedings hereinafter mentioned. There was an issue as to whether the subscription was by parol or in writing. There was not sufficient evidence, indeed no evidence, that it was in writing. It was, therefore, necessarily in parol. The circuit court dismissed the petition because of section 2541, Kentucky Statutes: "When, by the laws of any other State or country, an action upon a judgment or decree rendered in such State or country can not be maintained there by reason of the lapse of time, and such judgment or decree is incapable of being otherwise enforced there, an action upon the same can not be maintained in this State, except in favor of a resident thereof, who has had the cause of action from the time it accrued.''

An amended answer filed by appellee in this case pleaded that no action had ever been filed against any of the purchasers of stock or against appellee upon the call made under the decree of the Bedford Circuit Court of Bedford City, Va., until March 31, 1897.

"When by an amended petition filed in the said Bedford Circuit Court of Bedford City, Va., a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, making defendants to said action the Otter View Land Co. and the purchasers of said stock, as shown by the books of the said company, and after issues made the court adjudged that the statute of limitation of said State of Virginia was a bar to all actions against said purchasers of stock of the said Otter View Land Co., and that upon appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia that decree was affirmed, it being the law in that State that actions upon parol agreements to pay money are barred within three years from the accrual of the right of action.'"

Appellee relied in this plea upon the decree of the Virginia court as a bar. The Virginia statutes of limitation are not pleaded in this case as a bar to appellant's right of recovery, nor does appellee plead the lapse of time under the Virginia Statute as a bar to appellant's right of recovery under section 2542 of the Kentucky Statutes.

The plea of limitation in this case is as follows: "Further answering, this defendant says that Wm. H. Bolling died on the — day of May, 1891; that more than two years had elapsed since the date of said subscription to stock, and more than five years have so elapsed, and more than five years have elapsed since the date of his decease, and that no demand was ever made of her as executrix within five years after the date of the decease of the said Wm. H. Bolling. Wherefore, she pleads and relies upon the statutes of limitation in such cases made and provided as a bar to any recovery in this case.'"

It is not pleaded, and so far as this record discloses it is not a fact, that five years had elapsed from the date of the assessment against appellee's testator or his estate upon his subscription before the institution of this action. It is well settled that the subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is a promise to pay money, and that a right of action thereon, and consequently the beginning of the running of the statute of limitation thereon, is not until there has been a call or assessment made by the corporation, or by a court in proper proceedings for that purpose upon complaint of creditors. (Cook on Stock and Stockholders, 104, 105, 195; Hawkins v. Glenn, 137 U. S., 319; Glenn v. Liggett, 135 U. S., 533; Lewis v. Glenn, 84 Virginia, 947; Calloway v. Glenn, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1447.)

It appears, therefore, that the Kentucky Statute of limitation did not apply, and that the Virginia Statute of limitation of three years was not pleaded nor relied upon.

The sole remaining question then is, did the decree of the Bedford Circuit Court of Virginia, affirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, relieve appellee of this assessment? In that case, which seems to have been an action by creditors of the corporation for a liquidation, appellant was appointed receiver, and an assessment of 35 per cent. was made upon all stock subscriptions. In that suit certain stockholders named were made parties defendant. Those stockholders so named, appearing and pleading for themselves alone, relied each upon the statute of limitation of three years above referred to. The circuit court held, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, that the stock subscription being by parol, and a cause of action having accrued on the day that the order making the assessment by the court was entered, to wit, June 10, 1893, and the amended petition making the stockholders parties for the purpose of recovering the assessment against them, not filed until March 31, 1897, that the three years' statute applied to such stockholders, and that they were discharged. Appellee was not a party to that suit, nor was her intestate.

In Calloway v. Glenn, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1447, this court held that the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction of a sister State in a suit by a creditor of a corporation against the corporation for the purpose of requiring assessments to be made against stockholders was binding upon the stockholders who were not parties to that decree, it being held expressly that such stockholders were such privies to the proceedings as to be bound by the decree. But that case did not hold, nor does the question seem to have been involved, that the decree was binding on such stockholders who were not parties to any other extent than to establish the legal status of the obligation as one due, that is, that it had the effect of being a call made upon stockholders. Of course it could not be said that such a decree bound those who were claimed by the corporation to be stockholders, when in fact that had not been stockholders; and the question of their being bound by their subscription or being discharged by any legal act does not seem to have been discussed. As a matter of fact one stockholder might be relieved by the lapse of time, as, for example, where his subscription was by parol and more than three years had elapsed from the date of the call, and another stockholder might be bound upon a written subscription, and although more than three years had gone by after the call, yet he would not be released under the Virginia statute, five years being the statutory bar upon such written contracts in Virginia, as we understand it.

The Virginia decree making the call and directing the receiver to institute proceedings, therefore, is res adjudicata to all who are shown to be stockholders as to the fact of the necessity for the call, of its legality, and of its precipitating the date when the subscription is due to be paid.

The Supreme Court of Appeals did not hold, nor does the judgment of the Virginia Circuit Court hold, that the order appointing the receiver and the order making the assessment upon the stock was invalid, or that the rights of the receiver thereunder were barred by the lapse of time except as to those stockholders whose subscriptions were by parol, and who had been sued in that jurisdiction, and who had pleaded and relied upon that statute. It is universally held that the plea of limitation is a personal plea, to be available alone to the party in whose behalf it may exist. Whether the Virginia statute of three years referred to applies to nonresidents of Virginia upon contracts made in that State, or to those who are beyond the jurisdiction of that court for some period of the time within which suit might have been brought, and, therefore, could not be sued upon their personal obligations in the courts of that State, does not appear in this action. Generally there are saving clauses in such statutes of limitation for such cases. But that question is not presented. The sole question is whether the matter of appellee's liability is res adjudicata by virtue of the decision of the Virginia court above discussed. We hold that it is not.

It does not appear in this record that an action on the call made by the Bedford Circuit Court of Virginia might not be maintained in the courts of Virginia. For all this record shows it could be, except to such as had been barred by the Virginia statute, when pleaded. But the Virginia statute applicable to one situated as appellee is, is not pleaded, and we are not informed what that statute may be. Nor is section 2541, Kentucky Statutes, pleaded as a defense.

The judgment must be reversed and cause remanded, with directions for a new trial and for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. ROBERTS.

(Filed December 11, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Damages—Master and servant—Instructions—Appellee, a section hand, was engaged in drawing spikes from the ties with a clawbar when another workman with a spike maul struck the clawbar for the purpose of facilitating the work of appellee, and a splinter flew off the maul and struck appellee in the eye, destroying his sight, for which this action was instituted to recover damages, and a judgment resulted in favor of appellee. Errors in instructions are relied on for a reversal. Held—That the court properly instructed the jury that it was the duty of the master to furnish safe and suitable tools for these workmen, and that if it failed to do so, and the defect in the spike maul so furnished was known to the master, or it could have known it by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care, and that appellee did not know of such defect, if defect there was, then the jury should find for the plaintiff. Appellant can not complain of an instruction given as to the measure of damages as it offered no instruction on this point.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee, a workman on the section force of appellant road, was injured in this manner: It was his duty as such workman to draw spikes from the railroad ties. To do so he inserted what was called a clawbar under the head of the spike, and when the spike was driven so tight that it would not take the clawbar, it was the duty of a fellow workman to drive it under with a stroke of a highly-tempered steel maul, called a spike maul, and in driving such spike from the stroke of the maul upon the clawbar, which was metal, a splinter flew off of the side of the spike maul and struck appellee in the eye, if not destroying it totally, at least seriously impairing its vision.

The court instructed the jury as to appellee's right of recovery, that it was the duty of the master to furnish safe and suitable tools for these workmen, and that if it failed to do so, and the defect in the spike maul so furnished was known to the master, or it could have known it by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care, and that appellee did not know of such defect, if defect there was, then the jury should find for the plaintiff.

The principal objection urged against this instruction is that it did not also submit to the jury the question of appellee's knowledge in this language: Unless the jury should believe that appellee knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care might have known, of the defect in the spike maul, if defect there was, etc.

Whether such an extension should be given in some cases, in this case it was not shown that it was appellee's duty to handle the implement found by the jury to have been defective, that is, the spike maul. Therefore, the question of his opportunity to know its condition does not appear to have been relevant in this case, because, at the utmost, his opportunity for knowing would not be carried further than an examination of those tools with which he himself was required to work. The court is of opinion that the qualification asked for appellant was properly refused.

The instruction to the jury as to the measure of damages is not exactly accurate, but appellant asked for no other instruction on this subject; certainly it did not ask for one embodying the points now urged on the appeal. It has been so frequently held that it is deemed unnecessary to again elaborate the idea, that in a civil case, unless the objecting party offers an instruction covering the point of his objection, he will not be heard upon appeal to complain of the inadequate instruction given. There was evidence in this case that the defective condition of the spike maul might have been known to, or was known to, appellant's inspector of tools, and that there was such evidence of negligence as warranted the submission of the case to the jury and to sustain their verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. VISER, &c.

(Filed December 11, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Indictment—Obtaining money under false pretense—This appeal involves the sufficiency of an indictment against appellees, charging them with representing to D. that a note for $60 was signed by A and B, and was genuine and obtained thereon the sum of $75, when in fact said note was null and void, and there was a legal defense to same. Held—That said indictment was insufficient. The charge that the note was null and void: also that there was a legal defense to same, are but legal conclusions and insufficient, as it was necessary to state facts showing the note to be void, and also the facts constituting the legal defense should have been stated.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellant.

E. H. Gaither for appellees.

Appeal from Lincoln Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

The appellees were indicted by the grand jury of Lincoln county, charged with the offense of obtaining money under false pretenses. The defendants entered a demurrer to the indictment, which was sustained by the court, and the prosecution dismissed, and from that judgment the Commonwealth has appealed. The indictment reads as follows: "The grand jury of the county of Lincoln, in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth aforesaid, accuse William M. Viser and G. L. Webb of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, committed in manner and form as follows: The said Wm. M. Viser and G. L. Webb, in the county and State aforesaid, on the — day of November, 1900, and before the finding of this indictment, did falsely pretend and represent to one George DeBorde that a certain promissory note, dated Stanford, Ky., October 24, 1900, due and payable ninety days after date to defendant, G. L. Webb, or order, for the sum of $80, negotiable and payable at the Lincoln County National Bank of Stanford, Ky., with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum after maturity until paid, and signed by Henry D. Phillips and H. D. Baughman; that said note was genuine and valid and that there was no legal defense to same, and did by said false pretenses and representations sell to and obtain from said George DeBorde, on the faith of said representations, the sum of $75 for the sale and transfer to said DeBorde of said note, with intent to commit a fraud upon said DeBorde, the said note being at the time absolutely null and void, and as defendants well knew subject to a legal defense, against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

The sufficiency of the indictment is the only question presented for decision. It will be seen from the indictment that the defendants are charged with selling a certain note executed by certain parties to one DeBorde. It is also alleged in the indictment that the note was absolutely null and void, and that defendants knew it was subject to a legal defense. The law is well settled that an indictment must be direct and certain as to the offense charged, and it must also state the facts constituting the offense with such precision and clearness as to enable the defendant to understand the charge, and to enable him to have a fair chance to answer and make defense. In the case at bar the indictment charges that the note sold by defendants to DeBorde was null and void, and that defendants knew it was subject to a legal defense. The averment as to the note being null and void is at most merely the conclusion of the pleader, and the same may be said as to the legal defense charged. It was necessary to state facts showing the note to be void, and also the facts constituting the legal defense should have been stated. In the absence of such averments the defendants could not know upon what grounds or by what means the Commonwealth would attempt to show that the note was void, or what facts would be relied upon as constituting the legal defense charged.

Our opinion is that the judgment of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the indictment should be, and it is, affirmed.

BURTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 12, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Dying declarations—This appeal is from a conviction of appellant for manslaughter, and involves the correctness of the ruling of the lower court in admitting statements of the deceased as his dying declarations. The proof shows that the deceased came to his death from stabs inflicted by appellant about 10 o'clock at night, and a physician who lived about twelve or fifteen miles from him was sent for and reached him some time the following day. After making an examination of his wounds the physician stated to deceased the belief that he would die. Deceased then stated his belief that he would die, and made the statement concerning the difficulty which was proposed to be proved as his dying declaration. The deceased lived about twelve days after he was stabbed, and was carried to appellant's house, where he remained a part of the time. Held—That the statements of deceased were properly admitted as his dying declaration. The length of time that transpires after making the declaration before death does not affect the admissibility of the testimony. The court will determine from all the surrounding circumstances whether the declarant at the time of making the statements believed that death was impending. The finding of the jury will not be disturbed.

B. B. Golden, S. H. Kash, A. B. Hampton and H. D. Hall for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Clay Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This is the second appeal of this case. The facts of the case are stated in the former opinion. (Burton v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1915.) The judgment was there reversed for certain errors in the instructions. On the return of the case to the circuit court it was again tried and appellant was again found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and his punishment fixed at three years in the penitentiary. The court admitted in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, the dying declaration of the deceased, who was stabbed by the defendant about 10 o'clock in the night. Doctor H. C. Hornsby lived about fourteen miles off and was sent for, reaching the wounded man some time the following day. He was permitted to testify as follows as to the declarations of the deceased to him:

"Q. Did you have a conversation with him as to whether or not he would live or die?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Did he express any hope of recovery?"

"A. I had waited on him previous to this time, when he had been shot and when he had the fever; he said he was in worse fix this time than before. This was before I made an examination. I then made an examination, and I remarked that he was killed."

"Q. What did he say as to whether or not he would get well or die?"

"A. He said he believed that he would die."

"Q. How long did you stay with him?"

"A. I got there in the morning, and it seems to me that I stayed all night; I am not certain that I did."

"Q. Did he make any statement to you as to how the difficulty came up?"

To this question the defendant objected; the objection was sustained by the court and the jury were sent out of the room; the witness was then examined by the court as follows:

"Q. Tell me all about the condition of Mr. Davidson?"

"A. Well, we might say there were six or seven stabs, but the one on the arm wasn't fatal; the one on the breast wasn't fatal; the one under the arm was fatal; the two or three wounds in the back were each fatal wounds."

"Q. What did he say to you before you examined him?"

"A. He said he thought he was killed; I said probably not so; I hope not."

"Q. What effect did that have on him?"

"A. It roused him up and gave him some hope, seemed like.

"Q. After you examined him, tell how fully you acquainted him with his condition?"

"A. I went ahead and examined him, and after making an examination, and before I dressed the wounds, I told him I thought he was killed."

"Q. How long a time did you spend there?"

"A. I don't remember."

"Q. How long after he was wounded until you saw him?"

"A. I couldn't say exactly; they came after me and I went; its about fourteen or fifteen miles from my house to Henry Martin's."

"Q. What did he say about the lick that killed him?"

"He remarked to me that as they brought him from the place where the difficulty took place they had to come in on a porch, and Mr. Burton stabbed him as they came up on that porch."

"Q. Where did he say that he stabbed him that time?"

"A. Under the arm."

"Q. Did he express any hope of recovery after that?"

"A. Not to me."

The deceased lived about twelve days after he was stabbed. In the meantime he was carried, at his request, from the house at which he was when the above took place to the house of the defendant, and remained there six or seven days before he died. In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 158, it is said: "The length of time which elapsed between the declaration and the death of the declarant furnishes no rule for the admission or rejection of the evidence; though in the absence of better testimony it may serve as one of the exponents of the deceased's belief that his dissolution was or was not impending. It is the impression of almost immediate dissolution and not the rapid succession of death, in point of fact, that renders the testimony admissible."

Where the following length of time elapsed between the making of the declaration and the death of the declarant the evidence was admitted: Ten days (McDaniel v. State, 47 Am. Dec., 93); eleven days (Jones v. State, 71 Ind., 66); twelve days (People v. Burt, 64 N. Y. Sup., 417); sixteen days (Baxter v. State, 15 Lea., 657); seventeen days (Commonwealth v. Cooper, 81 Am. Dec., 762). In other cases even a longer interval has been held insufficient to prevent the admission of the evidence. (Kirkham v. People, 170 Ill., 9; Fulcher v. State, 28 Tex. Ap., 465; State v. Nocton, 121 Mo., 537; Titus v. State, 117 Ala., 16; State v. Crane, 120 N. C., 601.)

In Polly v. Commonwealth, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 502, the doctor was called in to see the deceased in a few hours after he was shot, and informed him that he would die; he died the second night after he was shot; when he made the declaration he said he could not live. It was held the declarations were properly admitted.

The rule is that in determining whether the declaration was made under a sense of impending death, the court will not only consider what the deceased said, but the circumstances surrounding him at the time and his condition then as shown by the proof. (Peoples v. Commonwealth, 87 Ky., 487; Commonwealth v. Matthews, 89 Ky., 287.)

In the case before us, as is shown, the deceased had at least three mortal wounds, either one of which would have been fatal; the physician reached him on the next day after his injury, and after examining him told him that he was killed, and the deceased said he believed he would die. The nature of the wounds, the length of time that had elapsed since he received them, the advice of the physician and the condition of the deceased at the time, all taken together, must have satisfied the deceased that death was impending, and we see no reason for disturbing the ruling of the trial judge in admitting the evidence. We see no error in the instructions of the court; they fairly presented the law of the case. The verdict of the jury appears to have been based on the testimony introduced by the Commonwealth, to the effect that appellee said while he had hold of the gun, and was cutting the deceased with his knife: "A man that will serve my family like you have, I will stab my knife to the hollow in you." The jury also, no doubt, came to the conclusion, from the circumstances shown by the evidence, that appellee had drawn his knife and had it ready for use before he and the deceased got into the struggle over the gun.

Judgment affirmed.

IGO v. IRVINE.

(Filed December 12, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Trusts—A testator devised his estate to his four children absolutely, but in a subsequent clause of the will expressed a request that either of his children dying without issue would devise his share to the survivors or to the children of any who might be dead. The question involved on this appeal is whether one of the children, as devisee, had authority to sell his land and invest the purchaser with a fee-simple title. Held—That the devisee obtained a fee-simple title under the will, and is not charged with any trust, and could vest his vendee with a fee-simple title.

J. A. Sullivan for appellant.

R. W. Miller for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

This appeal brings before us the will of David Irvine for construction. It was probated in the Madison County Court on the 15th day of August, 1872, and divided a large landed and personal estate between his four children, two sons and two daughters. The special question which we are asked to determine upon the appeal is whether his son, David W. Irvine, takes under it a fee simple title to a tract of 222.89 acres of land, which he has contracted to sell to the appellant, B. M. Igo, or whether he takes it charged with a trust, enforceable in equity, in favor of the surviving children of testator or the issue of those who may be dead, in the event of his death without legal issue. The fourth clause of the will of testator is as follows: "I will and bequeath to my son, David W. Irvine, my tract of land lying and being in Madison county, on the Richmond and Lexington turnpike road, known as the Dudley place, deeded to me by Waller and William Chenault, containing about 180 acres. I also will and bequeath to my son, David W. Irvine, forty-five acres of the Newland land, reserved out of that tract and not willed in the third clause to I. Shelby Irvine, said forty-five acres to be laid off on the Richmond and Lexington turnpike road along the north line of the Dudley tract above mentioned to the Shackelford road, in such manner as to suit the land herein willed to my son, Isaac Shelby Irvine."

It is contended that the title conveyed by this clause of testator's will is limited by a subsequent clause, which reads as follows: "I make it as a request of my children that if any of them should die without issue, that in so far as they may have received any estate from me, that at their death they 'will' the same to my surviving children or the issue of those that may be dead. I think this is but a reasonable request, and I have confidence that it will be complied with by my children."

The doctrine of implied or precatory trusts was carried to great lengths by the early English and American cases. Thus, if a testator made an absolute gift to one person in his will, and accompanied the gift with words expressing a desire, will, request, wish, hope or recommendation, have been held sufficient to raise a trust where the subject and object are sufficiently certain. (Perry on Trusts, section 112, and authorities there cited.) But the later English and American cases have departed from the doctrine of the early cases and have inclined toward the doctrine of giving precatory words and expressions only their natural force. (Hill on Trusts, section 71.) The existing law on this question is well stated by Judge Gray in Hess v. Singular, 114 Mass., 56, and it is quoted with approval in Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S., 800, as follows: "It is a settled doctrine of courts of chancery that a devise or bequest to one person, accompanied by words expressing a wish, entreaty, or recommendation, that he will apply it to the benefit of others, may be held to create a trust, if the subject and objects are sufficiently certain. Some of the earlier English cases had a tendency to give this doctrine the weight of an arbitrary rule of construction. But the later cases in this, and in all other questions of the interpretation of wills, the intention of the testator as gathered from the whole will controls the court; in order to create a trust it must appear that the words were intended by the testator to be imperative, and when property is given absolutely and without restriction a trust is not to be lightly imposed upon by mere words of recommendation."

And the question was very fully considered by this court in Major v. Hernon, 78 Ky., 123, and Bohon v. Barrett's Adm'r, 79 Ky., 378.

Testator placed no restriction upon appellee's right to sell and convey the tract of land in controversy in the fourth clause of the will, and the words quoted above, which appear in a subsequent clause of his will, were not, in our opinion, intended by the testator to be imperative. They do not refer to any special property, but are general, and amount to a mere request that his children dying without issue will give to their surviving brothers and sisters and their descendants property in the aggregate equal to that received by them under the provisions of testator's will. We are of the opinion that appellee, David W. Irvine, was vested with a fee simple title to the property in controversy, and that his deed conveyed the same character of title to appellant.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

CALL v. SHEWMAKER, &c.

(Filed December 12, 1901—Not to be reported.)

I. H. Thurman and J. W. S. Clements for appellant.

Nat W. Halstead for appellees.

Appeal from Washington Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

This case is here simply on a demurrer to the petition. There is not enough in the petition to raise the question of laches. This must be done by answer. We only determine now that the petition states a cause of action. We do not determine whether the title to the fifty acres of land referred to in the third item of the will is subject to the same conditions as the remainder of the land referred to in the fourth clause, for the reason that this question is not material now, and whether it will be material at a later stage of the case we can not know now. So no opinion is expressed on this matter.

The petition for rehearing is overruled.

RUFF v. BAUMBACH, &c.

(Filed December 12, 1902.)

Wills—Construction—A testator devised his estate to his widow for her life, and directed that at her death it should be equally divided between his children "then living." It is contended that it was the evident intention of the testator to limit the estate to his children living at the death of the widow, and exclude the grandchildren, provided any of the children should die before the widow. Held—That the use of the word "living" by the testator does not manifest an intention to exclude the descendants of those who may be dead, and they are entitled to stand in the shoes of their ancestor in the division of the estate.

Wm. Marshall Bullitt for appellant.

Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

In November, 1868, Gallas Ruff and his daughter, Mary Baumbach, whilst driving together, collided with a train of cars, which resulted in the instant death of Mary Baumbach, and that of Gallas Ruff three days thereafter. He left surviving him a widow, Theresia Ruff, and four children, Joseph Ruff, Michael Ruff, Caroline Ruff Klenzlen and Magdalena Ruff Schloemer; and his daughter, Mary Baumbach, left surviving her four infant children and her husband, the appellee, George Baumbach. Shortly after the death of Gallas Ruff his will was probated in the Jefferson County Court. It reads as follows:

"I, Gallas Ruff, of Louisville, Ky., being of sound mind and disposing memory, do hereby make, publish and declare this to be my last will and testament:

"1st. I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid as soon as expedient after my death by my executrix, hereinafter named.

"2d. I will and devise to each of my beloved children living at my death the sum of $100.

"3d. All the balance of my estate, real, personal and mixed, I will, bequeath and devise to my beloved wife, Theresia Ruff, during her life and widowhood, and after her death I devise, will and direct that same shall be equally divided between my children then living.

"4th. I hereby nominate, constitute and appoint my beloved wife sole executrix of this my last will and testament, as well as guardian of my children, and request and direct that no security be required of her in either capacity.

"In testimony whereof, witness my name.

"GALLAS RUFF.

"This 15th of July, 1895."

After the death of the life tenant, Theresia Ruff, the entire estate disposed of by the will of Gallas Ruff was divided between his four children then living to the exclusion of the infant children of Mary Baumbach. In October, 1898, the appellee, George Baumbach, instituted this suit against the surviving children of Gallas Ruff and the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as guardian of Minnie and George Baumbach, two of his infant children, in which he alleged that two of his children who survived their mother had died; and that he, as their heir at law, and the two surviving children were entitled to what would have been the interest of Mary Baumbach in the estate of Gallas Ruff, her father, if she had survived him. The defendants answered that by the will of their father his entire estate at the death of the mother belonged to his then living children; and that it had been regularly apportioned between them under a judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court. The lower court decided that at the death of Mary Baumbach her husband and children became the owners of the share which she would have taken in the estate of her father if she had survived him, and from that judgment the surviving children of Gallas Ruff have appealed.

In construing provisions of wills similar to the one in controversy in this proceeding this court has held in a number of opinions that they must be construed in the light of sections 2064 and 4841 of the Kentucky Statutes, which read as follows:

"Section 2064. When a devise is made to several as a class, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before testator, and another or others shall survive the testator, the share or shares of such as so die shall go to his or their descendants, if any; if none, to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser. A devise to children embraces grandchildren when there are no children, and no other construction will give effect to the devise.

"Section 4841. If a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take the estate devised or bequeathed as the devisee or legatee would have done if he had survived the testator, unless a different disposition is made or required by the will."

It was held in Reneker v. Lemon, 62 Ky., 211, Dunlap v. Shrieve's Adm'r, 63 Ky., 834, and Chenault's Gd'n v. Chenault's Ex'or, 88 Ky., 84, that section 4841 of the statutes had changed the common law rule of construction of the word "children" so as to embrace grandchildren, unless a different disposition was required by the will. Appellants do not controvert that such was the intention and effect of these decisions, but insist that by the use of the words "children then living," the testator clearly intended to exclude grandchildren from any participation in his estate. The cardinal rule in the construction of wills, and to which all other rules must bend, is that the intention of the testator expressed in his will shall prevail, provided it be consistent with the rules of law. Before the enactment of the statutes quoted supra the construction contended for would have followed from the plain import of the words of testator, but as the right to dispose of property by last will and testament is a statutory one, the language of the will must be considered in connection with the statutes.

In the case of Smith, by Gd'n v. Miller's Adm'r the will provided that at the death of testator's widow his estate should be equally divided among his then living children, and it was held that the testator used the term children in the general sense of issue, and that there was nothing in the will to indicate that it was his intention to exclude the descendants of any of his children from an equal division of the property devised. This case is sharply criticised in brief of counsel, but it does not stand alone, as he seems to think; but was substantially followed in the very recent case of Evans v. Henderson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 363. In that case the deviser gave his estate to his wife for life, and provided that at her death the property should go to his living children, share and share alike. One of the children died after the testator, but during the life tenancy of the widow, leaving children, and it was held that the language of the will was not sufficient to show an intention on the part of the testator to deprive the children of his dead son of the share which he would have inherited had he survived the widow; and that the share of the dead child passed under the will to the grandchildren of testator. It is impossible to distinguish these two cases from the one at bar. They hold that a devise to "living children or surviving children" is simply equivalent to a devise to children; that the use of the word "living" by the testator does not manifest an intention to exclude the descendants of those who may be dead, and that they are entitled to stand in the shoes of their ancestor in the division of the estate.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. TAYLOR.

(Filed December 12, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Railroads — Damages — Negligence — Evidence — Continuance — Appellee brought this action against appellant to recover damages resulting from alleged negligence in the employes of appellant in operating a passenger car and recovered a judgment for $833, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

She alleges in her petition that she was a passenger on one of its cars and the conductor announced the name of the station, which was her destination; the car stopped and the brakeman picked up her baggage and told her that this was her station. The train had passed beyond the platform, and as she placed her hand on the door facing the car backed, and stopped with a sudden jerk, causing the door to slam and mash her hand and wrist, inflicting permanent injuries. On the trial no instructions were objected or excepted to except the order overruling the motion for a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant. Held—That it was not error to refuse a peremptory instruction. Appellant insists that the court erred in refusing to grant a continuance on account of absent witnesses. All of the witnesses whose statements are embraced in the affidavit except one appeared and testified, and more than one of them testified to the same facts as to slight injury to appellee's hand, and the absence of the testimony of this one witness could not have been prejudicial to appellant. This court will not reverse a case on account of the refusal of the court to permit a witness to testify, who had been present in the court room contrary to a rule providing for a separation of the witnesses where the record does not disclose what his testimony would have been.

H. P. Taylor and Pirtle & Trabue for appellant.

M. L. Heaverin for appellee.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

The appellee, who was plaintiff in the court below, instituted this action in the Ohio Circuit Court against the appellant to recover $1,000 for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the appellant.

The substance of the allegation of the petition is that on the — day of January, 1901, she was a passenger on one of defendant's passenger trains from Rosine, Ohio county, Kentucky, to Render, Ohio county, Kentucky, and as such paid the conductor the regular and customary fare; that at the time she arrived at her destination, Render, Kentucky, and was attempting to leave said train, that the defendant, by its servants, etc., managed and operated said train in such a careless and reckless manner as to cause the door of said train to slam to and mash and injure plaintiff's hand; that when the train arrived at Render that the conductor in charge of said train called the station, and that when the train came to a standstill the porter took possession of her grip, or valise, and started to leave the train, he and the conductor telling her that they had arrived at Render, the place where she was to leave said train, and that she being thus informed, did attempt to leave said train, and when she got to the door of said train, and was aiming to get out of same, the servants and agents in charge of said train started to move the train backwards, and in doing so gave the train a sudden and violent jerk, thereby causing the door of said train to violently close, catching her hand between the door and facing, mashing and injuring her hand and wrist to such an extent that she has entirely lost the use of her right arm, which is now perished, and that her said injuries are permanent; that at the time the train came to a standstill it had passed the station, which fact was well known to the conductor in charge and the servants and agents and employes of said defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff, and while the train was standing still and the agents in charge of same calling the station, which was her destination, she, in good faith, believing that the train was then at the platform, attempted to leave the train, and in so doing received the injuries complained of above, all of which was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants, agents and employes in charge of said train, and in the careless and reckless manner in which they operated and managed said train; that her injuries are permanent, and she is now, and has been continuously since the time she received said injuries, unable to labor or even to dress herself; that her hand is so that she can not use it, to her great damage in the sum of $1,000, for which she prayed judgment.

The answer is a traverse of the averments of negligence or carelessness upon the part of the defendant, as well as a denial that the conductor called the station as alleged, or at all, or that the train came to a standstill; and, in short, may be taken as a traverse of all the allegations of the petition which show a right to recover.

In the second paragraph of the answer it is alleged that the plaintiff attempted to leave one of the coaches at Render, and in attempting to do so she carelessly, negligently and recklessly placed her hand upon the door facing of said coach while the train was in motion, and that the necessary stoppage of said train at said place caused the door to slam against plaintiff's hand, catching the same, but without injuring the same, or permanently hurting or injuring plaintiff at all; and that the plaintiff was reckless, careless and negligent in this, that she went to said door of said coach while the train was in motion, knowing well that the train would come to a full stop, and that she had ample time to alight from same, and that the injury complained of, if plaintiff was injured at all, was caused and occasioned by her own carelessness, recklessness and negligence, and would not have occurred except for her own fault, and was without fault upon the part of defendant. The reply of plaintiff is a complete traverse of all the affirmative averments of the answer.

A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $833, and appellant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, it prosecutes this appeal. The grounds relied on for a new trial are as follows:

1st. Because the court erred in refusing to sustain a demurrer to the petition.

2d. Because the court refused to sustain defendant's motion for a peremptory instruction.

3d. Because the verdict of the jury is against the evidence, and is contrary to the law.

4th. Because of incompetent testimony allowed by the plaintiff in the case over defendant's objections and exceptions

5th. Because the court failed and refused to permit the defendant to introduce competent testimony, which is fully set out in the affidavit filed herein.

The absent witnesses were Ed. Rowe, Judson Rowe, Leslie Myers, Dr. E. W. Ford and Dr. E. B. Pendleton, whom it is alleged were subpoenaed herein; that it could prove by Ed. and Judson Rowe that at the time of the alleged injury the plaintiff visited their house; that they, and each of them, knew that she was not injured by the defendant on her hand, or otherwise, because she attended persistently, day by day and night by night, a protracted meeting that was in session at Render, this county; that she took an active part in said meeting, and that she participated in the exhortations belonging to same, by throwing up her hands and shouting, and that if her hand was injured to any extent that might hurt or injure her permanently, or at all, the same was caused by her own fault; that U. M. Everly, a witness herein, will state practically the same that Ed. Rowe and Judson Rowe will state; that he knew, saw and was with plaintiff immediately after her arrival at Render upon the occasion of the alleged injury, saw her clap her hands and shout in church, and that she was perfectly well and without injury at that time; that by Ford and E. B. Pendleton, regular practicing physicians, it can show on a trial of this case by the testimony of said physicians, that an injury occurring to the hand, as described in the petition by the slamming of the door, on the 23d of January, 1901, or at any other time, if serious, would have resulted in fever, serious swelling, and probably an amputation within three days, and that the plaintiff could not have received such injuries as would have affected her permanently by the slamming of the door, except that she would have been within three days laid up, suffering with fever, and possibly an amputation of the fractured bones.

It appears that the Rowses and the doctors named in the affidavit were introduced as witnesses in the case, and that the two Rowses proved substantially the same facts that it is said that Everly would have testified to. The affidavit does not show what was expected to be proven by the other witnesses. The instructions given by the court were quite as favorable to the appellant as it was entitled to, and no exceptions were taken to any of the instructions given, nor any complaint made of the refusing of instructions, except the refusal of the court to give a peremptory instruction for the defendant.

The plaintiff testified in substance that when the train got to Render that the porter halloed at the door and said "Render," and picked up her valise, and said "this is your station," and after the train stopped she got up and went to the door, and just as she got to the door they commenced moving the train back, and two men motioned for her to move back, and she stopped; she did not know where they had to move it to, and when they moved the train it crushed on her hand, the door came to on her hand, and the train went with a terrible jerk; that the train had gone on down and the porter got off down in a ditch, beyond the getting off place, and had her valise. She then exhibited her hand and arm to the jury, and testified that her hand was perishing away, and that she could not dress herself, or even comb her hair. She also stated she did not call in the services of a physician, and that Mrs. Rowe furnished her some liniment, and that she stayed there three days, and that she did attend the meeting day and night that was going on at Render.

R. F. Stevens fully sustained the plaintiff in regard to the announcement of the stoppage, and then the backing of the train with a jerk. Mrs. Stevens also sustained the plaintiff in her testimony in regard to the injury, and to the same effect is the testimony of Miss Lilly Austin.

The conductor, Putman, testified for the defendant in effect that the train was in good order, and that he only ran about the length of a car beyond the platform, and had no recollection of seeing Mrs. Taylor.

William Curley is a locomotive engineer; was on No. 121, between Louisville and Paducah; knew nothing about the injury; did not know whether he ran past the station and had to back, or not; testified that such things often happen; that they had an extra car on that day.

R. A. Moore was called on behalf of the defendant and sworn, but his testimony was objected to because of the ruling that the witness should not remain in the courthouse during the trial, he having testified that he was in most of the time and heard Curley testify, and heard part of Putman's testimony.

Ed. Rowe was examined for defendant, and testified in substance that he saw the plaintiff on that day; after she got to his house she spoke to him about her injuries; he did not think she did before. She said she put her hand on the door facing and the door slammed and caught her hand; she did not ask for a doctor or medical service; he saw a little raised place on her hand, and it looked more like a contraction of the muscles; that she got to his house on Wednesday and left Friday, and did not ask for any treatment that he knew of, but might have gotten some treatment; did not hear her complain very much; he furnished no medicine; the doctor was there in the house, and she asked for no medical treatment; he did not know what his wife did for her.

Judson Rowe was called for defendant. He saw the plaintiff at his father's house on the 28d of January, at night; she had been to church that night; saw her up in the crowds, she was shaking hands in the crowd, but did not know whether she was shouting or not, and that she never complained of any injury to her hand in his presence, and that he knew and saw her every day while she stayed at his father's house. At this point the attorney for defendant offered to read his affidavit for continuance, which was overruled.

Dr. E. W. Ford was called as a witness, and testified in substance that he did not think a woman near on to sixty years of age, with such mash of her hand as that, it would perish away and she could not use it, would be able to attend a protracted meeting of three or four days, day and night, without complaint, or able physically to go to that meeting without complaint; and his testimony tended to show that if such an injury had been inflicted she would have had fever, and not been able to have attended meeting. He was also of the opinion that vinegar and saltpeter would not cure a broken bone.

Dr. E. B. Pendleton testified to the same effect substantially, but said that there had been bones broken in the body without the person being conscious of it.

Leslie Myers also testified in this case, but his testimony is unimportant.

It is insisted for appellant that the court erred in not granting a continuance upon the affidavit filed, and especially erred in not allowing so much of it read as stated the facts that it could prove by Everly. It will be seen that the two doctors referred to in the affidavit were introduced by the defendant and testified, and so were the two Rowes. The affidavit does not state what it could prove by the other witnesses mentioned herein, and Myers was introduced and knew nothing pertinent to the case. Rowe proved substantially the facts that it was proposed to prove by Everly, which facts were not contradicted by the plaintiff. Everly's statement was not material to the defense, and especially in view of the fact that substantially the same evidence was introduced by other witnesses and not disputed by the plaintiff.

Complaint is made because the court refused to allow R. A. Moore to testify for the reason that a rule had been entered requiring the witnesses to remain out of hearing of the witness testifying, it appearing that Moore had been in the courthouse hearing the testimony of other witnesses. It does not appear that Moore had ever been summoned or theretofore sworn as a witness, nor is there any statement or avowal made by the defendant as to what it expected to prove by Moore. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing to allow Moore to testify; nor did it err in refusing to allow the affidavit to be read as the deposition of Everly. At any rate, it does not appear at all that defendant was prejudiced by the ruling of the court in respect to the affidavit, or in respect to the testimony of Moore. As to the other objections of testimony, the court did not err to the prejudice of defendant. In fact almost, if not every, objection to testimony made during the trial was decided by the court in favor of the defendant.

The fact that plaintiff was seriously injured without any fault or negligence on her part seems to have been abundantly proven, and no attempt was made by the appellant to show that, as a matter of fact, her arm had not perished, or to show that her testimony as to her inability to use it, or to dress herself, or to comb her hair, was not true. As stated before, the instructions of the court were extremely favorable to appellant, and the verdict is abundantly sustained by the testimony, and is evidently no more than reasonable compensation for the injury inflicted.

After a careful consideration of this entire record we are clearly of the opinion that the plaintiff clearly showed herself entitled to recover, and that no error to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the appellant occurred.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

RONE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Manslaughter—Instructions—Appellant was indicted and convicted for manslaughter and prosecutes this appeal. The facts show that appellant and the deceased were drinking some, and left Bowling Green in a buggy together after night, and that appellant shot and killed the deceased while they were in the buggy together, some difficulty having arisen between them. Appellant complains because the court in an instruction used the words "that he had no other safe, or apparently safe, means of escape from said danger." Held—That said words were error, but under the circumstances proven were not prejudicial.

2. Continuance—The affidavit filed as a basis for a motion for a continuance asked a continuance on account of the absence of counsel, who he thought he had employed, but who refused to go into the trial unless his fee was paid; also on account of absent witnesses, who would prove that four or five days after the killing they noticed a bruise on appellant's face. Held—That the court did not err in refusing a continuance as the counsel who acted in the case were competent, and, besides, the attorney, on account of whose absence the continuance was asked, appeared during the trial and participated in it. The evidence of the absent witnesses was immaterial, besides, appellant was permitted to prove on the trial that on the night of the killing there was a mark of a blow on appellant's face.

3. Evidence—Evidence as to a difficulty between appellant and appellee in Bowling Green on the day of the difficulty was competent as is showed that the deceased had interfered and took up for some negroes, as appellant had stated that was the cause of the difficulty.

Sims & Grider and Nerge Clark for appellant.

N. A. Porter, T. W. Thomas, C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

The appellant was indicted by the grand jury of Warren county and charged with murder in killing C. V. Savory. Upon trial he was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, his punishment being fixed at twenty-one years' confinement in the penitentiary, and he appeals.

The facts of the killing, so far as they are undisputed, appear to be that appellant and deceased left Bowling Green together in a buggy, their destination being Tim Cherry's, near Richardsville, some eight or ten miles distant. They were drinking some. Appellant was sitting on the right-hand side of the buggy driving. When these two got within hearing of Cherry's house Savory was shot and killed, receiving four shots from a pistol in the head, one above and back of the ear, one in the back of the head, one in the neck under the ear, severing the jugular vein and another in the chin near the corner of the mouth. Either of the first three above described wounds would have been fatal. Several persons at Cherry's heard five pistol shots, and shortly afterwards appellant drove up in a buggy and informed them he had had some trouble with Savory. They started to go, and it was suggested that water and camphor be taken, when appellant said neither would do Savory any good. The Cherrys and appellant went to Savory, who was found dead, lying on his side in the road, with his feet in the middle of the road and his head toward the ditch, his hands were in front of him and very bloody inside and out. Near his hands lay a pistol, full loaded, but without any blood on it. Deceased's hat was found twenty-one steps back towards Bowling Green, and from the hat to the body were blood spots on the ground. Before the body was reached by the Cherrys with appellant he was asked why he shot Savory, what the trouble was about; he replied he did not know; had better not talk. Two of the witnesses (Cherrys) say appellant said in addition to the above: "I got into two or three fusses in the town at Savory's house and the damn son-of-a-bitch took up for the negroes." However, appellant denies this.

No person witnessed the difficulty, and the only statement of the facts of the killing is related by appellant himself. His testimony is that in coming out a small package was lost out of the buggy, and Savory accused him, Rone, of losing it, and demanded pay for the value of the package and when he refused to pay Savory struck him and drew a pistol; appellant grabbed the pistol and held the hand, drew his own and shot Savory. All this occurred in the buggy. Appellant then jumped out of the buggy, leaving the body of Savory in the buggy, and after the body had fallen out of the buggy appellant caught the horse and drove over to Cherry's and informed them of the difficulty.

The Commonwealth was permitted to prove over appellant's objection that while in Bowling Green appellant had a difficulty, or war of words, with some negroes while at Savory's house, and appellant drew his pistol on an old negro woman and attempted to make a negro boy dance and stand on his head, by threats and exhibiting his pistol; that Savory remonstrated with him for such conduct and told him to apologize to the negroes.

This testimony was all objected to by appellant. The Commonwealth also showed that appellant when he started to Bowling Green carried a pistol, and when there got another, thus having two. When appellant got to Cherry's house he gave up a pistol that had been fired in all five chambers, and had no other. There was a rifle in the buggy that belonged to Savory, but does not seem to have been used at all in the difficulty.

On the trial the court gave six instructions, on murder, voluntary manslaughter, doubt as to degree, two on reasonable doubt as to guilt and one on self-defense, which is the only one criticised. The objection to the sixth instruction is as to the use of the expression "that he had no other safe, or to him apparently safe, means of escape from said danger."

It is contended that this means that appellant was compelled to flee or run away, and that, therefore, it is error. Appellant complains of the action of the trial court in refusing a continuance. Appellant's affidavit for a continuance sets forth two grounds for continuance. One, that his counsel, whom he thought he had employed, refused to go into the trial of the case without the fee being paid or secured in advance, which at that time he was unable to do because of the lack of time. Another reason for continuance was the absence of two witnesses. By these two witnesses appellant proposed to prove that some three or four days after the killing of Savory they saw appellant, and he had a bruised place on his nose as if from a blow of some sort. After appellant's motion for continuance had been overruled, and during the trial, his attorney who it was said had refused to appear, did in fact appear and did assist in the defense. Counsel who prepared and filed the affidavit for continuance, and who selected the jury, was familiar with the case, and competent to present the defense.

We are of opinion there was no error in refusing the continuance. The testimony of the absent witnesses would have proved no fact pertinent to the case. Appellant proved by one witness that on the night of the difficulty there was a mark of a blow on appellant's face. There were two theories of the killing of Savory: One was a willful shooting by appellant because of the difficulty with the negroes, and the placing of the body and pistol in the road so as to appear that deceased had a pistol in his hands when shot; the other, was appellant's story showing a clear case of self-defense. This was submitted to the jury and they rejected appellant's story and found him guilty of manslaughter, when they were justified in a verdict of murder.

Under either state of case, as presented, the shooting was shown and admitted to have been while both were in the buggy side by side.

If the jury had concluded that appellant's account of the shooting was true, the expression escape from the danger by safe or apparently safe means, as used in the instruction, would not have prevented an acquittal. If there was a struggle with Savory, having his pistol drawn, there was no safe, or apparently safe, means to escape even. If Savory had threatened to kill appellant and drawn his pistol to do so, there was no means to escape as the two men were so close together. We are of opinion, therefore, that the instruction given did not, and could not, prejudice the substantial rights of appellant. If the jury had believed his story they must have said not guilty, regardless of his duty to avert the danger, or escape from the danger, as laid down in the instruction. They must have concluded also that there was no safe, or apparently safe, means of escape. We do not approve of the instruction as being a correct statement of the law, but we are of opinion that in this case, in view of the verdict and the facts proven, it was not prejudicial to appellant.

We are also of opinion there was no error in admitting the evidence as to the difficulties in Bowling Green as it proved that Savory had interfered and "took up for the negroes," as appellant stated was the cause of the shooting. Upon the whole case, as presented by this record, we conclude that appellant has had a fair trial, and that no error prejudicial to his substantial rights has been committed.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. COVINGTON AND CINCINNATI BRIDGE CO.

1. Taxation—Assessment for franchise taxes—The question involved on this appeal involves the fixing of a correct method for assessment of the franchise of a bridge company for taxation for the year 1901, where its tangible property is partly within and partly without the State. Held—That the correct method of making said assessment is to take the entire value of its entire property in both States and deduct from it the value of its tangible property, and the remainder will represent the value of its franchise for taxation, and as the length of the bridge in Kentucky is 59 per cent. of its whole length, this State is entitled to tax that proportion of the value of its franchise. The property of a bridge company, tangible and intangible, must be assessed as a whole. It will be presumed the part in this State is of equal value to the part of it out of the State.

2. Estoppel—The State Board of Valuation and Assessment can not, by fixing one method of assessment for one year, bind a subsequent board for another year to follow the same method. Each board may fix a different method of assessment if the law warrants it.

Clem J. Whittemore for appellant.

J. W. Bryan for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This was an agreed case submitted to the circuit court on the following agreement of facts: "The defendant, the Covington and Cincinnati Bridge Co., is, and was at all times herein referred to, a corporation both in Kentucky and Ohio, it having been incorporated in Kentucky by an act of the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, approved 17th of February, 1846, entitled 'An act incorporating the Covington and Cincinnati

Bridge Co.,' and having been incorporated in the State of Ohio by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, approved 26th of March, 1849, entitled 'An act to confirm the charter of the Covington and Cincinnati Bridge Co.,' it being specifically empowered by the said special act of the legislature of Ohio to construct and operate a bridge over the Ohio river, from Cincinnati, in that State, to the city of Covington, in Kentucky, and to charge and collect toll from persons going on such bridge in the State of Ohio, and to purchase and hold real estate in Ohio for the purpose of said bridge, and when the same could not be acquired by agreement, then to condemn such property in Ohio. Under the power and authority thus conferred in its charter by the legislatures of Kentucky and Ohio respectively, defendant constructed, and still owns and operates, a toll bridge over the Ohio river, and extending from Second street, in the city of Cincinnati, State of Ohio, to Second street, in the city of Covington, State of Kentucky. It on and before the 15th of September, 1900, owned the real estate therewith connected in the State of Ohio, a part of which it was compelled to, and did, acquire by and through condemnation proceedings, under the laws of the State of Ohio, in the courts of that State, in some instances going through the Supreme Court of Ohio.

"Said bridge is not, and never has been, a steam railroad bridge, but has been and is used by persons traveling on foot, horseback and in vehicles; also by street cars.

"On the 15th of September, 1900, the total length of this bridge, including approaches, which are a part thereof, was 2,720 feet. Of that there was in Kentucky (to low-water-mark on the Ohio side of the river) 1,604 feet, leaving 1,116 feet thereof in the State of Ohio, that is, 59 per cent. in length thereof was and is in the State of Kentucky. On the 15th of September, 1900, it made a written verified statement to the auditor of public accounts, as provided by section 4078, Kentucky Statutes, a copy of which is attached hereto as part hereof, marked 'A.'

"On the 15th of September, 1900, the value of the capital stock of defendant was $750,000, and such amount was its worth on the market, and it then had an outstanding mortgage bonded indebtedness of $580,000, being bonds it had issued and which were and are bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum. For the year 1900 it paid a dividend of 4 per cent. on its said $750,000 of capital stock, and had not paid a greater annual dividend on said stock for several years prior thereto. The value and worth on the market of its capital stock, and the bonded indebtedness on the 15th of September, 1900, was $1,330,000, and no more.

"The Commonwealth of Kentucky assessed for taxation for the year 1901 the tangible property of defendant in Kentucky at $452,000, and it has paid its taxes thereon to the State. The State of Ohio assessed for taxation for that year that part of defendant's bridge in that State at $237,984, and defendant has paid to the State of Ohio the taxes thereon.

"The Board of Valuation and Assessment of Kentucky fixed the value of defendant's franchises for taxation by Kentucky for the year 1901 in this way, to wit:

"It took what said board had fixed as the value of all defendant's property or capital stock for the preceding four years, to wit: Capital for 1897, $902,070; capital for 1898, $663,206; capital for 1899, $663,060, capital for 1900, $663,060, and adding these four years together made $2,931,396, and dividing that by four got an average for the four years of $730,349, and then fixed said $730,349 as the capitalization of defendant for the year 1901, and deducting therefrom the assessment of the tangible property in Kentucky, left $278,849 as the franchise valuation, and the tax rate being 47½ cents, made defendant's franchise tax for 1901 $1,322.16.

"Defendant denying the correctness or legality of this fixing or valuation of its franchise, and denying the right or power of said board to adopt such a mode or basis of arriving thereat, or its liability for the tax claimed thereon, refused to pay said $1,322.16, and defendant further insisting that the correct legal and proper valuation of its said franchise was, and would have been, for said year 1901 the sum of $180,489, and the tax it owed to the plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Kentucky, thereon was $857.32, and no more, paid in to the auditor of public accounts the said sum of $857.32 under an agreement that such payment of $857.32 was in no way to affect the question of defendant's liability for said claimed balance of $464.84, the question of such liability and of said assessment or valuation of defendant's franchise, and the method or basis upon which defendant's said franchise should be valued or fixed for taxation by said board to be determined by the courts.

"The earnings or receipts of defendant's bridge in Ohio for said year 1901 were $30,871.55, while in Kentucky they were $38,800.81.

"Wherefore, the parties presenting the questions herein made pray the judgment of the court thereon, such judgment embracing and giving such relief to the parties hereto respectively as they may be entitled to receive.

"ROBT. J. BRECKINRIDGE,

"Attorney General for plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

"J. W. BRYAN,

"Attorney for defendant, the Covington and Cincinnati Bridge Co."

On these facts the following questions were presented to the court for decision:

1st. Does the defendant (the bridge company) owe the plaintiff (the Commonwealth) the sum of $464.84, or any part thereof, on account of a tax of its franchise for the year 1901?

2d. What method or basis should be adopted by the State Board of Valuation and Assessment for fixing the value of the defendant's franchise for taxation by the Commonwealth of Kentucky?

The circuit court adjudged that the board in making the assessment adopted an improper mode, and that the defendant by the payment to the auditor of the sum of $857.32 had fully paid to the State the tax on its franchise for the year 1901 and owed no part of the $464.84 claimed by the State in addition to the amount which had been paid.

The court reached its conclusion by taking the total value of the bridge company's capital stock and bonded indebtedness, $1,830,000. From this amount it deducted the tangible property assessed for taxation in Ohio, $237,984, which left a balance of $1,092,016. As 59 per cent. of the bridge lay in Kentucky and 41 per cent. in Ohio, it took 59 per cent. of $1,092,016, which is $664,289, and from this it deducted the tangible property assessed in Kentucky, $452,000, which left a balance of $192,289 as the value of the Kentucky franchise.

It is insisted by the State that this is an erroneous method of arriving at the proper valuation of the franchise, for the reason that thus the bridge company is not taxed upon its entire property, and that the Kentucky authorities are not dependent upon the action of the officers of Ohio in fixing the value of the property of the bridge company. It is insisted for the State that the proper way to arrive at the valuation of the franchise is to take the total value, $1,830,000, and get 59 per cent. of it, which is $782,700, and that this represents the total of the tangible property and of the franchise in Kentucky. Therefore, if we deduct from this total $782,700 the assessment of the tangible property in Kentucky, $452,000, the balance, $330,700, is the value of the franchise. The board fixed the value of the franchise at $278,849, or considerably less than the result thus obtained.

It is insisted for appellee that the court below followed the case of Henderson Bridge Co. v. Commonwealth, 99 Ky., 623, and that this case has been approved in a number of subsequent opinions by this court. But that suit and all those following it were actions by the Commonwealth to recover taxes based on the assessment made by the board. The State was not complaining of the assessment; on the contrary it was endeavoring to enforce it. It had no right of action, except upon the assessment and no question, therefore, could be presented by the State as to the propriety of the assessment which it sought to enforce. The bridge company resisted the assessment, and in response to this the court said at the bottom of page 642 that the board followed out the line claimed by the defendant. But this action of that board did not prevent another board for another year from adopting a different line, if the law warranted it. There is nothing, therefore, in any of these cases determining that the board did not have a right to adopt another basis of assessment.

It is also insisted for appellee that the basis adopted by the board in this case, or the mode by which it reached its results, was erroneous. If this be conceded, still if the result reached by the board was correct or not more onerous on appellee than it should have been, the assessment can not be disturbed, for no principle is better settled than that if an officer is right in his conclusion, the fact that he gives bad reasons for it, or reached it in the wrong way is immaterial. If we subtract from the total value of all the property of appellee the value of its tangible property the balance represents necessarily its intangible property; and as the Constitution requires all property within the taxing district to bear its equal part of the public burden, this intangible property, so far as it is within the State, must be taxed as other property. While it does not necessarily follow that all parts of a bridge are of equal value, still the fact remains that its whole value is due to its entirety, and that one part of the bridge is practically of no value, at least as a bridge, without the other. Prima facie it should be presumed, where part of a bridge lies in Kentucky and part in another State, that the value of the structure in the two States is in proportion to the length of the bridge in each, for the value of the property depends upon its use as a bridge, and the franchise, it seems to us, must necessarily be apportioned the same way. If it should be shown that the property in the other State was of greater value per foot than the property in Kentucky, our officers are not concluded by the action of the officers of the other State, but could for themselves fix the value of the entire tangible property of the bridge and deduct this from the total value, which was in this case $1,880,000. But there being no showing that there was any discrepancy in value between the Kentucky end of the bridge and the Ohio end, it should be assumed, in the absence of proof, that the value of the property in Kentucky was in proportion to the length of the bridge in Kentucky.

We, therefore, conclude that the basis urged by appellant is the proper one for the assessment of the property under the agreed facts, and the board having fixed a lower assessment than this would make, the court erred in not enforcing the collection of the tax on the assessment made by the board, for it is easy to see that if the appellee's property is assessed in Kentucky on the line claimed by it, and also assessed in Ohio on the same line, it will escape payment of taxes on a part of its franchise. For in that event the value of its tangible property will not be subtracted from the total value of its property, but from a per cent. of it, and the balance is necessarily smaller than if the entire value of its property was taken as the basis and the value of its tangible property subtracted from it; and if the property was so assessed in Kentucky and not in Ohio, Kentucky would lose a part of her just revenue, although as to Ohio there would be no loss.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment in favor of the State for the amount claimed.

EARLY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 12, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Manslaughter—Appellant having been indicted as a principal for murder, was convicted and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for twelve years, and prosecutes this appeal, urging as grounds for reversal errors in instructions prejudicial to him. Held—That as appellant was indicted as a principal in the killing, the failure of the court to give an instruction as to who was principal was not prejudicial to appellant as the proof shows that he fired the fatal shot. Where the proof shows that the person shot died within about five minutes after he was shot, it was not error to submit an instruction requiring the jury to believe that he died within a year and a day. The failure of the instruction on self-defense to leave out the words "without previous malice," was not prejudicial to the accused. The Commonwealth might have complained that they were omitted.

W. R. Ramsey and Ed. Parker for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant was charged with the murder of Ed. Jones, and a trial resulted in a verdict of manslaughter and a sentence to the penitentiary for twelve years. It is urged that the case should be reversed because instruction No. 1 is erroneous and prejudicial to the appellant. It reads as follows: "If you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Ab Early, in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, feloniously shot and killed Ed. Jones, or feloniously shot and wounded him so as to hasten his death, not in the necessary, or reasonably apparent necessary, self-defense of the defendant, you ought to find the defendant guilty; guilty of willful murder as charged in the indictment, if you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that said shooting was done with malice aforethought; guilty of voluntary manslaughter, if you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that said shooting was done in sudden heat of passion or in sudden affray. If you shall find the defendant guilty of willful murder, you will fix his punishment at death or confinement in the State penitentiary for life, in your discretion. If you shall find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, you will fix his punishment at confinement in the State penitentiary not less than two and not more than twenty-one years, in your discretion. If you shall find the defendant not guilty you will say so, and no more."

The appellant was indicted as a principal jointly with Joe Harp and William Underwood. The instruction is criticised because the question was not submitted to the jury, as to who was the principal or whether the deceased was killed instantly or died within a year and a day after the shooting. It is further criticised because it only submits the question of shooting, not of wounding.

The testimony in the case shows that the appellant and Underwood both shot at and wounded the deceased. There was no occasion for submitting to the jury the question as to whether he aided and abetted in the killing. He was tried as a principal, and the testimony conclusively shows that he fired the fatal shot. He was not standing by and encouraging Underwood and Harp, but was actively engaged in it himself. Had such an instruction been given it would have been only in aid of the prosecution. The appellant can not complain because an instruction was not given upon that aspect of the case. Under the instruction the jury must have believed that the appellant wounded the deceased, because they could not have found him guilty unless they believed he shot and killed Jones. If he shot him he necessarily wounded him, and the jury of course so understood it. Besides the second instruction, which was on the subject of self-defense, the court submitted the question as to whether the appellant shot and wounded deceased. Instructions Nos. 1 and 2 show that the question of shooting and wounding was fairly submitted to the jury, even if instruction No. 1 was subject to the criticism just considered. If the wound was inflicted willfully, maliciously and with malice aforethought and not in self defense, and it hastened the death of deceased, the appellant was guilty of murder. If it hastened the death, of course the death was the result of it. Death resulted within less than five minutes after deceased received the wounds, and there was no occasion for submitting the question as to whether he died within one year and a day after being shot. We think that instruction No. 2 sufficiently submitted the question as to whether the defendant believed, and had sufficient grounds to believe, etc., that he was in danger of death, etc. This instruction recognized the right of defendant to exercise his judgment as to whether or not there was an impending danger, and as to the necessity, or apparent necessity, for slaying deceased to avoid it. It is true the instructions leave out the words "without previous malice." The omission of these words did not prejudice the right of the appellant. The Commonwealth might have complained that they were omitted.

We are of the opinion that the defendant had a fair trial, therefore, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following dissenting opinion:

This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted from the operation of railroad trains over appellee's tracks at the intersection of Lewis and Craig streets, in Covington, Ky. The double tracks of appellee's road pass diagonally across the intersection of Lewis and Craig streets, and over these two streets all railroad trains of appellee's road moving between Covington, Ky., and Cincinnati, O., pass. Appellants' property is situated at the southeast corner of Lewis and Craig streets, fronting thirty-five feet on Lewis street, and extending back seventy-five feet on Craig street. Upon this lot is a three-story brick house at the corner, and a two-story brick house on the rear of the lot, fronting on Craig street. These tracks were constructed across the intersection of Lewis and Craig streets in the year 1889, since when they have been constantly used in substantially the same condition as they were when first built. At the time of their construction the property involved in this litigation was owned by Frank Klosterman, the husband of one of the appellants, and the father of the others. He died February 10, 1892, and this suit was brought December 5, 1895, by his widow, as executrix, and by his devisees for injuries to the property arising from the operation of trains on and over said tracks, that is, from the noise, smoke, cinders and vibrations arising from the operation of the cars. The petition does not allege that appellees' operation of its railroad trains was negligent, or unusual, or other than the usual and customary service, nor does the petition proceed upon the ground that by the construction of appellee's railroad tracks and the operation of its trains there has been an interference with appellants' right of egress and ingress from and to their said property.

It is the contention of appellants, as set out in this petition and made here in argument, that appellees' occupancy of the street in question, to the extent of one of its tracks, was without legislative or municipal authority, and it was, therefore, a continuing nuisance for appellee to operate on such tracks its railroad trains and locomotives. It becomes important, therefore, to determine whether appellees' occupation of the streets in question by its double track of railroad was or has become authorized. If it was, this action is confessedly barred under the principles announced in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, post. The tracks were built by appellee, the Covington and Cincinnati Elevated Railroad, Transfer and Bridge Co., hereinafter called the bridge company. This company was incorporated by an act of the legislature, approved February 9, 1886. Prior thereto the Kentucky Central R. R. Co. had acquired certain corporate rights and franchises, including that of operating and maintaining a line of railroad into the city of Covington, and on to the Ohio river. The bridge company was authorized to construct a railway and highway bridge across the Ohio river between the cities of Cincinnati and Covington, and to operate railroad trains thereon. It was authorized to construct approaches to the bridge on the Covington side, and to build and maintain connection with the railroad tracks of such other roads as might then be in Covington, or might thereafter be constructed to Covington. At that time, so far as the record discloses, there was but one road in Covington, to wit, the Kentucky Central. The 8th section of the act of incorporation is as follows: "The said company shall construct and maintain tracks connecting its bridge with the Kentucky Central Railroad in such manner as to enable other railroads to connect these lines of railway with said tracks approaching said bridge. Connections made by any other railroad with such connecting tracks shall be so made as to permit other railroads to connect therewith; and any railroad now existing, or to be hereafter constructed, within the city of Covington, shall have the right to connect its railway with said connecting tracks, and shall have the right to use the same for the purpose of and to cross said bridge with its locomotives and cars upon the payment of tolls and upon the terms in this act expressed."

Section 10 is as follows: "The said company shall not have the power to acquire more than one right of way from any depot in Covington to its bridge, and shall obtain no permit or privilege from the city council of Covington for such right of way without first having given at least one week's notice of its intention to make application therefor, which notice shall be in writing, and be served on the city clerk of said city, and said corporation shall also cause said notice to be published in some newspaper circulating in Covington at least seven days before the making of such application, but nothing herein shall be construed to prevent said company from acquiring a right of way by assignment as provided in section 6 hereof."

Under this charter appellee bridge company did construct the bridge contemplated by the act, and did build approaches thereto on the Kentucky side of the river, and did connect its tracks with the tracks of the Kentucky Central R. R. Co. The Maysville & Big Sandy R. R. Co., now operated and controlled by the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., had constructed a railroad into the city of Covington, and the track was built on the same roadway, and parallel to the other track connecting this road with the bridge company's road. In other words, the bridge company has built tracks from its bridge connecting it over one roadway with two different railroads operating in Covington, Ky., which were under the charter of appellee bridge company entitled to transfer privileges over said bridge into Cincinnati.

For appellant it is argued that the authority to appellees to construct a double-track road is not shown in this case, because there was not a compliance with section 10 of appellee bridge company's charter, above quoted, in which it was required to give notice in writing to be served on the city clerk and published in some newspaper circulated in Covington for at least seven days before application of such application for roadway. Whether such notice was given is not shown. It is not argued nor shown that a specific grant of roadway to the bridge company was made by the city council. It seems from the record that the bridge company's connecting tracks were in fact built by the C. & O. Ry. Co., and are operated by it, under the management and charter of the bridge company. The record discloses abundant instances, as early as 1889, when the C. & O. Ry. Co. was building, or shortly after it had completed, the line of the road in question, that the city council were negotiating with that company as to the manner of making certain grades on certain of the streets over which it crossed in the construction of such approach to the bridge, and wherein the railroad company was required to, and did agree to, bear the expenses of regrading certain parts of such streets, and of constructing sewers, etc., and of maintaining gates across certain streets, including Lewis and Craig streets crossing.

Was this equivalent to a grant by the municipal corporation of a right of way across the street in question? In this State the legislature might have authorized the construction of a railroad across or along the streets of a town or city without the consent of the latter. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ky., 114.) The legislative authority to appellant to construct the railroad in question was undoubtedly conferred. The only thing remaining was the assent of the municipal corporation of the city of Covington. The manner of giving this assent, that is, whether it should be by deed or by ordinance, is not stipulated; that the municipality had notice of appellees' purpose to construct the railroad in question, and as now operated, is evident; that it raised some objections to the exercise of this purpose in certain particulars, which were finally adjusted to its satisfaction, is also shown; that the railroad company, evidently relying upon these facts in connection with the charter of the bridge company, built the tracks upon the route in litigation, with the knowledge and assent of the city, is apparent. Under these circumstances, would the city be permitted to say to the railroad company that it had not complied with the prerequisites named in the statute, and, therefore, it must leave the streets? We think not. It would be held estopped by its conduct and appellees' reliance thereon to the extent that it constructed an expensive railway over the streets in question. Appellees' having the right to construct its "railroad tracks" over such streets as the city might permit, and the city of Covington having acquiesced in the construction of the tracks, for the purposes and to the extent authorized by appellees' charter, it must be held to be bound by its conduct in the premises as fully and to every extent as if such authority had been granted by ordinance duly passed. There is no good reason why the municipality should not be held to the same standard of honesty in such matters when applying to it an estoppel as other persons would be.

In Kneeland v. Gilman, 24 Wis., 39 (cited and adopted as basis of text in Herman on Res Adjudicata and Estoppel, 1363), it was said: "But of late years, much more than formerly, the doctrine of estoppel, most wholesome and just in its operation when properly applied, has been extended to these municipal corporations, so as to bind and conclude them by their own acts and acquiescence, and the act and acquiescence of their officers, whenever an estoppel would exist in the case of natural persons. It is now well settled that as to matters within the scope of their powers and the powers of their officers, such corporations may be estopped upon the same principles and under the same circumstances as natural persons."

We conclude, therefore, that appellees have acquired the right to build the double track road at the places now occupied and in question in this suit. It, therefore, follows that, applying the doctrine of the cases of L. & N. R. Co. v. Orr, supra, and Roulston v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1507, the statutory bar of five years pleaded by appellees in this case against appellants' right of recovery was applicable, and that the circuit court rightfully gave a peremptory instruction based thereon.

The majority opinion proceeds upon the theory that although appellees had a perfect right to build a single track railway over the route in question, yet by building an additional track they have become liable for the damages resulting from all operations of trains over it, the additional track, but not for the smoke, noise, etc., caused by the operation of the trains on the first track. The damages for which appellants sue are not really due to the existence of the two tracks, but the existence of noise, smoke, cinders and jarring caused by the trains. These conditions would exist just the same whether these trains passed over one or two tracks, it not being shown in the record that both tracks were ever used at this point at the same moment.

POWERS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed December 17, 1902.)

J. C. Sims, J. R. Morton and J. B. Finnell for appellant.

T. C. Campbell, R. B. Franklin, B. G. Williams, John K. Hendrick, Lewis Dundon, Earl Ashbrook, T. B. Sebree, Victor Bradley and L. W. Arnett for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion (for syllabus see ante, 1007):

The pivotal question in this case is whether the circuit judge should have vacated the bench on the affidavit filed by the defendant. In refusing to do so he followed the decision of this court in the case of Schmitt v. Mitchell, 101 Ky., 570. In that case the affidavit was substantially the same as that filed in this case. It was held insufficient, and the refusal of the circuit judge to vacate the bench was sustained. That opinion was written by Judge DuRelle, and was concurred in by the entire court. It followed the cases of German Insurance Co. v. Landram, 88 Ky., 434, and Vance v. Field, 89 Ky., 178, and has since been regarded as settling the question in the State. The case of Massey v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky., 588, was distinguished by the court from these cases, and not intended to lay down a different rule. We see no reason for disturbing a rule so well settled, for justice can not be administered properly if the rule on this question is uncertain. There are sound reasons for the rule thus declared. Otherwise the regular judiciary of the State may be displaced on the second trial of any case when the ruling of the judge on the first trial does not suit the litigant. Substantially the same ground of objection might have been made by appellant to a larger number of the circuit judges of the State, and the rule now adopted by the court is in substance an overruling of the cases above referred to.

In order to a proper understanding of the exceptions to the rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence and their bearing on the case, it will be necessary to state, in a general way, the facts established by the proof. For convenience these will be grouped under the following heads:

1st. Where was the shot which killed the deceased fired from?

The east building in the Capitol Square is known as the executive building. On the first floor of this building, on the south side, at the west end, is a small room known as the private office of the secretary of state. This room has a door opening into the hallway, and one opening into the room on the east called the reception room. East of this room is the governor's office and north of it the treasurer's office. Across the hall, and on the north side of the building, is the auditor's office. The upper floors of the building are occupied by the other State officials. The deceased was shot a little after 11 o'clock in the morning, as he came up the walk approaching the State buildings from the street lying south of them. Shortly before he was shot Henry E. Youtsey, now in the penitentiary under a life sentence for complicity in the murder, went over to the office of the commissioner of agriculture, which is west of the main building, and brought a squad of men armed with guns, stationing them near the foot of the stairway in the hall, not far from the door leading from the hall into the private office of the secretary of state, and telling them that after a little a man would come out of that room and join them and they should all go off together and scatter. Just after the shooting Youtsey was seen running down the stairway leading from near this door to the basement, apparently carrying something under his coat. Witnesses skilled in the use of firearms testify that the report of the shot which killed the deceased showed that it came from a rifle loaded with nitro-powder, which is smokeless. The deceased was facing the building, or nearly so, and, as was shown by the post-mortem examination, the ball struck him in front and came out behind, slightly lower than the point of entrance. Not only was the clothing mashed inward in front and outward behind, but particles of bone were carried along by the ball, showing its course. The effect of the ball on the bones showed that it was a steel bullet, of 38 calibre. A few days before the shooting Henry E. Youtsey had in his possession a box of nitro-powder cartridges with steel bullets, which he said was the slickest scheme yet to settle the contest. These bullets were 38-calibre. The point where the deceased was when shot is identified not only by the persons with him at the time, but is fixed further in this way: Four different persons saw him fall, or after he fell from different standpoints, and were enabled to fix their line of vision from a tree or some other object in the yard, which was between them and him. These lines intersect practivally at the point identified by the persons present at the time. In a back-berry tree beyond this point, and in a direct line with it and the window of the private office of the secretary of state, a ball was imbedded, a steel ball of 38-calibre. From the point where the ball struck the tree, a straight line to the bottom of the window would pass over the place where the deceased was shot at just the height from the ground at which the ball entered his body. It was a cold, raw day. A witness who passed up the walk shortly before the shooting noticed this window up and the blind drawn down, his attention being attracted to it from the character of the day. Another witness, who accompanied the deceased, observed the same, and a third, who looked at the window just after the shooting, testified to seeing a gun barrel sticking out of it. When the deceased was shot he raised himself on his elbow and looked in the direction of the window, and a number of witnesses testify to the sound coming from that direction. When a surveyor was making some measurements several days after the shooting, with a view to locating where the shot came from, a witness, Wharton Golden, who has since confessed as an accomplice, asked appellant "what are they doing?" He answered: "He is trying to find out where the bullet came from," and added: "There is no doubt that the bullet came from this office."

After this great mass of evidence, the defendant introduced some proof to show that deceased was south of the point fixed by the Commonwealth when shot, and also to show that the shot came from the space between the executive building and the center building. But the witnesses who located the place where the deceased fell as further south, were some distance from him, and to the south of him, and had nothing by which they could determine accurately how far he was from them, and they might naturally make a mistake in thinking that he was nearer to them than he was, as he was walking away from them; while the testimony for the Commonwealth is by persons who were with the deceased, or picked him up after he was shot, and those to the right and left, who observed the certain obstructions between him and them, and thus identified the point beyond the question. The proof, too, about the shot coming from between the buildings is equally uncertain and is met by the positive testimony of a reputable witness who was standing there at the time in this space, and testifies that the shot was not fired from there, but the sound came from around the corner, in the direction of the window referred to.

In view of the facts it is submitted that he who will not believe, under the testimony, that the shot which killed the deceased came from the window of appellant's private office, would not be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.

2d. Was the deceased killed pursuant to a conspiracy?

The shooting occurred in broad daylight, just in front of the Capitol of the State, when the legislature was assembling. The shot was fired from the private office of the secretary of state in the executive building, in which were the offices of the executive officers of the State. Can it be believed that an assassin, single-handed and without accomplices, could have done such a thing and vanished without immediate detection? Beside the fact of Youtsey's bringing the crowd of men over above referred to, it is shown in the evidence that on previous days there were always a number of persons belonging to the crowd that appellant had brought to Frankfort in front of the Capitol buildings about this time. On this morning there were none. Just after the shooting men with guns in their hands were stationed at the entrance to the executive building to prevent persons from coming in. That morning at the arsenal a company of militia, which had been there for some days, were, for the first time, issued ammunition and overcoats and kept in line, and these, a very few minutes after the shooting, were marched to the Statehouse.

Other circumstances might be mentioned, but it is unnecessary to extend this opinion by setting them out, for it is manifest that the thing had not only been carefully planned, but that it could not have happened as it did, except as the result of a well-laid conspiracy.

3d. Was the defendant a party to the conspiracy?

Appellant was not in Frankfort at the time of the assassination. He was on the train going to Louisville. If he had been in his office the shot could not have been fired from it without his being directly involved. His absence at that time gave opportunity for its execution. The assassination was on Tuesday. On the Saturday before Powers saw Youtsey sitting at the window referred to; he had the window raised six or eight inches, with the curtain down, and with a gun pointed out of the window, and said trouble had started. The witness who testifies to this was the governor's private secretary; he said he did not see any signs of trouble. Youtsey then said if trouble started he was going to be prepared. On the following Monday appellant, Caleb Powers, and his brother, John, were thinking of going to Louisville. Youtsey asked John to give him the key to his private office. John gave him the wrong key. The next morning before Caleb Powers and John started to Louisville they came to the office, and Youtsey met them in the hall. He had an angry conversation with John, and finally John gave him another key. After this Caleb and John Powers went to Louisville together. This key Youtsey evidently used to enter this office, raise the window as he had done on Saturday and lower the blind, as it was seen just before the assassination, for he entered through this door and the door next to the reception room was locked; and he was given this key, after he had more than once declared that the way to settle the contest was with steel cartridges and after appellant knew what had occurred on Saturday. Appellant, on getting to Louisville, took the first train to Frankfort, and when he got there jumped off the train while running, in front of the Statehouse, instead of going on up to the station, a few squares away, for fear, he says, that he would be arrested there, although no prosecution of any kind had then been begun, and, so far as appears from the record, it was not then definitely known where the shot had come from, as far as he had been informed. A few weeks later he attempted to leave, disguised in a soldier's uniform, with a supposed pardon in his pocket, and a considerable sum of money. Besides this, he is positively connected with the conspiracy by two confessed participants in it, W.H. Culton and F. Wharton Golden, the former a clerk in the auditor's office and the latter a close friend of appellant, and both men who, until then, stood well. Culton disbursed large sums of money for appellant, and Golden was entrusted by him with important undertakings. On the 25th of January, or five days before the assassination, appellant organized and brought to the Capital a body of about a thousand or fourteen hundred armed men. Many of these men were of desperate character, others were members of the State guard, but came with their uniforms concealed. Appellant insists that this crowd was brought to Frankfort on the peaceful mission of petitioning the legislature. On the other hand, the proof for the Commonwealth tends to show that they were brought here for the purpose of intimidating the legislature, and that it was contemplated that if intimidation failed, members of the legislature would be killed. It is hard to understand why, if the purpose of this assemblage was peaceful, they should have been brought to the seat of government armed. Not only so, but about this time appellant wrote a letter referring to the London and Williamsburg companies, which he wanted to go with him, and in this he said: "We must have these men and guns. We are undertaking a serious matter, and win we must. Send some one to London and Williamsburg with such orders as will have these two companies join us Wednesday night." On the evening of January 25 the greater part of the mountain army was sent home, but two hundred picked, armed men were retained. These men were about the legislative halls and the public buildings from that time until the assassination. Appellant was the admitted leader in all this. He gave Culton the money; he directed as to the character of men to be brought. His declared object was to intimidate the legislature, and in the absence of any proof showing that the killing of members of the legislature was contemplated, we must know that such a result should be anticipated as the natural outcome of bringing and maintaining a body of desperate, armed men at the seat of government to intimidate them, and that their hostility would be especially directed to the deceased, who was a member of the senate and the contestant for the high office of governor. There is proof that different plans were contemplated and different members of the legislature planned to be killed. In letters written by the defendant, and by word of mouth, he said he was an advocate of open war, and after the assassination of the deceased he declared that the disorganization of the Democratic party was due more to him than to any other man. He also said that with Goebel dead, there was no other person who could hold the Democratic party together. According to all the testimony appellant was the leading spirit and the director of the armed men brought to the seat of government, and kept there for the purpose of intimidating the legislature from the time they were so brought until the assassination.

Some other details are shown by the evidence, but these need not be noticed. The material evidence which was admitted and is held incompetent by this court will now be considered:

1st. The testimony as to the statements of Leander Guffy. This evidence simply tended to show that there was a conspiracy to kill the deceased. It in no way connected the appellant with the conspiracy. The fact that there was such a conspiracy was abundantly proved by other evidence, and as this testimony did not connect appellant with the conspiracy, it could not have been prejudicial to him. Besides, the court instructed the jury in effect that the acts and declarations of other persons not in the presence of the de-defendant were competent against him only so far as these persons were members of the conspiracy, and their acts or declarations were in furtherance thereof. The jury, therefore, could not have considered this testimony unless they believed from the evidence that the declarant was in the conspiracy. I do not think there was any error of the circuit judge in submitting the question to the jury under the testimony; but if there was, it could not possibly have prejudiced the appellant.

2d. The testimony of Barlow and Rousseau was competent to impeach the witness, Taylor, who had been introduced on behalf of appellant, and testified that he had met appellant in Louisville by appointment on the day of the assassination to consult about bringing a body of men from Western Kentucky, and that as soon as they heard of the shooting of Goebel they abandoned their plan. For his statement to these witnesses, that "they had got men that would kill the deceased, it is fixed," tended to show that he knew that the assassination was to take place before he left home, and that the meeting with appellant was not for the purpose which he assigned. It is shown by the evidence that just after the assassination telegrams were sent out and a large body of militia brought to Frankfort under the orders of W. S. Taylor, then acting governor of the State, who is indicted as an accomplice of appellant in the assassination, and that these men were brought here to repel any attack that might be made to avenge the death of the deceased. The purpose of appellant's trip to Louisville, and his meeting Taylor there, was a material matter in the case, and the jury were warranted from this evidence in inferring that the witness had not assigned the true reason, but that the body of men proposed to be brought from Western Kentucky was aimed for the purpose for which the militia was brought.

3d. What has been said as to the admission of the statements of Leander Guffy applies equally to the statements of J. L. Bosley, as proven by the witness, Stivers. This testimony only went to show a conspiracy, and did not connect the defendant in any way with it. The defendant was not prejudiced by its admission if the court was in error in submitting this question to the jury under the proof, which is not perceived.

The other matters referred to in the opinion are too small to be noticed. There are something like twenty-five hundred pages of this record, and when viewed by the side of the evidence heard before the jury, which was clearly competent, the matters objected to singly, or all taken together, dwindle into insignificance. This court is not warranted in reversing a judgment of conviction unless upon the whole case the substantial rights of the appellant have been prejudiced. In this case, outside of the refusal of the circuit judge to vacate the bench, all the errors complained of may justly be compared to fly specks on the surface of the shell of a hen's egg. They could not possibly have affected the result, for the only real question in the case was whether the deceased was connected with the conspiracy. The case, therefore, is simply reduced to this: Was the circuit judge right in following the rule laid down unanimously by this court, not only in the last case before it, but in the two preceding cases, which it followed? And if judgments are to be reversed for this, how is justice to be administered?

On the whole case, from an actual reading of the record, I am satisfied that the circuit judge presided at the trial with rare ability and with entire impartiality. I am also satisfied that appellant has had a fair trial, according to the law of the land, and that the evidence warrants the verdict.

I, therefore, dissent from the opinion of the court.

Judge Paynter and Judge White concur in this dissent.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

BUTTON v. KREMER.

(Filed December 17, 1902.)

1. Street improvements—Liens—Municipal government—An ordinance of the city of Louisville provided for the original construction with vitrified brick of a portion of Fourth street, beginning at the center line of Brandies avenue extended, and said work was done and accepted by the city and apportionment warrants for the cost of same were issued to the contractor. Appellee, as assignee of the warrant, brought this suit to enforce liens against the property holders; also against the city to recover in the event it should be decided that the property holders were not liable for said improvements. Appellant, one of the property holders, answered, denying his liability for the cost imposed under section 2833, Kentucky Statutes, because he says that his lots do not front the improvement, and the contiguous territory is not defined into squares by principal streets. Held—That the statute has failed to provide for the exact conditions shown to exist in this case. The tax can not be assessed in either mode pointed out by statute. The general council have no power to impose the cost of the construction of this small part of Fourth street upon any property; and that its cost necessarily falls upon the city under its contract with the contractor.

Lane & Harrison for appellant.

Carroll, Carroll & Tyler for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

On the 6th of June, 1898, the general council of the city of Louisville adopted the following ordinance for the original construction of the carriage-way of Fourth street, from the center line of Brandies avenue extended to the south line of Brandies avenue extended:

“Be it ordained by the General Council of the City of Louisville:

“That the carlageway of Fourth street, from the center line of Brandies avenue extended to the south line of Brandies avenue extended, shall be thirty-six feet in width, and shall be improved by grading, curbing and paving with vitrified brick, with corner stones, footway crossings across all intersecting streets. Said work shall be done in accordance with the plans and specifications on file in the office of the board of public works, and at the cost of owners of ground on the east side of Fourth street from Brandies avenue to a line 210 feet south and parallel to Brandies avenue and extending back to a line 200 feet east of and parallel to Fourth street, and on the west side of Fourth street from an outer line of Brandies avenue extended to a line 210 feet south of and parallel to Brandies avenue extended, and extending back to a line 200 feet west of and parallel to Fourth street.

“The cost to be equally apportioned among the owners of property, according to the number of square feet of ground owned by the parties respectively within the limits above set out, and that all ordinances in conflict herewith be, and are, hereby repealed.

The following plat of the territory assessed by the ordinance will assist in illustrating the situation :

 4TH AVE. BRANDIES AVE. Improvements 	Button, $8.97			Button, $13.94		Button, $26.33
	Button, $31.60

The chancellor held that the property of the defendant, Button, was ~~in~~ lien for the apportionment warrant and adjudged their sale, and the defendant has appealed. He insists that as the contiguous territory is not defined into squares by principal streets and his lots do not front the improvement, they can not be charged with payment therefor under section 2833 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a section of the charters of cities of the first class, and which reads as follows: "When the improvement is the original construction of any street, road, lane, alley or avenue, such improvement shall be made at the exclusive cost of the owners of lots in each fourth of a square, to be equally apportioned by the board of public works according to the number of feet owned by them respectively. And in such improvement the cost of the curb shall constitute a part of the construction of the street or avenue and not of the sidewalk. Each subdivision of the territory bounded on all sides by principal streets shall be deemed a square. When the territory contiguous to any public way is not defined into squares by principal streets, the ordinance providing for the improvement of such public way shall state the depth on both sides fronting said public improvement to be assessed for the cost of making the same according to the number of square feet owned by the parties respectively within the depth as set out in the ordinance."

It will be observed that the statute provides for two conditions in which a tax may be levied: First, if the territory to be charged with the cost of constructing the street is bounded on all sides by principal streets, the cost must be apportioned among the owners of lots in each one fourth of a square contiguous to the improvement. If, on the other hand, the territory contiguous to any public way is not defined into squares by principal streets, the ordinance providing for the improvement of such public way must state the depth on both sides fronting said public improvement which are to be assessed for the cost of making same, according to the number of square feet owned by the parties respectively, within the depth set out in the ordinance. This case does not fall within either of the conditions recited in the statute. It is admitted that the contiguous territory is not defined into squares, and it is apparent from the admitted facts that appellant's property does not front that part of Fourth street, with the improvement of which they are sought to be charged in this proceeding. The statute has failed to provide for the exact conditions shown to exist in this case. The tax can not be assessed in either mode pointed out by the statute, and if it be upheld the chancellor must exercise the legislative function of establishing for this particular case a rule of assessment not provided for.

"It is a principle, universally declared and admitted, that municipal corporations can levy no tax, general or special, upon the inhabitants or their property unless the power be clearly and unmistakably given. * * * And this rule applies to the assessment for local improvements." (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 605; Caldwell v. Rupert, 73 Ky., 182.)

And such power is always strictly construed. Applying this principle to the facts of this case, we reach the conclusion that the general council have no power to impose the cost of the construction of this small part of Fourth street upon any property; and that its cost necessarily falls upon the city under their contract with Humpich.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMONWEALTH, BY, &c. v. NEWELL, JUDGE.

Mandamus—Taxation—Construction of Statutes—Application was made to appellee as county judge of Mason county by an auditor's agent, under authority of section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, to have certain property belonging to the C. & O. Ry. Co. assessed for taxation. The application was dismissed on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the matter. This action was then instituted in the circuit court for a mandamus to compel the county judge to hear the application and decide the matter. The petition was dismissed, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That appellant is entitled to the mandamus. Where the county court fails to hear and determine as to the liability of property for assessment, a mandamus should be awarded against him, not to control his judgment as to the liability of the property to assessment, but merely to compel him to hear and determine the question. After such a decision either party may appeal to the circuit court. A dismissal by the county judge for lack of jurisdiction is in no sense a judgment determining whether the property was liable to assessment or not.

A. E. Cole & Son, R. J. Breckinridge and John S. Power for appellants.

W. H. Wadsworth for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

It appears from the petition in this case that F. Stanley Watson, auditor's agent, filed in the clerk's office of the Mason County Court a statement authorized by the Kentucky Statutes, section 4241, the object of which was to have certain property belonging to the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. assessed for taxation.

It further appears that the county court of Mason county refused to take jurisdiction of the complaint, and refused to determine whether or not said property was liable to assessment or subject to taxation. The object of this action is to obtain a writ of mandamus against the county judge of Mason county, requiring him to entertain jurisdiction of said case and to decide the same on its merits; to proceed upon the facts placed before him by the relator; to ascertain as near as practicable, and to cause to be forwarded to the auditor the compulsory reports of these corporations thus obtained, and to proceed as required by law.

To this petition a demurrer was filed on behalf of the defendant on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute or support a cause of action, which demurrer was sustained by the court with leave to plaintiffs to amend, and they declining to amend, the petition was dismissed. From which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The only question which we deem it necessary to consider is whether or not appellants were entitled to the peremptory mandamus, and we shall not undertake to decide whether the property sought to be subjected to taxation was in law liable to assessment or taxation. It will be seen from this record that the appellee county judge refused to try or consider the question as to the liability of the railway, or whether the property in question had been omitted by any of the authorities authorized to assess the same. In short, the county judge declined to try, and pass upon, the legality of plaintiff's claim, and it appears also that from the petition, and as a matter of law, we hold that no appeal could be prosecuted from the order of the county judge aforesaid. It is contended for appellee that the writ of mandamus could not be legally issued. If this be true, and if also it be true that there is no appeal from the order refusing to entertain jurisdiction, then the appellant is without any remedy. It will be seen from an examination of section 4241, Kentucky Statutes, that it is made the duty of the sheriff or auditor's agent to cause to be listed for taxation all property omitted, or any portion of property omitted, by the assessor, board of supervisors, board of valuation and assessment, or railroad commission, for any year or years. The section further provides for the filing of a statement containing a description, etc., of the property, and the value of corporate franchise, if any, together with the names and places of residence of the parties owning such property.

It is further provided that at the next regular term of the county court, after notice has been served five days, if it shall appear to the court that the property is liable for taxation and has not been assessed, the court shall enter an order fixing the value thereof at its fair cash value, estimated as required by law; if not liable, he shall make an order to that effect.

It is further provided as follows: "From so much of the order of the court deciding whether or not the property is liable to assessment, either party may appeal, as in other civil cases, except that no appeal bond shall be required where the court decides that the property is not liable to assessment or taxation."

Various other provisions are embraced in the section not necessary to refer to. It seems clear to us that there can be no appeal from any order of the county court in respect to the matter in controversy except as provided by the section supra; and inasmuch as the court refused to adjudge whether or not the property was liable to assessment or taxation, and that being the only judgment or order from which an appeal is allowed, it seems clear that.

no appeal could be prosecuted from an order dismissing the proceeding without rendering a judgment as provided by law. If the facts stated by plaintiff are true, the property in question was omitted; but, as before stated, we shall not undertake to decide whether the property ought to have been assessed in Mason county, or whether it had been omitted. That question must be primarily decided by the county court of Mason county. It seems to us that the duty and power of the circuit court to issue a mandamus in a case like the present one is not an open question. This court, in Hoke v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky., 567, discussed at great length the duty of the county court to make an assessment of omitted property upon the institution of proceedings in the county court by the auditor's agent; and also expressly held that where the county court failed to hear and determine as to the liability of the property to assessment, that a mandamus should be awarded against him, not to control his judgment as to the liability of the property to assessment, but merely to compel him to hear and determine that question. The common pleas court of Jefferson county had awarded a mandamus to compel the county judge to hear, consider and determine the question, and this court, in a very exhaustive opinion, affirmed the judgment of the common pleas court.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the various authorities relied on by the parties. We are of opinion that it was the duty of the county judge to hear the case presented by the auditor's agent, and render a judgment holding the property liable to be assessed, or holding that it was not liable. In which event, either party could have appealed to the circuit court. The dismissal by the county judge for lack of jurisdiction was in no sense a judgment determining whether the property was liable to assessment or not.

For the reasons indicated the judgment appealed from is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to overrule the demurrer and for proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

THE FORT JEFFERSON IMPROVEMENT CO., &c. v. DU-POYSTER, &c.

1. Subrogation—The owners of a half interest in land executed a mortgage on the whole land to pay a debt. Subsequently the owners of the other half interest, although their land was not subject to the mortgage, executed an agreement to the effect that the mortgage debt should be paid out of the entire land. This agreement was made at the request of their father, whose lands were primarily liable for the original debt. They afterwards satisfied the mortgage debt by executing their own obligation for it. In this action they seek to be subrogated to the prior lien of the mortgagor against subsequent lien holders for purchase money. It is insisted that as they have not actually paid the debt they are not entitled to subrogation. Held—That they became entitled to be subrogated to the debt when the creditor accepted their obligation for it in the place of the original obligation. The doctrine of subrogation is one of equity to promote justice, and it may or may not arise from a contract. The right to it depends upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and to which must be applied the principles of justice. Where a person furnishes money to pay the debt of another if it is equitable that he should be substituted for the creditor, it will be done. One is not a volunteer in a transaction where he has paid the money at the request of the person whose liability he discharges, neither can one be regarded as a volunteer who pays money to relieve his own property therefrom for which some one else is liable.

2. Joint tenants—Where one joint tenant conveys a specific portion of the joint lands it is not void. The other joint tenants could have joined in the conveyances, and thus have vested the purchasers with title. Their power to ratify the sale of specific parcels is unquestioned, but they can not do so to the prejudice of another purchaser of a specific boundary.

3. Parties to actions—An interest in land can not be subjected to a debt in a proceeding to which he was not required to make a defense.

J. M. Nichols & Son and F. H. Sullivan for appellants.

John W. Ray, Geo. W. Reeves and Bugg & Wickliffe for appellees.

Appeal from Ballard Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is the second appeal of the case to this court. The opinion delivered on the former appeal is found in 21 Ky. Law Rep., 515. The court decided: First, that by the deed of Thomas Dupoyster, made in 1859, his son, Ben S. Dupoyster, took a life estate in the land conveyed, and that the children of J. C. Dupoyster, as they were born, took vested remainders; second, that Ben Dupoyster, claiming under the deed of 1859, purchased adverse claims and was holding under this deed at the time it was sold to the appellants; third, that in the Thomas Dupoyster deed his son, Ben S., had the "discretion of allotting, of dividing, or of partitioning," as he saw proper, the lands among the children of Joe C., but not so as to create inequality or lessen the interest of any one of the children; fourth, that Joe C. had born to him four children, two of whom are dead; that the interest of the dead children passed by the law of descent to their lawful heir or heirs; fifth, that there should be a rescission of the sale by Joe C. and Ben S. to the appellant; and on whatever of the land Joe C. is the owner by inheritance from his dead children a lien should exist in favor of the appellant for the purchase money wrongfully received by him.

Numerous questions are raised, but we will not here summarize them. From our consideration of the case the questions raised will be seen.

Before Joe C. and Ben S. made the deed to the appellant they had executed what is known as the Harkless mortgage on the land in controversy, but which mortgage did not recognize any one as being the owners of the land except the grantors. J. B. and his sister, Mrs. Edwards, are the surviving children of Joe C. and own one-half the land embraced in the Thomas Dupoyster deed, because of the vested remainders which they took. In this suit they asserted their right under the Thomas Dupoyster deed to the entire boundary, but it was decided that they took it together with the other children of Joe C., and two having died, their father inherited part of their (deceased children) interest in the land. It may be added here that Joe C. inherited three-eighths of the tract of land, and his wife, Rebecca, one-eighth. The grantors in the Harkless mortgage could not create any lien on any interest in the land except their own. The rights of J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards were not affected by that mortgage. Pending this suit, and before the judgment was entered from which the former appeal was prosecuted, J. C. Dupoyster and those representing the Harkless mortgage and J. B. Dupoyster and his sister entered into an agreement, by which, if persons last named were adjudged the land, then the judgment for the Harkless debt should go against the entire tract. It is averred in the pleadings, and not denied, that the appellant, Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., took its judgment subject to that agreement, and approved it. Pursuant to that agreement a judgment was entered giving a lien on the entire tract of land for the Harkless debt. This was in the former judgment from which no appeal was prosecuted, and that part of it has never been reversed, nor does any complaint seem to have been made on the former appeal as to that part of it. Subsequently J. B. Dupoyster and his sister, pursuant to the agreement which had been made and the judgment of the court, executed their obligations for the Harkless debt, and also gave a mortgage to secure its payment and have paid $5,000 on it. It is insisted that J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards are not entitled to be subrogated, because, first, they had not paid all the debt; second, they were volunteers; third, a surety is not entitled to subrogation as against a prior surety; fourth, the lien of the original Harkless mortgage was released by extension granted on the mortgage debt by appellees.

First, it may be said that the Harkless mortgage created a superior lien upon Joe C. Dupoyster's interest in the land to that of the appellant for the purchase money which it had paid, and which it was entitled to have refunded to it. J. B. Dupoyster and sister have paid all the debt, inasmuch as they executed their note in lieu of the one which existed. So far as the right to subrogation goes it is equivalent to the payment of the money, because they made it their own debt. There was a novation. The rule which the appellant claims should exist in equity can not have any application to the facts of this case. It is a universal rule of interpretation that one who voluntarily pays the debt of another when he is under no obligation to pay, does not create a liability in his favor; nor can he be subrogated to the lien held by the creditor to secure its payment. It is equally as well settled, if one is bound for the debt of another, he has the right to discharge it, and when he does so, an implied liability arises in his favor against the debtor, and he will be subrogated to the rights of the creditor. By the consent and agreement of the parties J. B. Dupoyster and his sister's interest in the land became bound for the Harkless debt, the same as the property of their father and mother, if the latter joined in the mortgage. It did not then become their debt, but it continued to be the debt of their father, and in order to relieve their interest in the land they were compelled to pay it. They were not volunteers in the matter. They consented that their land might become impressed with the liability, at the request of their father and with the approval of the appellant. However, it was not necessary to have the latter's approval. It did not increase the burden on the interest of J. C. Dupoyster, nor did it lessen the chances of the appellant to make its debt out of his interest in the land. The effect of the transaction is that J. B. Dupoyster and his sister have paid off a lien debt for which the interest of J. C. Dupoyster was primarily liable to protect their interest in the land, and did so at his request.

This court in Ostameyer v. Ostameyer, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 1024, recognized the right of one thus paying the debt to release his own interest in property to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors; and also held that an implied liability would arise. The mere fact that those holding the Harkless debt were willing to accept the obligation of J. B. Dupoyster, etc., for the mortgage debt, and give him time for the payment of it, did not have the effect of preventing subrogation; the right of subrogation arises out and from the transaction. It accrued the instant those representing the Harkless mortgage accepted the new obligation.

The doctrine of subrogation is one of equity to promote justice, and it may or may not arise from a contract; the right to it depends upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and to which must be applied the principles of justice. Where a person furnishes money to pay the debt of another, if it is equitable that he should be substituted for the creditor, it will be done. One is not a volunteer in a transaction where he has paid the money at the request of the person whose liability he discharges. Neither can one be regarded as a volunteer who pays money to relieve his own property therefor, for which some one else is liable. Pomeroy on Eq. Jurisprudence, section 793, says: "The rule is well settled that when a life tenant, or any other person having a partial interest only in the inheritance or in the land, pays off a charge, mortgage, or incumbrance on the entire premises, he is presumed to do so for his own benefit. The lien is not discharged unless he intentionally release it. He can always keep the incumbrance alive for his own protection and reimbursement. His intention to do so will be presumed, even though he has taken no assignment. In fact his payment constitutes him an equitable assignee." Same author, section 1211, says: "This equitable result follows, although no actual assignment, written or verbal, accompanied the payment, and the securities themselves were not delivered over to the person making payment, and even though a receipt was given speaking of the mortgage debt as being fully paid, and sometimes even though the mortgage itself was actually discharged and satisfied of record. This equitable doctrine, which is a particular application of the broad principle of subrogation, is enforced whenever the person making the payment stands in such relations to the premises, or to the other parties, that his interests, recognized either by law or equity, can only be fully protected and maintained by regarding the transaction as an assignment to him, and the lien of the mortgage as being kept alive, either wholly or in part, for his security and benefit."

Counsel for appellant avers that a surety is not entitled to subrogation as against a prior surety. We are unable to understand what application that doctrine has to the facts of this case.

Under the contracts which Ben S. Dupoyster made there was a lien upon what is known in this record as the Norton and Terrell tracts. Ben S. Dupoyster made to J. B. Dupoyster a deed embracing these tracts, in which was provided that the grantee pay the lien debts on the land. This deed was made when the grantee was an infant. The court in this case directed these tracts to be sold to pay the debts against them. J. B. Dupoyster became the purchaser. The Norton tract brought about $400 more than was necessary to pay the debt against it, and that excess was applied as a credit to appellee's judgment against J. C. Dupoyster and against him as the personal representative of the estate of Ben S. Dupoyster. If the Terrell land was embraced in the Thomas Dupoyster deed of 1859, J. B. Dupoyster and his sister owned one-half of this land, therefore, J. B. Dupoyster was put in the position of buying a part of his own land to discharge a debt which his uncle made and for which he could not bind the vested remaindermen. Perhaps the Norton land is outside of the boundary embraced in the Thomas Dupoyster deed. The appellant got the entire benefit of this sale, except the part which went to pay a pre-existing claim against it. Both tracts were sold under judgments in this action, and the appellant is bound by them. The sales were confirmed by a sale of part of the Terrell tract and appellant's lien was made valid on the balance of the tract, and to that extent was benefited by the sale, besides being relieved of a prior encumbrance. Notwithstanding this, the appellant claims it had a lien on the Terrell and Norton tracts superior to the rights which J. B. Dupoyster acquired under his purchase. Its right to assert this claim is barred by the judgments and proceedings in this case. If it were not, it would be inequitable to permit the appellant to assert its lien against these tracts.

It appears that after Thomas Dupoyster made the deed to Ben S. Dupoyster, etc., in 1859, and before the deed was made to the appellant, Ben S. Dupoyster and J. C. Dupoyster sold to several persons tracts out of the Thomas Dupoyster boundary, and in the deeds of the purchasers their respective parcels were defined by metes and bounds. On the return of this case J. C. Dupoyster, J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards pleaded these facts, and the last two named expressed their willingness to ratify the sales which had been made to the several persons; and thereupon asked that J. C. Dupoyster be charged in the division of the remaining part of the tract with the parcels which he and Ben S. Dupoyster had sold to persons prior to their sale to the appellant.

The practical effect of this would have been to have given to J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards out of the boundary sold the appellant an amount equal in value to their one-half interest in the tract of land which their father and uncle had sold prior to the sale to appellant. To do this would compel the appellant to suffer the loss which should be borne by all the purchasers. Where one joint tenant conveys a specific portion of the joint lands it is not void. The other joint tenant could have joined in the conveyance, and thus have vested the purchasers with title. Their power to have ratified the sales of the specific parcels is unquestioned. That is not the question. The question here is, when sales have been made by one joint tenant to specific boundaries, can the other joint tenant say what sales he will ratify, and do so to the prejudice of another purchaser of a specific boundary? The court below held that this could not be done. If Joe C. Dupoyster was alone to be affected by such ratification, then a different question would be presented, because it would be eminently just, if the other joint tenants would ratify the sales of specific parts of the joint property, to charge him in the division therewith. But here J. C. Dupoyster has sold it all. As a result of the sale to appellant the part which he sold it is in lien for the money-which he wrongfully obtained on the contract of sale. The appellants occupy the same position it would occupy had the sale been upheld. If the co-tenants before the sale to appellant had ratified a previous sale by a deed duly recorded, or otherwise, and the appellant had had actual notice of the latter mode of ratification, then a different question would be presented for our consideration. To sustain the claim of the co-tenants (J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards) would be to allow the exercise of their will after all the sales, determine what part of the land should be assigned to J. C. Dupoyster, and who should suffer from such an assignment. They have no legal or equitable rights which enables them to determine how the rights of the others to this suit shall be adjudged.

It is urged that the court erred in putting the land in the hands of the receiver. This is done upon the idea that the interests owned by J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards were not encumbered by the plaintiff's debt, and the fact that J. C. Dupoyster's interest was, would not authorize the court to place the whole tract in the hands of a receiver. It seems to us that J. B. Dupoyster and his sister could have complained of the action of the court in placing the land in the hands of a receiver, but they seem to have been adjudged their parts of the rents which came into the hands of the receiver, and by consent order agreed to pay their part of the expenses of the receiver. Under such circumstances they should not be heard to complain of the original error. The court did not dispose of the other half of the rents, therefore, we do not decide whether or not they should be applied to the appellant's debt.

As there seems to have been a provision in the deed of Dupoyster to Fort Jefferson Improvement Co. that the Fort Jefferson Co. was to convey to the assignor of Mrs. Fannie Jackson three blocks in the town of Fort Jefferson, we are of the opinion that the court properly decided that (she having died) her children were entitled to have conveyed to them one-half of the same, to be charged to J. C. Dupoyster in the division of the land.

Mrs. R. S. Dupoyster is the wife of J. C. Dupoyster; she joined in the deed to the Fort Jefferson Co. and she was the owner, by inheritance from her children begotten by J. C. Dupoyster of one-eighth of the land embraced in the deed of Thomas Dupoyster. The court adjudged that her one-eighth was subject to the payment of the amount due the appellant on the rescission of the contract. She was not made a party to this action before the first appeal in this case. She was made a defendant in the cross petition of J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards, wherein they asked for the partition of the land. She filed an answer to that, in which she expressed her willingness to the partition of the land, claiming one-eighth. The Fort Jefferson Improvement Co. never made her a defendant in the action, nor by any pleading to which she was made a defendant did it seek any relief against her. As we have said, she filed an answer to the cross petition of J. R. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards, and to this answer the appellant filed a reply, in which it said it was entitled to have its lien in her interest, for the payment of the judgment rendered in its favor against J. C. Dupoyster and the estate of Ben S. Dupoyster. No rejoinder was filed and no issue was, therefore, made upon the question of the appellant's right to have its lien extended over her interest in the land.

As there was no pleading filed by appellant seeking relief against her in which she was made a defendant, it failed to manifest any right to have her interest in the land sold to pay the judgment against her husband.

The case is affirmed on the appeal of the Fort Jefferson Improvement Co., and on the appeal of J. C. Dupoyster and J. B. Dupoyster and Mrs. Edwards, and is affirmed on cross appeal of Jackson, but is reversed on the appeal of Mrs. Rebecca S. Dupoyster for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

1. Contested election—City officers—Appellants were candidates for city officers and magistrate in the city of Georgetown on the Republican ticket, and appellees were candidates for the same offices on the Democratic ticket, at the November election, 1901, and the canvassing board gave the certificate of election to appellees, whereupon appellants instituted this action, contesting their election. There were three precincts in the city of Georgetown: The engine house, the city school and the courthouse precincts. Upon the hearing of the contests the vote of the city school precinct was rejected entirely on account of failure of the officers to properly certify the returns. In all three of the precincts there was a failure to certify the returns in the voting place immediately after the election. In the city school precinct the returns were made out on the inside of the cover of the stub-book, and the Democratic clerk affixed his signature. The other officers failed to affix their signatures purely through oversight, and the two Republican officers appeared before the county clerk on the day following the election and demanded the right to affix their signatures, and subsequently appeared before the board of election commissioners and demanded the right to sign the certificate. The Democratic judge did not offer to sign the certificate, but expressed his willingness to do so if he was assured that the figures were the same as those made by the officers in the voting place. In the courthouse precinct, which gave a Democratic majority on the face of the returns, no returns were made out in the stub-book until after the delivery of the ballot boxes to the county court clerk, when he called the attention of the officers to their omission. In the engine house precinct, where the returns showed a majority for the Democratic candidates, the certificate was not signed by the election officers until the day after the election. The ballot boxes, returns and ballots were produced before the circuit court on the hearing of the contest. The court decided in favor of appellees, and this appeal is prosecuted from said judgment. Held—That the court improperly rejected the returns from the city school precinct, as the officers of the election seem to have complied strictly with the requirements of the election law, except in regard to signing the returns, as these were only signed by the Democratic clerk; and as the Republican officers demanded the right to sign them and the other Democratic officers admitted the correctness of the returns at the time they were made, and as there is no suggestion that the ballots have been tampered with, the vote of that precinct should not be thrown out and a third of the city of Georgetown disfranchised by an inadvertent omission on the part of the election officers.

2. Marking of ballots—Three ballots, where stencil marks appeared in the circle under the device of the regular Republican ticket and also in the circle under the device of the independent Republican candidate for police judge, were improperly rejected by the circuit court. Five ballots were improperly rejected by the election officers because they were not signed by the clerk, as the rule is settled that a voter should not suffer from the negligence of an officer. Three of these ballots which were not signed by the clerk which were marked under the Republican device should have been counted for all the Republican candidates except one, who was scratched. A ballot voted in the circle under the Republican device, and a cross mark made in the blank under the name of Brooks, a Democratic candidate for the council, should have been counted for the Republican candidates except as to Brooks, who is entitled to that one vote. Three ballots marked with irregular black marks in the circle under the Democratic device were properly counted for that ticket. A ballot marked with a blurred figure under the Republican device should have been counted, and a ballot marked under the Republican device, but which was torn on the side, should be counted for that ticket. As it had been counted by the officers it will be presumed that the tearing was done subsequent to that time. A ballot cast in the courthouse precinct was improperly rejected by the circuit court because of two ink blots on the back, as there is nothing to show that these marks were placed there by the voter as distinguishing marks. The evidence showing strongly that ballots marked in the circle under the Republican device, also in the squares to the right of contestees' names, have been tampered with, they can not be counted for contestees, and are rejected, as they would not change the result. Counting for contestant sixteen so-called mutilated ballots, the eight "Hotel Lancaster" ballots, and seven ballots showing an erasure in the circle under the Republican device and the stencil in the circle under the Democratic device, the contestants are elected with the exception of contestant Clark, and contestee Kelley is elected to the council.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

At the election held November 5, 1901, in Georgetown, Scott county, there was a full Democratic ticket upon the ballot, under the emblem of the chicken cock, for all the county and city offices to be filled in that county and city at that election. There was a full Republican ticket for the same offices, except for the offices of State senator and county school superintendent, under the device of the log cabin; and there was an independent candidate for police judge under his individual device, of a picture of Abraham Lincoln. There was also a submission to the voters of a proposal to incur an indebtedness of not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of building a sewerage system in Georgetown.

The Democratic candidates for county offices appear to have won by a comfortable majority, but the vote in the city for city offices, and for magistrate of the city district, was close. The county board of election commissioners, after its canvass of the returns, issued certificates of election to A. L. Ferguson, as mayor; H. S. Rhoton, as police judge; W. S. Kelley, as city attorney; Z. D. Lusby, as chief of police; D. A. Adams, as city clerk; Geo. C. Wolfe, as city treasurer; J. T. Scott, as city assessor; M. H. M<sup>rs</sup>gard, as magistrate, and Jas. Y. Kelley, B. A. Lair, Chas. O'Neill, J. Thacker, A. G. Crumbaugh, J. T. Brooks, J. A. Hamon and A. B. Bailey, as councilmen, who were the Democratic candidates for the various offices named. The Republican candidates instituted contests for the various offices in the Scott Circuit Court. The cases were not consolidated, but were heard together, under an agreement that the depositions taken and used in one case should be considered as evidence in all the cases. On the hearing of the cases by the circuit court judgments were rendered dismissing contestants' petitions.

There were three precincts in the city of Georgetown, the engine house, the city school and the courthouse precincts. Upon the hearing of the contests the ballots preserved and produced from the city school precinct were rejected entirely, on account of failure of the officers to properly certify the returns.

It appears from the record that in all three of the precincts there was a failure to certify the returns in the voting place immediately after the election.

In the city school precinct the returns were made out on the inside of the cover of the stub book, and the Democratic clerk affixed his signature. The other officers failed to affix their signatures, as appears from the testimony, purely through oversight; and the two Republican officers appeared before the county clerk and demanded the right to affix their signatures on the day after the election, and subsequently appeared before the county board of election commissioners and demanded the right to sign the certificate. The Democratic judge did not appear before the clerk or before the board of commissioners, but seems to have stated on the outside that he was willing to sign the certificate if it was legal to do so, and in his testimony stated that he was willing to do so if he could be assured that the figures were the same as those made by the officers in the voting place.

In the courthouse precinct, which gave a Democratic majority on the face of the returns, no returns were made out in the stub-book until after the delivery of the ballot boxes to the county court clerk. The evidence indicates that the county court clerk called the attention of the officers to their omission, and there is some evidence showing that this was done on the suggestion of the clerk of election at the city school precinct.

In the engine house precinct, where the returns showed a majority for the Democratic candidates, varying from twenty-three to sixty odd, the returns were not signed until the day after the election, owing to a dispute as to whether certain ballots not endorsed by the clerk of election with his signature should be counted.

The ballot boxes, returns and ballots were all produced before the circuit court upon the hearing of the contest.

Taking the count there made as the basis, we find that in the engine house precinct there were uncontested ballots counted for the various officers as follows:

There were three ballots which were not counted by the circuit judge, because stencil marks appeared in the circle under the device of the regular Republican ticket, and also in the circle under the device of the independent Republican candidate for police judge. Under the doctrine laid down in the recently decided cases of Herndon v. Farmer and Little v. Hall, ante, 1060, these ballots should have been counted.

There appear five ballots which were rejected by the election officers because not signed by the clerk. Both parties to these records have argued in support of the proposition that where the clerk of election fails to sign his name upon the back of the ballot, as required by the statute, whether by design or through inadvertence, the ballots should not be rejected merely on account of such failure. The trial court so decided, and, in our opinion, correctly. The principle should be borne in mind that as to duties required of the voter himself and duties required of election officers, a different rule prevails, and that when officers of election, by neglect or fraud, fail to perform their duty, in a matter over which the voter has no control, the inclination of the courts is, always, that the voter shall not suffer by reason of the negligence of the officers; and, while the provision may be regarded as mandatory with regard to the officer, and his failure may subject him to punishment, it shall not disfranchise the voter who is not guilty of the violation. (McCrary on Elections, sections 225 and 283; Payne on Elections, section 528.)

In Moyer v. Van de Vanter, 50 Am. St. Rep., 900, a statute providing that official ballots lacking the endorsement of an inspector or one of the judges should not be counted, was held unconstitutional, on the ground that the mere failure of the officer to perform a directory duty should not disfranchise the voter.

In Parvin v. Winberg, 80 Am. St. Rep., 254, an endorsement by the clerk in the wrong place was held not to vitiate the ballot. (31 Am. St. Rep., 804.) And the principle here applied seems to have been the one followed in Clark v. McKenzie, 7 Bush, 523.

These five ballots should, therefore, be counted unless they are open to some other objection. Three of them were marked under the Republican device, and should have been counted for all the Republican candidates, except one, which was scratched in favor of Rhoton. One was voted for Kelley, Bristow, Finnell, Ashurst and Johnson in the squares opposite their names, and for no other candidate. One was not voted in any of the races in contest; and one was voted in the circle under the Republican device and a cross mark made in the blank under the name of Brooks, a Democratic candidate for the council. Clearly this last mentioned ballot should be counted for the Republican candidates except in that race. There is nothing to show that this mark was intended by the voter as a distinguishing mark, and we are inclined to the belief, from the position of the mark with reference to the small square, that it was intended to be a vote for Brooks. It follows, therefore, that it must be counted for him.

Six other ballots which had been counted by the officers of election were considered by the trial court, three of which had irregular black marks in the circle under the Democratic device, and were properly counted for the Democratic ticket, under the ruling in Houston v. Steele, 98 Ky., 610. One marked under both devices was properly rejected. One marked with a blurred figure under the Republican device should be counted for the Republican ticket, and one which was marked under the Republican device, but which was torn on the side, should be counted for the Republican candidates, for, having been counted by the officers, the presumption must be indulged that the tearing occurred subsequent to its consideration by them, upon the theory that the officers did their duty, even if we were of opinion that such a tear as the one in question vitiated the ballot.

Making these changes, we have the following result for the engine house precinct:

Democratic Ticket.		Republican Ticket.
Ferguson.....	186	Keller.....	125
Rhoton.....	183	Bristow.....	125
Kelley.....	181	Finnell.....	128

In the city school precinct the proceedings seem to have been conducted with perfect accord between the officers, and with exemplary care in the ascertainment of the result, and in complying with all the requirements of the statute except in the one matter of signing the returns, which were, as stated, signed only by the clerk of election. It is unnecessary to consider whether it was the duty of the county court clerk to permit the election officers, who had forgotten to sign the returns from this precinct, to sign them after they had been placed in his custody, as he did in the courthouse precinct. It is sufficient to say that there seems to be no substantial attack upon the accuracy of the count or the correctness of the returns which were made and signed by the Democratic clerk, and which are further verified by the tally sheets, which were returned with the ballots, and substantially agree with the tally made by the circuit judge. A third of the city of Georgetown is not to be disfranchised by an inadvertent omission on the part of the election officers.

There is some conflict of opinion upon this question. In some cases it has been held that the requirement of signatures to the certificate of the count is mandatory, and that a return not thus authenticated can not be received by the officers or in a contest. In Butler v. Lehman, 1 Bart. El. Cas., 353, such returns were not rejected. The New York assembly held the requirement to be directory merely (N. Y. Cont. El. Cas., 180). And in Nevada (Stinson v. Sweeney, 17 Nov., 309) it was held that where there was no question of the correctness of the return, or the qualifications of the officers or voters, the vote would not be rejected for the lack of a certificate. In People v. Nordheim, 99 Ill., 553, the court said that "the offer by the officers to sign the returns after it was discovered that they had omitted to sign them, and after the returns had been sent in to the proper authorities, was sufficient to treat the returns as if they were in fact signed, and they should have been so treated." (McCrary on Elections, sections 190 and 192.)

In Moyer v. Van de Vanter, 29 L. R. A., 672, the Supreme Court of Washington said: "There is good grounds for recognizing a distinction between the obligations placed upon the individual voter and those matters which relate to the duties of election officers. Great care should be taken to distinguish between those requirements designed to prevent fraud, and which are necessary to the purity of elections, and those which, while designed for the same purpose, are not essential thereto, or we may overreach the salutary effect sought to be obtained from provisions of the character first mentioned, by going so far, in construing as valid and mandatory provisions of the second class, as to open the very door to fraud that was sought to be closed thereby. The individual voter may well be called upon to see that the requirements of the law applying to himself are complied with before casting his ballot; and if he should willfully or carelessly violate the same, there would be no hardship or injustice in depriving him of his vote; but if, on the other hand, he should in good faith comply with the law upon his part, it would be a great hardship were he deprived of his ballot through some fault or mistake of an election officer in failing to comply with a provision of the law over which the voter had no control. It is also a question in which the public has a direct and important interest, for the loss of such vote may have a controlling effect upon a public matter."

This principle was distinctly recognized in Clark v McKenzie, 7 Bush, 526.

We conclude, therefore, in this case, that as there is no question of the correctness of the returns which were signed by a clerk representing that party against which the majority appeared, and as the officers representing the other party demanded the right to sign them, the other representative of the minority party at that precinct admitting their correctness at the time, they were made, and as the ballots themselves, upon examination, confirm the accuracy of the count by the officers, and there is no suggestion that they have been tampered with, this precinct should not be thrown out.

The tally made by the circuit judge shows the vote at this precinct to have been :

At the courthouse precinct there was some trouble in the count of the ballots. The returns showed forty-nine ballots questioned or rejected. The evidence shows quite conclusively that seventeen of these were rejected by the officers as mutilated ballots the contention of contestants being that this was fraudulently done by the clerk of election during the count. The evidence shows that twenty three of the ballots were not signed on the back by the clerk of election, and that eight of the rejected ballots were signed by him, not with his own name, Geo. D. Lancaster, but by the words "Hotel Lancaster." Contestants claim that forty-eight of the forty-nine ballots questioned or rejected should be counted for them. There is little doubt of the accuracy of the count of the ballots at this precinct, so far as they were counted. There seems to be no question on either side as to the proper preservation of the ballots which were counted. They were found intact when the ballot box was produced on the hearing of the contest. The tally made by the circuit judge accords with that of the officers, except that he rejected one ballot apparently because of two ink blots on the back. This ballot, we think, should have been counted for the straight Republican ticket, as there is nothing to show that these marks were put there by the voter for the purpose of distinguishing his ballot. Taking the circuit judge's tally, we have the vote at this precinct as follows:

Democratic Ticket.		Republican Ticket.
Ferguson.....	147	Keller.....	109
Rhoton.....	146	Bristow.....	112
Kelley.....	146	Finnell.....	114
Lusby.....	153	Ashurst.....	111

Brooks.....	145	Jenkins.....	111
Hamon.....	144	Nunnelly.....	111
Barkley.....	151	Offutt.....	105

Adding these returns, together with the one ballot improperly rejected by the court, to the votes ascertained in the other two precincts, we have the following result, without in any way considering the forty eight rejected ballots which contestants claim should have been counted for them.

Democratic Ticket.		Republican Ticket.
Ferguson.....	438	Keller.....	434

This would give the election to the contestants, Finnell, Lemon, Bradley Glass, and to five of the Republican candidates for the council.

The difficulty arises when we come to consider the votes which were not counted by the officers. Upon the hearing there were found in the box only nineteen of the twenty-three unsigned ballots, sixteen of the so called mutilated ballots, and six of the "Hotel Lancaster" ballots. The evidence goes strongly to show that the unsigned ballots and the "Hotel Lancaster" ballots are not in the same condition that they were when returned by the officers. Although at the count by the officers at the voting place the eight "Hotel Lancaster" ballots were counted and tallied as straight Republican Ballots, four of the six ballots which were produced on the hearing are marked in the squares to the right of the names of all of the contestees and in the circle under the Republican device, the other two of the six, which we have before us, being marked only in the circle under the Republican device. As to the twenty-three unsigned ballots, which were not counted by the officers, there is some conflict of testimony. Some of the persons who were officers and inspectors insist that they were not examined. The others insist that they were examined by all of those present at the count, or at least that they examined them, and they were all practically straight Republican ballots; that there were no straight Democratic ballots, and that upon only a few of them was any scratching done in favor of any Democratic candidate. An examination shows that the unsigned ballots, numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 11, 12, 14, 15 and 19, nine ballots, are marked in the circle under the Republican device and in the square at the right of the names of all the contestees, and in no other place. Ballot No. 6 is marked in the same way, except that it has in addition a slight blur, apparently made with an inky finger, in the circle under the Democratic device. Ballot No. 4, while it bears no signature of the election clerk, should be properly classed and considered with the so-called mutilated ballots. Seven of these unsigned ballots, Nos. 5, 9, 10, 13, 16, 17 and 18, show that some mark has been erased from the circle under the Republican device, and have a cross mark in the circle under the Democratic device. In four of them, notwithstanding the erasure, the outline of the cross mark in the erasure in the circle under the Republican device can still be seen in a strong light. The remaining ballot is marked in the circle under the chicken cock, and besides some marks in the squares to the right of the two Democratic candidates for county offices, is marked for both Ferguson and Keller, for both Kelly and Bates, for both Thacker and Clark, for both Crumbaugh and Caden, and also for Ashurst and Lemon on the Republican side, and Barkley on the Democratic side.

One of the so called mutilated ballots, including the one unsigned by the clerk, one (being No. 6) is imperfectly marked with the stencil in the circle under the Republican device, and is marked with a pen, with a cross (X), in the circle under the Democratic device. The remaining sixteen are all marked unmistakably in the circle under the Republican device, with a stenciled cross (X) having all the appearance of being made by the same stencil, or the same kind of stencil used in marking all the counted ballots in this and both the other precincts. Nine of them also have a mark in the circle under the Democratic device, just as unmistakably not made by that stencil or by that kind of a stencil. This mark is of a different size and shape, the arms of the cross are of a different thickness, the ink seems to be of a slightly different color, and about each of these marks under the Democratic device is a small white space, and around that a shadowy blur, evidently made by an inky thumb or finger, and plainly showing the lines of the skin. The other seven of these ballots have, in addition to the cross (X) under the Republican device, a blurred mark in the circle under the Democratic device, not made by a stencil, but apparently made by an inky thumb or finger. Nothing seems to have been done to these so-called mutilated ballots since the count. They are in substantially the same condition that the evidence indicates they were in at the time the count was made. The whole appearance of the ballots themselves, and the great weight of the testimony, tend to show that they were voted for the straight Republican ticket by the voters who cast them, and that they were fraudulently marked by a rubber cross (X) attached to a finger or thumb.

We do not decide that the clerk of election did this. We know that some one did it. We can not think it was done by the voters. Whoever did it, it must have been done for the purpose of defrauding the Republican candidates of votes which has been rightfully cast for them, and we think the attempted fraud should not be permitted to have effect. Therefore, these votes should be counted for the contestants.

The evidence is almost equally conclusive that the contestants were improperly deprived of eight votes signed by the clerk "Hotel Lancaster," and that fraud was perpetrated subsequent to the count by the abstraction of two of those ballots from the box, and by the marking of four of them in the squares to the right of contestees' names. This conclusion is strongly supported by the condition of the other ballots which were returned as not counted because not signed by the clerk, and which, despite the evidence of all the officers who claim to have examined them at the count that they were straight, or practically straight, Republican ballots, appear as scratched in favor of contestees, and of no one else. The condition of the ballot box, either key of which will open both locks, and the condition of the linen envelope in which the uncounted ballots were returned, and which, while at one end it was sealed with hot wax and an impression of the county seal, is palpably easy of entrance at the other end, show that access could have been obtained to these ballots; and the condition of the ballots themselves points strongly to the conclusion that access was actually had. The change is manifest of seven of these ballots from Republican ballots to Democratic ballots. The remaining ballots, which now appear stamped not only in the circle under the Republican device, but in the square to the right of each contestee's name, and nowhere else, are exceedingly suspicious, and are not passed upon, and are not counted for any one.

An examination of the ballots themselves shows a very suspicious state of fact, even if there were no other evidence of tampering with the ballots which were returned in the accessible envelope, and if there were no evidence as to how the ballots appeared at the time of the count.

The eight "Hotel Lancaster" ballots were undoubtedly all straight Republican ballots; but as four of them now appear, and as ten of the unsigned ballots now appear, they present a most remarkable variety of scratching. Why a voter should desire to vote the straight Republican ticket in the county, where the Republican ticket had no chance, and should also desire to defeat the candidates of what appears to have been his party in the city, where they had a chance to win, is, to begin with, exceedingly peculiar. And it further appears that the voters who had this peculiar desire stamped in the circle of the device with very varying degrees of pressure and of steadiness of hand, and varied also in the amount of ink taken up on the stencil, but when they came to scratch in favor of the Democratic city candidates every one of them showed a singularly uniform pressure, precision and care in the amount of ink taken up upon the stencil.

Inasmuch as it would not change the result to count for contestants the unsigned ballots which we find marked in the circle under the Republican device and also in the squares to the right of contestees' names, and as we can not, under the circumstances shown in this case, count them for contestees, they are not counted at all. Counting for contestants the sixteen so-called mutilated ballots, the eight "Hotel Lancaster" ballots, and the seven ballots showing an erasure in the circle under the Republican device and the stencil in the circle under the Democratic device, the contestants appear to have been elected, with the exception of contestant Clark, and contestee Kelley appears to have been elected to the council. The vote for the entire city will then stand as follows:

Democratic Ticket.		Republican Ticket.
Ferguson.....	438	Keller .....	465

Applying the same rules of evidence, drawing the same deductions from the facts before us, which we would apply and draw in an ordinary case of contest over property rights, as was done in Tunks v. Vincent, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 478, we are satisfied that we can ascertain the result of these elections as held, and counting these contested ballots in the manner indicated, we have no doubt that we thereby establish the will of the voters of Georgetown.

At the hearing a motion was made to dismiss some of the appeals for want of bond. A bond seems to have been given in each case, and no ground for the motion is pointed out by brief or otherwise. The motion is, therefore, overruled.

For the reasons given the judgments in each of the cases are reversed and causes remanded, with directions to enter judgments for the appellants, except as to contestant Clark and contestee Kelley, as to whom the judgment is affirmed.

STEWART v. GARDNER-WARREN IMPLEMENT CO.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Constitutional law—Liens—Section 2463, Kentucky Statutes, prescribing lien on real estate in favor of mechanics and material men, is constitutional.

J. P. O'Meara and James C. Poston for appellant.

W. H. Marriott for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This cause involves alone the constitutionality of section 2463, Kentucky Statutes, as follows: "A person who performs labor or furnishes materials in the erection, altering or repairing a house, building or other structure, or for any fixture or machinery therein, or for the excavation of cellars, cisterns, vaults, wells, or for the improvement, in any manner, of real estate by contract with, or by the written consent of, the owner, contractor, subcontractor, architect or authorized agent, shall have a lien thereon, and upon the lands upon which said improvements shall have been made, or any interest such owner has in the same, to secure the amount thereof, with costs," etc.

This section was held to be constitutional in Hightower v. Bailey, & Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 88. This was followed in Hodges, & Co. v. Arvidson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2078, and later in Browinski v. Pickett, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 305. The circuit court having adjudged this case in accordance with the views announced in those opinions, and no other question being raised or discussed, the judgment must be affirmed.

BROWN v. SAMUELS, &c.

Landlord and tenant—Forcible detainer—S. rented to B. a lot of ground for five years, with the privilege of five years more, B. agreeing to erect improvements thereon, which S. was to have at the end of the term as rent. At the end of the five years S. saw B., and wanted him to pay rent for the next five years, which he declined to do. S. then sued out a writ of forcible detainer to recover the possession, claiming that B. having failed to give any notice of his intention to remain five years longer, had terminated his lease. Held—That no notice was necessary to continue the lease, as under its terms it was a continuation of the old term, and simply holding possession was sufficient notice of his intention to continue his term.

J. F. Combs for appellant.

Chas. Carroll for appellees.

Appeal from Bullitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In October, 1895, appellee Samuels leased to appellant Brown, by a written contract, for five years, with the privilege of five years more, three-fourths of an acre of ground on which stood a box house about twelve feet wide and twenty-four feet long, made of rough lumber. The house had been used for a storeroom, but had been vacant for two years. Appellant built on the premises a house of two rooms, a porch and hall, a warehouse, a cellar house, a porch or platform in front of the store, a chicken house, a stable and some other outbuildings, dug a well and built a fence around the premises. The original house was covered with clapboards and so were the houses that appellant built. He puts his improvements at $500, while appellee puts their value at less than half that, $200 or $225. At the end of the five years Samuels saw Brown and wanted him to pay rent for the property for the next five years. Brown said he was not to pay any rent, and that by the contract he was to hold for five years more. Samuels said that he would sue him if he did not pay, and Brown answered that he did not think he owed him anything, and added: "If I do, you are sure to get it; and if I don't, you are sure not to get it. Look at your lease." Samuels then instituted this proceeding of forcible detainer against Brown, and obtained a judgment in his favor both before the county judge and in the circuit court. The ground of the proceeding is that Brown, by refusing to pay rent, failed to exercise his option to hold the property for the second five years on the idea that he thereby repudiated the contract or abandoned his right to hold under it. The case turns largely upon the writing itself, which is in these words:

"This lease made and entered into by and between John Samuels and wife, parties of the first part, and Charles Brown, party of the second part, both of Bullitt county, Kentucky, witnesseth: The parties of the first part have this day leased unto the party of the second part the following described piece of real estate, lying and being in Bullitt county, Kentucky, and described as follows: One storehouse and three-quarters of an acre of ground surrounding said storehouse. The said first parties do hereby lease unto the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, for the period of five years, with the privilege of five years more. The premises is hereby leased to the said second party for the consideration of one dollar cash in hand paid by said second party. The receipt of the same is hereby acknowledged. For the further consideration, the said second party agrees and binds himself to leave said improvements on said premises made by said second party upon the acceptance and occupancy of said premises heretofore described. Said above mentioned consideration is for the occupancy and control of said premises at the expiration of said term heretofore mentioned.

"And it is hereby agreed by and between said first and second parties that the party of the second part shall not sell or rent the above mentioned premises to any one without the consent of the said parties of the first part.

"In witness whereof the parties of the first part and second part have hereunto signed their names, this the 4th day of November, 1895.

"JOHN SAMUELS,
"SALLIE SAMUELS,
"CHARLES BROWN."

It will be observed that by this instrument the premises were leased to Brown for "the period of five years, with the privilege of five years more." In the Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, volume 18, page 698, 2d edition, it is said: "A provision ~~in~~ lease giving to the lessee the privilege of extending the term is to be distinguished from a provision giving to the lessee the option to renew. In the former case no notice of the lessee's election to extend the term is required, in the absence of a stipulation therefor in his lease, his mere remaining in possession being sufficient notice." (Wood on Landlord and Tenant, 678; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, 278; Terstege v. First German Benevolent Society, 47 Am. Rep., 185, and cases cited.)

The reason for this rule is that the additional time is not a new demise, but a continuation of the old one. Brown, therefore, by remaining in possession exercised his privilege of five years more, and if he failed to pay rent that he owed Samuels' remedy was an action to recover the rent. He could not dispossess Brown because he and Brown differed as to the proper construction of the contract, and Brown claimed that he did not owe any rent. The writ for forcible detainer should, therefore, have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the proceeding.

COMMONWEALTH v. RICHIE.

(Filed December 17, 1902.)

Disbarring attorneys—Jurisdiction—An information based on an affidavit charging, under the common law, that appellee by reason of acts therein charged to have been committed, was no longer such character of person as was entitled to hold the office of attorney, was filed by the Commonwealth's attorney in the chancery division of the Jefferson Circuit Court. That court dismissed the proceeding for the want of jurisdiction. Objection to the jurisdiction was based on section 137 of the Constitution on the idea that the proceeding was of a criminal nature, of which the criminal division of that court had exclusive jurisdiction. On appeal, Held—That the power given to the circuit courts, regardless of the different branches or divisions to license persons to practice as attorneys, and thereby to become officers of the court, must also include the power and authority to revoke the license granted upon proper cause being shown. It would necessarily follow that one division of the court, like the circuit court of any county, would have jurisdiction to hear and determine charges against an attorney practicing before it regardless of the court granting him license. Any branch of that court has jurisdiction to try and determine proceedings to revoke the license of an attorney just as it has to punish contempt. The chancery division had jurisdiction of this proceeding, and should have awarded the rule to show cause.

C. J. Pratt, J. M. Huffaker and Plitt & Trabue for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal division.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

This proceeding is to revoke the license of appellee, Charles G. Richie, as an attorney, and to disbar him from further practicing such profession.

The attorney for the Commonwealth in the Thirtieth Judicial District, comprising Jefferson county, filed an information based upon an affidavit, and also the affidavit, in the chancery branch, first division, of the Jefferson Circuit Court, and asked that a rule issue against appellee to show cause why his license should not be revoked. Objection was made to the order for rule on the ground that that branch of the court was without jurisdiction in the matter, and could make no order therein. Upon this objection being heard the court refused to award the rule or to take jurisdiction in the matter at all, and dismissed same for want of jurisdiction. The Commonwealth appeals.

Section 137 of the present Constitution, so far as applicable herein, provides: "Each of the judges in such district shall hold a separate court, except when a general term may be held for the purpose of making rules, or as may be required by law. * * * Criminal causes shall be under the exclusive jurisdiction of some one branch of said court, and all other litigation in said district, of which the circuit court may have jurisdiction, shall be distributed as equally as may be between the other branches thereof, in accordance with the rules of the court made in general term, or as may be prescribed by law."

It is contended by counsel for appellee that this proceeding is a criminal cause, and that it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the criminal branch of the Jefferson Circuit Court.

The charge in the affidavit and information is not under the statute for failing to pay over money collected, while that is a part of the alleged misconduct of appellee, but the charge is under the common law, that appellee, by reason of acts therein charged to have been committed, was no longer such character of person as was entitled to hold the office of attorney at law. If guilty of the charge as stated in the affidavit and information the punishment prescribed by statute, of suspension for one year and until the money was paid, would not apply, but the court would be authorized to revoke the license entirely, and to disbar the attorney from practice entirely. The question is then presented as to whether the criminal division of the Jefferson Circuit Court alone has jurisdiction to try a person on proceeding to disbar him from practice. The question as to whether a proceeding of this character is civil or criminal is not one about which the courts have agreed. There is eminent authority to sustain both sides of the question.

The direct question has not been decided by this court. In Baker v. Commonwealth, 10 Bush, 592, the court said the proceeding is more in the nature of a criminal than civil proceeding. That is as far as we have gone. This is true of contempt proceedings, yet it must be conceded by all that every court has inherent power and jurisdiction to protect itself by punishing contempt shown it. We are of opinion that any branch of the Jefferson Circuit Court has jurisdiction to try and determine proceeding to revoke the license of an attorney, just as it has to punish contempt. If the proceeding was a criminal cause, as meant by the constitutional provision supra, the accused could claim a trial by jury, which has never been the rule in this character of case. It seems to be conceded that if an attorney was to commit some crime, as to destroy or mutilate a writing used as evidence, in the presence of the court, and in the progress of the trial, the court would have the right and power to make an order revoking his license and disbarring him from practicing further in that court as well as all others.

If the court other than criminal division has power and jurisdiction to disbar at all for any cause, the exclusive jurisdiction would not be in the criminal division. Every court must of necessity have the power to protect itself in the administration of justice, by preventing dishonest and corrupt persons from appearing as counsel in the trial of cases before it. It would not comport with reason to say that it was ever intended that either branch of the circuit court could grant license, and that then the whole question was turned over to the criminal division as to how long a person could enjoy the benefits and privileges thereby given, and when any division might be outraged by the misconduct of an attorney, such division or court would be required to go before the criminal division for redress. This court has jurisdiction by statute and the Constitution, appellate in its nature only, supervisory over the subordinate courts, yet we think it would not be questioned that for misconduct in this court, and in our presence at least, we would be without jurisdiction to disbar the offending attorney.

An attorney is an officer of the court, created by the court and is always subject to the rule requiring honesty and good demeanor toward the court in which he practices his profession. When it appears by due process of law in such cases provided that an attorney has forfeited his right to longer be an attorney or officer of the court in the administration of justice, by reason of dishonest practices, it is the duty of the court to take from such offender the right to appear as an attorney. Without referring and quoting from the many conflicting authorities, we have reached the conclusion that the power given to the circuit courts, regardless of the different branches or divisions, to license persons to practice as attorneys, and thereby to become officers of the court, must also include the power and authority to revoke the license granted upon proper cause being shown. It would necessarily follow that one division of the court, like the circuit court of any county, would have jurisdiction to hear and determine the charges against an attorney practicing before him, regardless of what court in the State granted the license.

For these reasons we conclude the chancery division of the Jefferson Circuit Court had jurisdiction of this proceeding, and should have awarded the rule to show cause. The judgment dismissing the proceeding for want of jurisdiction is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

DILLEHAY v. HICKEY, BY, &c.

Construction of statutes—Section 68, Kentucky Statutes, changes the common law rule as to the liability of the owner of a dog to a person bitten by him. Unless a person is on the premises of another after dark or engaged in some unlawful act thereon, he is not deprived of the right to recover damages.

C. R. McDowell and R. P. Jacobs for appellant.

Robt. Harding, John W. Rawlings and W. J. Price for appellees.

-Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

It is earnestly insisted in the petition for rehearing that the plaintiff, for her own convenience and not in the discharge of any duty to the defendant, or on any business, went on the defendant's premises, knowing that the dog was dangerous, and that she thus by her own act placed herself outside of the legal pale of remedy. In support of this contention we are referred to section 51 of Meach. on Contributory Negligence, and to the case of Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass., 44. These authorities rest on common law principles. But our statute has changed the rule of the common law as to the liability of the owner of a dog to a person bitten by him. It provides: "Every person owning, having or keeping any dog shall be liable to the party injured for all damages done by such dog. But no recovery shall be had in case the person injured is at the time upon the premises of the owner of the dog after night, or engaged in some unlawful act in the day time." (Kentucky Statutes, section 68.)

The rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, does not apply to this revision; on the contrary its provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to promote its object. Common words and phrases are to be understood according to their ordinary sense. (Kentucky Statutes, section 460.) The injury in this case did not occur after night, and in determining the meaning of the words "engaged in some unlawful act in the day time," we must give the words their proper force, according to the common and approved usage of language. There is a material difference in these words and the words "shall be on the premises unlawfully in the day time." The contention of appellant, if adopted, would amount in substance to making the statute so read. This was not the purpose of the legislature. It exempted the owner from liability where the person injured was upon the premises after night, or where he was engaged in some unlawful act in the day time. Appellee's purpose on the premises of appellant was entirely innocent. She went there to get her milk, according to custom, and not finding appellant at the house, went down to the stable to speak to her socially, and was not engaged in doing an unlawful act within the meaning of the statute. The question of contributory negligence on the part of appellee was by proper instruction aptly submitted to the jury.

Petition overruled.

CRATE, &c. v. STRONG, &c.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Marcum & Pollard for appellants.

J. J. C. Bach, A. C. Baker and W. W. McGuire for appellees.

Appeal from Breathitt Circuit Court.

Judge Hobson delivered the following response to petition for rehearing:

The mandate in this case is modified so as to direct the circuit court to, perpetuate plaintiffs' injunction as to all the land within their boundary, with the exception of the one hundred acres patented to S. L. Stacy upon the survey bearing date January 16, 1871, and to adjudge to the plaintiffs the proceeds of ~~the~~ timber out from their thirty-six hundred acre boundary outside of the Stacy one hundred-acre patent above mentioned. The record is not so presented as to enable us to satisfactorily fix the amount of this timber, and on the return of the case the parties may be allowed to take, further proof on the question. In other respects the petition for rehearing is overruled. The authorities relied on are not applicable where the defendant is a trespasser without title. What is said in the opinion is intended only to apply to the parties before the court. The rights of the other parties are, of course, not defined.

Rehearing refused.

ROACH v. T. J. MOSS TIE CO., &c.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Title—Burden of proof—This was an action to recover for the value of timber cut from a tract of land. The defendant by answer set up title to the land, and a verdict resulted for defendant. On appeal appellant insists that the court erred to his prejudice in giving to defendant the burden of proof. Held—That appellant having taken no exception to the ruling of the court fixing the burden of proof, can not complain on appeal.

2. Practice—Court urging jury to make a verdict—Appellant can not complain because the court urged the jury to hasten a verdict, as it is not shown that this action was prejudicial to him.

3. Appeals—Where appellant brought his action to recover $195, the value of timber cut from land, and defendant's answer sets up title to land, appellant may prosecute an appeal from a judgment against him, as it involves the title to land.

E. P. Neal and W. H. Barnes for appellant.

M. L. Heaverin for appellees.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

The appellant, Roach, instituted this action against the T. J. Moss Tie Co. and Eliza J. Taylor, seeking to recover judgment for $195 for the taking and cutting of timber on land, as plaintiff alleges, owned by him and in his possession. Defendants deny plaintiff's title and Mrs. Taylor's asserted ownership of the land. The Moss Tie Co. is not before the court on this appeal, hence its rights will be in no manner affected by the opinion and judgment rendered upon this appeal, nor is it necessary to notice the defense relied on by it. The plaintiff traversed the answer of Mrs. Taylor. A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial having been overruled he prosecutes this appeal.

The grounds relied on are in substance: First, the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and evidence; second, error of the court in ruling that the burden of proof is on the defendant; third, error of the court in overruling plaintiff's motion to continue at the cost of defendants upon their filing an amended answer on the day of the trial; fourth, in allowing the amended petition to be filed; fifth, the verdict of the jury is palpably against the evidence and clearly the result of passion and prejudice; sixth, the court erred in admonishing the jury to remain out only thirty minutes on Saturday evening, and repeatedly sending to and for them Monday morning to hasten in their finding of a verdict.

It may be said that the evidence in this case is somewhat conflicting, but we are clearly of the opinion that there was abundant evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury. The second ground for a new trial complains of the court ruling that the burden of proof was on the defendant. We fail to find in the bill of exceptions that the court ever made a distinct ruling as to the burden of proof, or that any exception was taken to the introduction of defendants' testimony first. It is true that certain papers purporting to be copies of judgment, and some orders attested by the circuit clerk and filed by appellant at the time he sued out his appeal, show that such an order was made, and that the plaintiff excepted thereto; but that paper is simply signed by the clerk and for the purpose of this appeal. The bill of exceptions signed by the judge constitutes the entire record upon which this appeal must be tried. We doubt if plaintiff suffered any injury by the defendant taking the burden of proof, but be it as it may, the propriety of that ruling is not before us for revision for the reason aforesaid.

We do not think the court erred in permitting the amended answer to be filed, or in refusing to continue the case on that account. No affidavit was filed showing any reason for continuing it. Moreover, the amended answer was substantially the same as the original answer. There is nothing in the bill of exceptions showing that the court admonished the jury on Saturday to remain out only thirty minutes, nor does the bill show that the jury were directed to hasten their finding on Monday morning. Moreover, such matters are largely within the discretion of the court, and if it did appear that the statements in the motion for a new trial are true, the same would not be grounds for reversal unless it otherwise appeared that probably such conduct was prejudicial to the plaintiff. There is nothing in this case to indicate that the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice. The appellee insists that this court has no jurisdiction of this appeal for the reason that only $195 are in controversy. It will be seen, however, that the title to real estate is in fact involved in the controversy. The case of Stillwell v. Duncan, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1701, is conclusive of the question of jurisdiction, hence the motion of appellee to dismiss must be overruled.

After a careful reading of this entire record, we fail to find any error to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the appellant. The jury being presumably acquainted with the witnesses and understanding the description given by them of the various tracts of land and boundaries involved in the suit, were peculiarly well qualified to find the real truth of the matter in controversy. No complaint is made by the appellant as to the instructions, hence no question of that kind is before us.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. FAYETTE BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Taxation of property of building and loan associations—A building and loan association, since June 23, 1894, is not liable as a corporation for taxes on notes and mortgages held by it as the law which took effect on that date required the owners of stock to assess same for taxation.

Webb & Farrell and R. J. O'Mahoney for appellant.

Mat Walton and J. H. Mulligan for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

This proceeding was instituted in the county court by the auditor's agent for Fayette county to require the defendant, the Fayette Building and Loan Association, to assess certain mortgage notes owned by it, which it was alleged they had omitted to assess from 1891 to 1900, inclusive. The building and loan association filed a response to the motion in four paragraphs. In the first it denied the right of the auditor's agent to require the notes recited in his motion to be assessed for taxation, or that they were of the value therein set forth. In the second paragraph they allege that they are a joint stock company, their capital being represented by certificates of stock and invested in loans to the members and shareholders in the association and secured by mortgages on real estate; that by the express terms of the statute the shares of stock of the association are made liable for assessment and taxation in the hands of the individual holders of the same, and not in that of the association. In the third paragraph they allege that the mortgage notes and other choses in action in which the capital of the association is invested is not liable for assessment. In the fourth paragraph they plead and rely upon the act of the general assembly, approved May 23, 1890, in bar of plaintiff's right to maintain this proceeding.

General demurrers were sustained to the first and fourth paragraphs of the response and overruled as to the second and third. Plaintiff then filed a reply to the second and third paragraphs, in which they allege that the defendant was incorporated and organized on the 29th of February, 1888, and was in existence prior to the adoption of the present Constitution; that it has never at any time filed in the office of the secretary of state any acceptance of the present Constitution as required by section 190; and that by reason of their failure to comply with this provision of the Constitution and the statute passed pursuant thereto they were not entitled to avail themselves of the act of the general assembly approved on the 23d of March, 1894, now known as section 4093 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that the shares of building associations, or building and loan associations shall be taxed as other individual personal property, and shall be listed with the assessor by the owners of said shares. The amount so listed by every owner or shareholder to correspond with the amount paid in and not withdrawn by the said shareholder on the 15th of September of each year. A general demurrer was sustained to the reply, and plaintiff declining to plead further, the trial court dismissed the proceedings, hence this appeal. Under the provisions of the general law as it stood prior to the adoption of the act of the 23d day of March, 1894, the property of building and loan associations was required to be assessed in the name of the corporation in the same manner as that of natural persons, that is, they were required to list for taxation their capital, surplus, undivided profits, etc., but they were not required in addition to list in items their notes, mortgages, and other evidences of indebtedness in which their capital stock was invested. The general assembly by the act of March, 1894, changed this mode of assessment so far as building and loan associations were concerned, and required that the shares of stock should be assessed by the individual stockholder instead of by the company. There can be no question of the power of the general assembly to prescribe this mode of assessing the property of this class of corporation, it was wholly a matter of legislative discretion, and after the enactment of this statute it was not a matter over which the defendant had any control; they were bound to comply with the provisions of the law and assess the property in the manner pointed out by the statute. We are, therefore, of opinion that from the time this statute took effect, on the 23d of June, 1894, the corporation itself was not liable for the taxes. It is unnecessary for us to determine whether the statute approved May 23, 1890, would be available as a defense to a proceeding instituted by the auditor's agent to assess the capital stock, surplus, etc., of the defendant for the years prior to 1894, as that question is not before us.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Criminal law—Misconduct of attorney for the Commonwealth in argument—In the closing argument of the attorney for the Commonwealth he seemed determined to get around the former opinion of the court, and by indirection and innuendo get before the jury exactly what this court had said should not be directly proven with regard to appellant having been indicted for the murder of George Baker, and he succeeded in his undertaking, and the prejudicial matters thus brought in would not, separate and alone, be sufficient to entitle appellant to a reversal, but taken together in the manner in which they were presented to the jury, they were prejudicial in a high degree.

2. Evidence—Good character—Legislative journals—Where the character of a witness for the prosecution was attacked the reading of the legislative journal, showing that Republican members voted for witness for doorkeeper in 1900, was improper, but not material.

3. Discretion of court as to order of introduction of evidence—The lower court has a large discretion as to the order of introduction of evidence. Introduction of evidence in rebuttal which was properly primary evidence was not an abuse of discretion.

4. Rebuttal testimony—Where the prosecution introduced evidence to the effect that the accused was seen running away from the executive building with a black, stubby moustache, while the accused and other witnesses testified that he had been smooth shaven for a year, it was competent in rebuttal to show that the accused, some months before the killing, was in the possession of a stubby false moustache.

5. Instructions—Where a conspiracy is not charged, but nevertheless the Commonwealth is permitted to introduce evidence that a conspiracy existed; that the accused was a member of it, and that various persons who are claimed to be co-conspirators did acts and made declarations in furtherance of the purpose of such conspiracy, it follows inevitably that the jury should be told in effect how far, and under what circumstances, they could consider evidence of the acts and doings of the co-conspirators as evidence against the defendant on trial.

6. Res judicata—The rule that the law, as declared on the first appeal, is the controlling principle of the case on the second appeal is recognized, but this principle is sharply limited to decisions on a prior appeal on points necessary to a determination of the cause. On matters not essential or questions incidental or not considered, the court is not conclusively bound on the second appeal.

7. Instruction—Good character—The law presumes a person to be of at least ordinary good character; that this presumption continues throughout the case and is evidence in favor of the accused, but a refusal to give an instruction upon this point was not reversible error.

Gordon & Gordon, J. A. Scott and J. A. Violett for appellant.

T. C. Campbell, R. B. Franklin, B. G. Williams and L. W. Arnett for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

Appellant, James B. Howard, having been jointly indicted with Henry Youtsey, Berry Howard, Harlan Whittaker and Richard Combs for the murder of William Goebel, was upon separate trial found guilty.

Upon the former appeal of this case (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1845) enough was written in the opinion and in the separate concurring opinions of Chief Justice Paynter and Judges Hobson and White to give a general idea of the circumstances surrounding the murder as disclosed by the record, and to show the contentions on behalf of the Commonwealth and the accused. Upon that trial the contention of the accused was that he had not been in Frankfort for over a year before the morning of the assassination, except when summoned as a witness in the Federal court; that he wished to obtain a pardon from Taylor, who had received a certificate of election as governor, for a crime whereof he stood indicted in the Clay Circuit Court; that he was notified by one of his friends that the contest over the governorship between Taylor and Goebel would soon be decided and probably in favor of Goebel, and, therefore, if he desired to apply for a pardon to Taylor he should do so before the judgment; that immediately thereafter he went to Frankfort for the purpose of making the application, and arrived there about one hour before the shooting. His effort, therefore, was to show that his visit to Frankfort was solely for the purpose of obtaining a pardon, and had nothing to do with the murder of Senator Goebel.

The crime of which appellant was accused in Clay county was the murder of George Baker. It is perfectly evident, under the doctrine laid down in the case of Welsh v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 151, that neither the fact that he was indicted for that crime in Clay county, nor the fact that he committed the crime, could have been shown against him in this case, either as a defendant or as a witness in his own behalf. Such facts could not be shown against him as a defendant, because irrelevant; they could not be shown against him to impeach him as a witness, because such a mode of impeachment is forbidden by the statute. On the former trial, as he had the right to do, he waived his right, and upon direct examination, stated that he was indicted in Clay county for killing George Baker, and came to Frankfort on the 30th of January, 1900, to try to get a pardon. Upon cross-examination he was asked, and compelled to answer, against objection, whether Baker was not an old man, unarmed, with his hands up, begging Howard for God's sake to spare his life. There was other cross-examination of like character as to the shooting, from a curtained window, of Tom Baker, in the presence of his wife and infant child, and as to whether Howard was guilty of that killing and had been indicted therefor, which cross-examination was not objected to, but was referred to in the opinion for the guidance of the circuit court upon the second trial. That the cross-examination, which was objected to, was improper was conceded by all the court, six of the judges concurring in the opinion that it was seriously prejudicial, and the whole court concurred in the reversal of the case on account of the improper statements to the jury by one of the counsel for the Commonwealth. The court's view of the law was thus stated in the concurring opinion of Judge Hobson, which must be regarded as the law of the case: "Judge White and I concur in the opinion of the court in the reversal of the judgment on this case on the ground that the particulars of the shooting of Baker by appellant should not have been admitted in evidence, and that, as the record stands, the statement of the attorney for the State in his closing speech set out in the opinion was peculiarly prejudicial. Appellant can not be convicted in this case because he may have committed another crime of like character, and proof that he had done so, or even such an impression, might seriously prejudice him before the jury, who might consider that such proof showed he was the character of person who would commit such a deed as that charged herein."

When put on trial for the second time the accused had the same rights as he had upon his first trial. He might waive them or not at his election, for he had been granted a new trial. He was not estopped by the course he pursued upon the first trial in objecting, or failing to object, to the admission of incompetent testimony, nor by his own statement of a fact which could not properly be proved against his objection. Nevertheless, in the opening statement, counsel for the Commonwealth was permitted to state to the jury, against objection, describing the situation upon the day of the murder: "At that time W. S. Taylor had the pardoning power, and at that time James B. Howard, the defendant in this case, was under indictment for the murder of George Baker." Counsel further was permitted to state, against objection, that "he has stated in the presence of a jury, in this court room, that he came to get a pardon. Surely the gentleman won't object to that." That this was improper there can be no doubt, under the rulings of the former opinion, where the court said: * * * "And it is a well-established rule that it is error sufficient to reverse a judgment for the court to suffer counsel, against the objection of the defendant, to state facts not in the evidence or pertinent to the issue, and the evidence of which would have been ruled out. (Encyclopædia of Pleading and Practice volume 2, page 727; Kennedy v. Commonwealth, 77 Ky., 380; 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1854)." Whether it was prejudicial must be determined from the subsequent proceedings in the case.

After Howard's direct examination, in which he detailed the circumstances of his trip, he was asked on cross-examination, and compelled against objection to answer, the question: "For what purpose were you going to Frankfort?" He replied: "I came here to get a pardon—to try to get one."

"Q. To get a pardon from whom?"

"A. From Governor Taylor."

"Q. For what?"

To this question the court sustained an objection. He was compelled to state, against objection, what was contained in a letter read to him by Bev. White from the latter's brother, viz.: That the latter thought Taylor would be ousted in a few days, and if Howard wanted to get a pardon he had better come on and see him before he was ousted, as well as some matters in regard to Mr. Parker assisting Howard in seeing a Laurel county jury about assisting him in obtaining a pardon.

The witness, Feeny, having on direct examination stated that he had known Howard for some three or four years, was compelled to answer that he first met him in the Richmond jail.

The witness, W. F. Phillips, a witness for the accused, was asked on cross-examination if a short time before Senator Goebel was shot Jim Howard, Bev. White and John G. White were not holding secret conferences and caucuses there, and not inviting the witness to be present, or permitting him to hear, so much so that it became unpleasant for him, and for that reason he sold out his interest and moved to Burning Springs in that county: to which he answered "no." He was then asked if, in a conversation with W. D. Weaver, he had not asked Weaver if he knew they were accusing Jim Howard of having killed Mr. Goebel, and if Weaver did not say: "No, I didn't know it; but I suspected it, because it was done on the same plan that Tom Baker was killed at Manchester;" and if witness did not then state that he had been in business with Bev. White, and Bev. White and Jim Howard and others were constantly caucusing at the store and holding secret conferences to which he was not invited, conducting themselves in such a manner that it became unpleasant for him, and that he dissolved the partnership and moved his stock of goods to Burning Springs. The witness answered that he did not remember it. Afterward the witness, Weaver, was permitted to answer, against objection, that the conversation between Phillips and himself did occur as indicated in the question, thus permitting Weaver, when under oath, to detail to the jury a statement by him, when not under oath, of his suspicion of the accused in connection with another murder, and that the murder of another Baker, committed under peculiarly revolting circumstances, and in a manner similar to that in which the murder of Goebel was committed. This suspicion of Weaver was clearly incompetent, and as clearly unnecessary to the contradiction of the statement of the witness Phillips. (Commonwealth v. Hourigan, 89 Ky., 311; Crittenden v. Commonwealth, 82 Ky., 167.) The procedure complained of here goes a-step further than what was condemned in the two cases cited. There the court condemned an effort to show that the witness who was being cross-examined had stated out of court facts which he failed to prove in court, and thus to transform such hearsay testimony into substantive evidence which did not have the oath of the witness to support it. Here it was not the hearsay statement of a cross-examined witness which was transformed into substantive evidence against the defendant, but evidence of what a third party said to the witness.

The leading counsel for the Commonwealth in his address to the jury, referring to the testimony given on compulsion, that Howard's visit to Frankfort was for the purpose of obtaining a pardon, was permitted to say, against objection: "Why did he leave his home? He tells us that he lef

For the purpose of getting a pardon, but he declines to tell us for what that pardon was to be. Let us try and reason for ourselves what it was, and I ask you to think what kind of a pardon did he need that would take him from his home so suddenly? He didn't get the word until the afternoon of Saturday, the 27th, and yet we find him on his way on Sunday morning. What was it? They objected to James Howard telling it, and you are, therefore, left to guess for yourselves what it could have been. What is it that this man required such hot haste for him to leave and come by London and stop at Winchester, reaching Frankfort on the morning of the 30th? What kind of a crime? It would not be for carrying a pistol. It would not be for disorderly conduct. It would not be for stealing. I don't believe Jim Howard would steal. I give him credit for that. Then it was something, was it not, that we are not permitted to know, and we are forced to guess? Would you guess it was murder? It must have been a heinous murder that would require this man to leave his home, surrounded by his friends, to come to Frankfort."

And again, after an impressive reference to the mountain feuds and to "waylayings and ambushings day after day, and month after month, and year after year," counsel was also permitted to say: "Goebel was killed as Tom Baker was killed. Clay county invented that method. I am not saying that Jim Howard did that, but Clay county did." And again counsel exclaimed, alluding to the trial of Powers at Georgetown for the same offense: "Let them prove it, let them prove it, was the cry at Georgetown."

It is impossible in reading this record to escape the conclusion that counsel determined to get around the former opinion of this court, and by indirection and innuendo, get before the jury exactly what this court had said should not be directly proven, and that they succeeded in their undertaking. Having got before the jury a statement that the defendant was indicted for the murder of George Baker; that he was seeking a pardon for that offense; that he had been in the Richmond jail; that he was seeking the assistance of a Laurel county jury to obtain his pardon; that he was under suspicion of the murder of Tom Baker, committed under circumstances similar to the murder of Goebel, with which he is here charged, these matters are argued to the jury as if proven, and doubtless produced the same effect upon the minds of the jury. And if "appellant can not be convicted in this case because he might have committed another crime of like character," and if "proof that he had done so, or even such an impression might seriously prejudice him before the jury," can we say it was not prejudicial to permit these statements to be made to the jury, with all the color and fire of the practiced jury orator, doubly impressive because of the sanction of the respected circuit judge, and supported by the incompetent evidence and suggestions which had been adroitly injected into the record? We do not undertake to say that each and every one of these matters would in and of itself alone be sufficient to entitle appellant to a reversal; but, taken together, in the manner in which they were presented to the jury, they were prejudicial in a high degree. Certain objections to testimony are urged upon this appeal which were argued, and must be presumed to have been considered, upon the former appeal, but there are some objections urged which should be considered. The witness, J. B. Matthews, was asked if, at a speaking in Somerset before the election, in the fall of 1899, he said in substance: "Goebel will never be governor. Some one will kill him first." While this might be permissible on cross-examination, it was clearly collateral. It occurred long before the date at which it claimed any conspiracy was formed, and the Commonwealth should not have been permitted to prove by the witness, Epperson, that Matthews made the statement. Whether this was prejudicial, however, is doubtful. The witness, Sanderlin, called for the Commonwealth on his re-examination, was permitted to state, against objection, that Robert Webb had a conference with Beverly White in the courtyard, after which Webb told the witness that White would give him $50 if he would leave. This would seem to be hearsay.

It is also objected that the Commonwealth was permitted to read the legislative journal showing that in 1900 Republican members of the legislature voted for the witness, Stubblefield, for doorkeeper, the evidence being introduced for the purpose of sustaining Stubblefield's character, which had been attacked. This does not appear to be an authorized mode of establishing the fact sought to be established, but does not seem to be particularly material. It is objected that Chadwell testified that, in the presence of himself and one Jones, accused said that Goebel "was shot a bad shot or a deadener; that he saw them taking him off, and he thought he was shot a bad shot." After Howard denied having such a conversation, Jones was introduced in rebuttal, and, against objection, permitted to detail the same conversation. While this testimony of Jones was properly primary testimony, and should have been introduced in chief, some discretion is necessarily allowed the trial court as to such matters, and this hardly amounts to an abuse of such discretion.

There was testimony tending to show that the accused had been recognized running from the executive building, and at the doorway with a black, stubby moustache. For the defense, the accused and other witnesses testified that he had been smooth-shaven for a year or more before the killing. The Commonwealth was permitted in rebuttal to introduce testimony showing that some months before the murder the accused had possession of a false moustache. This seems to have been perfectly competent rebuttal testimony.

Upon the former appeal it was elaborately argued that, inasmuch as the indictment charged the murder to have been committed by the accused, acting jointly with certain-named co-defendants and others unknown to the grand jury, and contained no averment of a conspiracy, no testimony should have been permitted, the object of which was to show the existence of a conspiracy, and no testimony as to the acts or declarations of the supposed co-conspirators. It was perhaps natural, when counsel relied with such confidence upon the absolute incompetency of the testimony objected to, that they should not have presented any instruction as to the effect of such testimony if considered admissible, and upon the former appeal the question of how far, and under what circumstances, the acts and declaration of co-conspirators were admissible against the accused was not presented in argument or considered by the court. Upon the second trial, however, an instruction was offered by the accused and refused that he could not be convicted upon evidence of what other persons did, but must be convicted, if at all, only upon proof of his own acts and conduct, which must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; and it is argued here that if, as was the fact, a "great mass of testimony of acts and conversations of persons other than the accused is permitted to go to the jury and be considered by them on the conspiracy theory, then the jury should have been instructed as to the purpose of such testimony, and how far and under what conditions it could be considered by them against the accused;" that, in the language used in Robertson's Ky. Crim. Law, section 109: "If, after the acts and declarations are admitted in evidence, the testimony to establish the conspiracy is not conclusive, 'the question as to the existence of such conspiracy, at the time of the acts and declarations, should be submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions,' and the question of whether the parties actually did confederate in a common purpose, and whether the acts and declarations offered in evidence were actually done in furtherance of that design, is for the determination of the jury."

Oldham v. Bentley, 6 B. Mon., 431, is cited in support of this proposition, where it was said: "It is objected that the court improperly refused to tell the jury that the admission of one of the defendants in the absence of the other was not evidence against both. But as there had been previous evidence conducing to prove a combination, the evidence objected to was properly left to the jury, with instructions that unless they believed from other evidence that the defendants had combined for the purpose of effecting the purpose as alleged, this evidence should have no effect as proof except against the defendant who made the admission."

Also Sandusky v. McGee, 7 J. J. M., 266, and Goings v. State, 46 Ohio St., 467, the latter case being the only adjudged case in support of the admission of testimony as to the acts and declarations of co-conspirators upon the trial of an indictment where conspiracy is not charged, in which case there is a clear recognition of the principle contended for.

While the instruction which was in fact asked upon this subject was not framed in accordance with the rule in this State, the fact remains that an instruction was asked directly upon this subject, and the court should have given the whole law of the case. And while, upon the former appeal, the question of an instruction upon this point was not presented or considered, and the only questions considered upon the instructions were as to the propriety of those which were in fact given, we find the doctrine now presented was distinctly recognized in the opinion. Said the court upon the former appeal, considering testimony as to the acts and declarations of others, who were either co-defendants or supposed to be co-conspirators: "Of course the testimony of neither of these witnesses has any bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant, Howard, unless the Commonwealth, by other testimony, establishes a guilty connection between the defendant and Youtsey, and shows to the satisfaction of the jury either that he fired the fatal shot, or was present and aided and encouraged Youtsey or another to do so." (Howard v. Commonwealth, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1850.)

And again: "And on the trial of one of several defendants jointly indicted for an offense, the declaration of a co-defendant made in the absence of the defendant on trial in furtherance of the common purpose is admissible, when a prima facie case of conspiracy has been made out. To authorize the admission of such evidence an express averment in the indictment of the fact of a conspiracy is not necessary. (Goings v. State, 46 O. St., 457.)

"But to make the declaration competent it must have been in furtherance of the prosecution of the common object, or constituted a part of the res gestæ of some act done for that purpose." (1 Taylor's Ev., page 542, section 530; ibid, page 1850.)

And again: "It seems to us that these declarations of Youtsey come within the rule laid down in these authorities, and are competent evidence to go to the jury. But it must not be forgotten that the defendant's guilt, as principal or accessory, can only be finally established by evidence of his own acts." (Wright's Criminal Conspiracies, 69 and 71; Stephens' Digest of Criminal Law, article 39; ibid, page 1851.)

Under these principles, it follows that while the particular instructions asked upon this subject should not have been given, the law should have been stated to the jury. If a conspiracy had been alleged in the indictment, it would undoubtedly have been necessary to instruct the jury as to the extent and the circumstances under which evidence of the acts and declarations of co-conspirators were to be received against the accused. Such an instruction is universally required and given in all cases where conspiracy is charged. Where, as in this case, a conspiracy is not charged, but nevertheless the Commonwealth is permitted to introduce evidence that a conspiracy existed; that the accused was a member of it, and that various persons who are claimed to be co-conspirators did acts and made declarations in furtherance of the purpose of such conspiracy, it follows inevitably that the jury should be told, in effect, how far and under what circumstances they could consider evidence of the acts and doings of the co conspirators as evidence against the defendant on trial. Some such instruction should have been given as was given in the Powers case (12 Ky. Law Rep., 1837): "If the jury believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that a conspiracy was formed between the defendant and * * * Henry Youtsey, * * * or either or any of them, or with others to the jury unknown, acting in concert with them, or either of them, to kill William Goebel, then after the formation of said conspiracy, if any, every act and declaration of each of the conspirators done or said in furtherance of the common design before the consummation thereof, became the act or declaration of all engaged in the conspiracy."

It is, therefore, not necessary to consider whether this court has power to review its own decision upon a second appeal. The rule that the law as declared on the first appeal is the controlling principle of the case on the second appeal is recognized, whether such rule be regarded as an application of the doctrine of res judicata or of stare decisis, or simply what is called in Van Fleet on Former Adjudication a rule "of expediency, which is not to be lightly disregarded." There is considerable conflict of authority upon this rule, but as said by Mr. Aiken in the article on appeals, in 2 Encycl. of Pleading and Prac., page 381: "The principle is sharply limited to decisions on a prior appeal on points necessary to a determination of the cause. On matters not essential, or questions incidental or not considered, the court is not conclusively bound on the second appeal."

On the former appeal of this case the question was as to the errors complained of. The questions were whether the errors complained of were reversible. It was held that certain of those errors were reversible, and the judgment was reversed. Other matters complained of were held not to be error. This question was not presented or considered, but the legal doctrine applicable was considered and announced, and should have been followed by the circuit court. Considerable argument is devoted to the proposition that the law presumes the accused to be a person of at least ordinary good character; that this presumption continues throughout the case, and is evidence in favor of the accused, and that an instruction should have been given upon this subject. As an abstract proposition of law, there is no doubt of the correctness of the proposition, which is supported by innumerable authorities. Whether it should be given in an instruction to the jury is another question. The only authorities cited upon the proposition that an instruction upon this point must be given are cases in the Federal court (McKnight v. United States, 97 Fed. Rep., 210; Mullen v. United States, 106 Fed. Rep., 894), and in a case from Texas (Stephen v. State, 20 Tex. App., 255). In which last-named case it was held that as counsel for the State improperly discussed the character of the defendant, which was not put in issue, the court should have given the jury a special charge upon the subject of good character, in order to prevent, as far as possible, any prejudice to the defendant by reason thereof. As to the cases in the Federal courts, in one of which the case was reversed because of comments by the district attorney similar to those condemned in the Texas case, it must be remembered that the Federal courts follow the English practice as to charging the jury. The judges comment at length upon the testimony, and advise the jury specifically as to the weight and credit which should be given to particular parts of it; while it might be eminently proper, under that system of charging the jury, to say to them that the accused was presumed to be a person of at least ordinarily good character, and that this presumption continues throughout the trial of the case, such a procedure is unheard of under our system, and its adoption by this court would necessitate the reversal of nearly every Commonwealth case. A contrary procedure seems to be well established, and we do not think the refusal of the trial court to instruct as requested was error.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to award appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Judge Guffy concurs in the reversal for the sole reason that the court did not give the instruction indicated in the opinion, but holds that no other error was committed by the court to the prejudice of the appellant.

KLOSTERMAN, &c. v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO., &c.

1. Railroads—Damages—Statutes of limitation—This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to property from the operation of a double track of a railroad on a street near appellants' houses. In defense appellee claims that as its railroad was constructed more than five years before the institution of the action, the right of recovery was barred by the statute of limitation. Held—That a railroad is a permanent structure, and when its construction in the streets of a city is authorized by legislative and municipal authority, all damages naturally resulting from the proper operation of the road can then be ascertained and determined, and the cause of action therefor is barred by limitation after five years from the time the action might first have been instituted. In this case the authority was expressly limited by municipal authority to a single track, and it can not by construction be enlarged, for this would be to violate the plain terms of the instrument. The limitation of five years does not protect appellees from liability for injury done appellants, as their road was not constructed under proper municipal authority.

2. Measure of damages—The damage for which appellants are entitled to recover is for constructing and maintaining two instead of one track. Whatever damages appellants sustained by reason of the construction and operation of two tracks, which they would not have sustained by the construction and prudent operation of one track, is the amount of damages appellants are entitled to recover.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The former opinion of this court, delivered herein by Judge Hobson, is as follows: "Frank A. Klosterman died on February 10, 1892, the owner of certain real estate in Covington, Ky.; appellants are his widow and children, six of the latter being infants; they filed this suit December 5, 1895, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., the Covington & Cincinnati Elevated Railroad and Transfer and Bridge Co. and the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. to recover damages in the sum of $7,000 for alleged injuries to the real estate received by them from the decedent, the widow being executrix of his will and guardian of his children, and as such joined also in the suit. Issue was joined upon the petition, and on final hearing the court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the appellees.

"Appellant's property is situated at the corner of Lewis and Craig streets; it has on it two brick houses, one is a three-story brick building situated on the corner and fronting on both streets, the first story is used as a storeroom for mercantile purposes, the second and third as a residence; the other is a two-story dwelling fronting on Craig street; there is a small area or yard between the two houses. The railroad tracks complained of run diagonally across Craig and Lewis streets at their intersection; the nearest rail is six and one-half feet from the gutter curb; inside of the gutter curb is a sidewalk six feet wide; both the buildings extend out to the sidewalk so that at the corner the three-story brick house is only about fourteen feet from the nearest rail of the railroad track or about eleven and one-half feet from the side of the cars when passing. Craig and Lewis streets are each thirty feet wide, including the sidewalk on either side. The railroad at this point is a double track and is used almost constantly day and night. Before the railroad was built the property rented for $42 a month, now it brings scarcely enough to pay taxes and insurance. The trains operated are many of them heavy freights, which jar and shake the houses to such an extent as to alarm the occupants and wake them at night. A large quantity of cinders and smoke is thrown into and upon the property, sometimes filling the front rooms with smoke and to such an extent that it is impracticable to keep the front windows open at all. Large quantities of cinders fall upon the roof and yard, burning the paint off the roof, causing it to rot and unfitting the yard for such uses as the yard of a residence is designed for. The wall of the two-story building is settled, the noise, vibration and discomfort from smoke and cinders is such that only an undesirable class of tenants will rent the property for a residence, and the storeroom is not desirable for a business place.

"The tracks take up substantially the intersection of the streets with the exception of six feet on each side, so as in a great degree to interfere with the ingress or egress of wagons and teams, from the fact that trains are passing so often day and night. There is no doubt under the evidence that the property is desirably located, and was valuable before the construction of the railroad, and that by reason of its construction has been largely unfitted for the purposes for which it was intended, and greatly depreciated in value. The railroad was constructed precisely as it is now in the year 1889, and the action not having been filed within five years thereafter, the appellees interpose the plea of limitation, and it was on this ground that the court below gave the jury peremptory instruction to find for appellees.

"In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ky., 109, this court held that a railroad must be regarded as a permanent structure, and when its construction in the streets of a city is authorized by legislative and municipal authority, all damages naturally resulting from the proper operation of the road can then be ascertained and determined, and the cause of action therefor is barred by limitation after five years from the time the action might first have been instituted. This case has been followed in so many subsequent causes that the question is not now an open one, but we are not inclined to extend the rule beyond the limits thus laid down or to apply it to a case where the construction of the railroad in the street is not authorized by legislative and municipal authority.

"As has been held by this court in several cases and is recognized in section 243 of our present Constitution, the injury to property in cases of this character is substantially a taking of private property for public use, and where this taking has not been done under proper authority of law it should stand as to limitation on the same plane as any other taking of real estate. The structure being permanent, the action is not for a trespass upon the property in which damages within the preceding five years may be recovered, but the question to be determined is: What will be a fair compensation to the owner of the property for the depreciation of the value of his property by the servitude that is thus placed upon it? When the construction of the railroad is authorized by law, all persons must take notice of this, and there are sound reasons of public policy for not extending the bar of limitation to those cases where the construction is not by authority of law, and the citizen can not well understand his rights. It remains, therefore, to determine whether the tracks in question were constructed under proper legislative and municipal authority. On August 27, 1851, the council of the city of Covington granted to the Covington & Lexington railroad permission to lay its road in Washington street. The Covington & Lexington railroad was afterwards succeeded by the Kentucky Central railroad, and on October 23, 1885 "

The city council granted to it, its successors or assigns, permission to extend its track from its terminus to a point on or near the Ohio river, and 'the right of way for a single track over such streets and alleys' as might be best for said company to use. This grant was in terms limited to 'the right of way for a single track.' On December 17, 1887, the Kentucky Central railroad sold and assigned to the Covington & Cincinnati Elevated Railroad and Transfer and Bridge Co. all of its rights, privileges and franchises under and by virtue of these ordinances, and it is insisted that it was justified in constructing the double track in controversy under this authority. But the original ordinance made in 1851 granted a right of way only on Washington street, and the ordinance of October 22, 1885, in express words granted only a right of way for a single track. Where the authority is expressly limited to a single track it can not by construction be enlarged, for this would be to violate the plain terms of the instrument. Unless, therefore, there was some other authority for building this double track, the case does not fall within the rule laid down in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, above referred to.

Appellees also rely on certain provisions of the charter of the bridge company and certain actions of the municipal authorities of Covington. These will now be considered: The bridge company was incorporated by an act approved April 4, 1884, under the name of the Covington & Cincinnati Pier Bridge Co. By an act approved February 9, 1886, the name of the corporation was changed to the Covington & Cincinnati Elevated Railroad and Transfer and Bridge Co. This act also contains the following provision (1 Acts, 1885-1886, 340): 'Said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to construct, maintain and operate railroad tracks, with necessary turnouts and sidings upon the said bridge and the approach thereto.' (Section 3.)

" 'The said corporation shall also have power to construct a railway track, with necessary turnouts and sidings upon, over, along or across any public streets, roads, alleys, avenues, or through or over any blocks or ground between such streets, for the purpose of making connection with the depots or railway tracks of any railroad in the city of Covington within such territorial limits as the city council of said city shall prescribe.' (Section 4.)

" 'The said company shall construct and maintain tracks connecting its bridge with the Kentucky Central railroad in such manner as to enable other railroads to connect their lines of railway with said tracks approaching said bridge. Connections made by any other railroad with such connecting tracks shall be so made as to admit other roads to connect therewith, and any railroad now existing, or to be hereafter constructed, within the city of Covington shall have the right to connect its railway with said connecting tracks, and shall have the right to use the same for the purpose of and to cross said bridge with its locomotives and cars upon the payment of toll and upon the terms in this act expressed.' (Section 8.)

" 'The said company shall not have the power to acquire more than one right of way from any depot in Covington to its bridge, and shall obtain no permit or privilege from the city council of Covington for such right of way without first having given at least one week's notice of its intention to make application therefor, which notice shall be in writing and be served on the city clerk of said city, and said corporation shall also cause said notice to be published in some newspaper circulating in Covington at least seven days before the making of such application.' (Section 10.)

"The corporation was also authorized by section 6 of the charter to acquire, either by purchase or assignment, such right of way as any other company then possessed or held over or across any streets or blocks of ground in Covington. The only purchase it made was from the Kentucky Central railroad as above stated, and as this was only a right of way for a single track, authority to construct and maintain the double tracks in question must depend upon a compliance on its part with the provisions above quoted from its charter. It was only authorized by the charter to construct its track within such territorial limits as the city council of the city should prescribe. (Section 4.) It had no power to acquire more than one right of way from any depot to its bridge, and could obtain no permit or privilege from the council without first giving a week's notice, by service on the clerk and publication in a newspaper circulating in the city. (Section 10.)

"The record shows that at a meeting of the council, on April 22, 1886, the bridge company presented a paper, informing the council that it had located the approaches to its bridge from a certain square, running thence northwardly to the Ohio river, and requesting the council to approve the selection, the paper stating that due notice of the application had been given to the city clerk, and by publication as required by law. The council thereupon referred the matter to its committee on railroads and bridges, to report by ordinance or otherwise, when the company presented more specific location of their route. This, so far as the record shows, was never done, and no action was ever taken by the council on the application. The record also shows that at the same meeting of the council, on April 22, 1886, the Kentucky Central railroad reported to the council its location of its right of way, under the ordinance of October 22 1885, along the route now occupied by the tracks in controversy. The record further shows a prolonged struggle between the city authorities and the railroad companies about their rights of way, and on July 29, 1886, a majority and minority report were presented in regard to the granting of the right of way to the bridge company, but no action appears to have been taken on either report.

"After this the Kentucky Central deeded to the bridge company its right of way, and it is hard to escape the conclusion that the bridge company, to avoid the terms sought to be imposed upon it by the city, or for some other reason, ceased to prosecute its application to the council, and undertook to get along under its purchase from the Kentucky Central. At least the presumption must be, as it was only authorized to acquire one right of way, and it did not follow up its application to the council; that this application was abandoned. The purpose of requiring notice to be given of the application was that those interested might resist it before the council, and when this resistance was made with such effect that no action was taken on the application, the only reasonable conclusion is that the corporation made some other arrangement.

"It is also shown in the record that on December 22, 1886, an ordinance was passed allowing the Covington Short Route and Transfer Co. to build a line from Licking river to the Kentucky Central track, and that in the year 1889 several ordinances were passed requiring the erection of safety gates and the keeping of flagmen at different points along the tracks in controversy. It is contended for appellants that the council in doing this only protected the people of the city, and that such ordinances were not grants of right of way, but only police regulation to prevent the trains from running over people. However this may be, we do not think a grant by implication or acquiescence could be properly made by the city council under section 10 of the charter above quoted, for it contemplates that the persons interested shall have notice of the application and an opportunity to resist it. To allow a grant to arise from the acquiescence of the council, without notice to those interested as provided by the statute, would be to defeat its entire purpose. We are, therefore, of opinion that the construction and operation of the double tracks in front of appellants' property was not under regular legislative and municipal authority. While there was authority to construct and operate a single track, a double track, running necessarily so close to the property, was a much more grievous burden, and we do not think the statute of limitation should bar any part of the injury done, for the reason that it is an entirety and not separable. It would mean that after five years the city authorities and the person interested, having acquiesced in the construction of the railroad, can not enjoin its operation or require its removal.

"Appellees, after the expenditures made by them, must be allowed to maintain and operate their road, but if in so doing they take the property of appellants, they must make them a fair compensation for the injury done. The road can not now be treated as an illegal structure or its operation as a nuisance. All we hold is that limitation of five years does not protect appellees from liability for injury done appellants, as their road was not constructed under proper municipal authority."

The opinion so well states the facts in the case, the various legislative enactments, the proceedings of the common council of the city of Covington and the conclusion as to the application of the doctrine of the Orr case, it is incorporated in this opinion. The court recedes only from that part of the opinion where it is said: "We do not think the statute of limitation should bar any part of the injury done, for the reason that it is an entirety and not separable."

Under the doctrine of the Orr case the five-year statute of limitation would have barred the appellants' cause of action had the appellees constructed only a single track because it was done under legislative and municipal authority. The appellees did not have municipal authority to construct the additional track; the mere fact that it was constructed at the same time that the authorized one was could not make it a lawfully-constructed track.

It was as much an additional servitude upon the street and injury to the property of appellants as it would have been had it been constructed anterior or subsequent to the construction of the authorized track. The effect upon the rights of the appellants was just the same whether the authorized track was constructed prior to, at the same time or subsequent to the construction of the authorized one. The time of the construction could not affect in any way the application of the statute of limitation to the rights of appellants. When the authorized track was constructed under the Orr case the five-year statute of limitation began to run; when the unauthorized one was constructed and damaged the property of the appellants, it was an unlawful taking of their property and the fifteen-year statute of limitation applied.

As the appellees had the right to maintain one track under legislative and municipal authority, did it forfeit the right to have the five-year statute of limitation apply to appellant's cause of action for injury and damages resulting from its prudent operation? Upon reconsideration we have concluded that it has not lost it. Its unauthorized act could not change the application of the law of limitation to a cause of action existing independent of such act. It could no more do so than the doing of the lawful act could change the application of another statute of limitation to the cause of action growing out of the unauthorized act. The construction of two tracks created an additional servitude upon the narrow street, and the operation of trains over both of them necessarily added to the damages to appellants' property. While the construction and operation of the two tracks makes it more difficult to determine the damage resulting to the appellants than it would if only one had been constructed and operated, still that difficulty which has been created by appellees should not be interposed as a barrier to appellants' right to have redress for their wrongs.

The damage for which they are entitled to recover from appellees is for constructing and maintaining two, instead of one, track. Whatever damages the appellants sustained by reason of the construction and operation of two tracks, which they would not have sustained by the construction and prudent operation of one track, is the amount of damages appellants are entitled to recover. This we believe to be the correct rule for the measurement of the damages they have sustained, and for which their right to recover is not barred by the statute of limitation.

KIESEWETTER v. KRESS, &c.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Mortgages—Bills and notes—In an action on a note for $1,000, secured by mortgage on a tract of land, the defense of no consideration was interposed. The burden of proof being upon defendant, the notes will not be cancelled upon a bare suspicion of fraud when the evidence fully shows that a sufficient consideration supports same.

2. Husband and wife—Homestead—Wills—Where the husband and wife united in the execution of a mortgage and afterwards the husband died, leaving a will, by which he devised his estate to his wife for life, subject to the payment of his debts and the remainder to his two children, the widow will be considered as having relinquished her dower right only and having failed to renounce the provisions of the will, is not entitled to claim homestead in her own right, but her failure to renounce the provisions of the will could not affect the rights of the unmarried infant children to a homestead. The testator may dispose of his homestead by will without prejudice to his creditors, but not to affect the rights of his unmarried infant children.

3. Decedent's estate—Interest—Failure of a creditor of a decedent's estate to demand payment of the personal representative within one year, as required by section 3884, Kentucky Statutes, is not entitled to any interest until after judgment.

Byrne & Reed for appellant.

R. C. Simmons and H. C. Thelassen for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Michael Kress, on October 9, 1884, executed to appellant, his step daughter, the following note: "Two years after my death I bind my estate and personal representatives to pay to Catherine Kiewewetter, or order, $1,000, for value received. This note secured by mortgage on real estate in Kenton county, Ky., and this note not to bear interest until my death, and thereafter at the rate of 6 per cent. until paid."

To secure the note above mentioned the maker, Michael Kress, and his wife, Amelia Kress (appellee herein), executed and delivered to appellant a mortgage, conveying to her a tract of 12 97-100 acres of land in Kenton county. Amelia Kress was the second wife of Michael. Michael Kress died August 17, 1893, and his executrix qualified under his will probated August 26, 1893. The widow continued to live with her two infant children upon this land for nearly two years, when she married Cornelius and removed with her children to her husband's home. This suit was filed October 2, 1897, seeking the enforcement of the lien and the satisfaction of the note above named. The defenses were:

1st. That appellant had not demanded payment of the note verified by affidavit of the claimant as required by law, within one year after the death of the testator, or within one year after the maturity of the note.

2d. That the property mentioned was the homestead of the testator, and that he devised it as such to his widow and infant children.

3d. That the note sued on by appellant was without consideration.

To the first defense it was replied that there was no personal estate out of which the appellant's debt could have been paid, and that it was useless to have made the demand. The necessary purging affidavit was tendered with the amended petition. As to the second and third defenses it was replied that appellant had been the owner of the land before the execution of the mortgage, and that the mortgage really represented its purchase money, and, therefore, there could be no claim to homestead in the land as against it, and that of course was also a sufficient consideration. The rejoinder denied that appellant had ever been the owner of the land, but stated that Michael Kress, being involved in liability to appellee Amelia, who was not then his wife, and for the purpose of defeating her claim, fraudulently transferred the title to the property to appellant in 1879, but in trust, and that appellant took the title in trust, agreeing to reconvey it upon demand, and that the reconveyance was in satisfaction of this agreement. This was all traversed, except it was admitted that Michael Kress had conveyed the property to appellant in 1879, and that she continued to hold the title until it was reconveyed to him in 1884.

The proof in the record shows (and the certificate of the clerk to the transcript is that the record is complete) that appellant loaned to Michael Kress $1,000 about 1879, with which to finish paying for the land in question.

and that he conveyed the title to appellant to secure her in this loan. The evidence on this question is by appellant and by three other witnesses, who testified that Michael Kress in effect so admitted to them. So far as appellant's testimony is concerned as to the transactions of the decedent, it was incompetent, and although there appear to have been no exceptions filed to the depositions, and at least none acted upon by the trial court, we will not consider her evidence in determining this question. Upon a plea of no consideration the burden is upon the defense. The writing under our statute purports a prima facie consideration. In addition to this is the testimony of the witnesses above named as to the admissions made by the decedent in his lifetime. There is absolutely no evidence in the record to the contrary. At the utmost the circumstances attending the transactions are such as to create a suspicion of appellant's claim. These circumstances are: Michael Kress is shown to have been a small farmer, a laborer in a mill, of limited means, hard working and economical. Appellant claims to have had, and to have earned by her labor, the $1,000 in question. There is no other evidence than hers as to her financial circumstances. Michael Kress, during the lifetime of his first wife, took appellee, Amelia Frederick, from an orphan home when she was aged fourteen and put her to work as a menial. She continued to live in his family until after the death of his wife, which occurred when Amelia was about eighteen. It may be gathered from the record that Michael seduced Amelia, and after the birth of the child forced her to leave his home. A short while before this, a few months, he made the deed to appellant. Directly after the birth of this child, Amelia began a prosecution against Michael Kress under the bastardy statute. This was settled before trial by the marriage of Michael and Amelia. Some time after this marriage Michael Kress procured appellant to reconvey the property to him upon the condition that he execute to her the note and the mortgage sued upon, which was done.

Although some of the circumstances are enough to well arouse one's suspicions that the transaction by which the land was conveyed by Kress to appellant was merely a device by Michael Kress to defeat Amelia's demand against him, yet there is no positive evidence to this effect, nor is there any contradicting the testimony offered for appellant as to the transaction of loaning the money. It will not do to decide a case contrary to all the testimony, merely because some circumstances tend to arouse a suspicion as to the truthfulness of the evidence. A well-founded suspicion will cause a close and critical scrutiny of the evidence tending to establish the fact in doubt; but when such scrutiny is had, and still the mind can lay hold of nothing in the record sufficient to overcome the evidence, the suspicion must yield to the testimony. In fact every word of appellant's evidence may be true, and yet the circumstances named exist as shown. We conclude that the court erred in denying appellant judgment upon her note. The mortgage sued on, given to secure the note, purports to be between Michael Kress, of Kenton county, Kentucky, of the first part, and Catherine Kiese-wetter, of Cincinnati, O., of the second part. It recites the indebtedness of Kress to Kiese-wetter, and gives a lien upon the real estate to secure its payment when due.

The concluding paragraph is as follows: "In witness whereof the said Michael Kress and Amelia Kress, his wife, who hereby releases and relinquishes all right of dower in the within premises, hereunto set their hands this 9th day of October in the year 1884." Michael Kress and his wife, Amelia Kress, signed and acknowledged the instrument.

We are of opinion that Amelia Kress relinquished dower only in this land, and is not precluded by the mortgage from now claiming her homestead exemption. We hold, under the evidence, that the conveyance to appellant in 1879 was in effect and intent a mortgage only, and, therefore, appellant can not claim to have been the vendor of Kress in the reconveyance of the land, nor can she claim that her debt is older than Kress' title. It is not. Kress acquired title long before appellant claims to have loaned him the money. Decedent, Michael Kress, had the right to convey his homestead by deed or will. (Myers' Gd'n v. Myers' Adm'r, 89 Ky., 442; Pendergest v. Heekin, 94 Ky., 381; Schnabel v. Schnabel's Ex'tx. 22 Ky. Law Rep., 234.) He did convey it by will as follows (omitting parts unimportant to this decision):

"1st. I desire all my just debts and funeral expenses to be paid as soon as possible after my decease.

"2d. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Amelia Kress, all my real estate and all personal property that I may have, for her natural life, and at her death to be the property of her two children, John Kress and Julius Kress, to be share and share alike of everything that she may have.

"3d. I hereby nominate and appoint my wife, Amelia Kress, to be executrix of this my last will, and ask that no bond be required of her, and that no appraisement be made of my estate, and that my wife be the guardian of my infant children."

The widow not having renounced the will, as she was by statute permitted to do, is held to have accepted under its provisions, and as the will under which she holds first requires the payment of her testator's debts she holds his property subject to such payment. The will creates a trust against the property, and it will be charged with the payment of the debts of the testator. (Watson v. Christian, 12 Bush, 525; Taylor v. Loller's Ex'or, 8 Ky. Law Rep., 773.) It must follow that the right of the widow to the property of the testator is subordinate to the right of his creditors and the payment of their debts. But as to the children of the testator the cause is not so free from difficulty. In Myers v. Myers, 89 Ky., 442, the testator had devised a lot to his wife for life, and the remainder to his daughter. In a contest between the daughter, who was an infant, and the creditors of the testator, it is held that although the widow had not renounced the provisions of the will, "the failure of the widow to exercise an election not to take under a will of such owner can not prejudice his infant children." The infant devisee was adjudged to be entitled to the lot, which was worth less than a thousand dollars, to the exclusion of the creditors. In the later case of Hazelett v. Farthing, 94 Ky., 421, the testator devised all of his property to his widow, children and another, omitting one of his children. It does not clearly appear from the opinion whether the court intended to decide, or that the court did decide, that the widow's failure to renounce the provisions of the will was binding upon the infant children of the testator as an election to take under the will instead of under the statute, giving the right of occupancy of the homestead to the unmarried infant children in conjunction with the widow. The court quotes approvingly from an unreported case found in 5 Ky. Law Rep., 580; Elmore v. Elmore's Adm'r, where it was held that the widow having accepted the provisions of the will, she had no right of homestead, and if she had none the children in such state of case had none. But in the case of Hazelett v. Farthing the court held that the question of homestead did not arise, but that the disinherited child was entitled to a portion of the property in question solely by virtue of having inherited an interest from one of her brothers named in the will and who had since died. We can not regard Hazelett v. Farthing as authority upon the point now under discussion. In Schnabel v. Schnabel's Ex'or, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 234, the testator having only a homestead, that is, land occupied by him and his family, worth not exceeding $1,000, made the following will:

"1st. I desire all of my just debts and funeral expenses paid.

"2d. I will and bequeath to my beloved wife, Francis Schnabel, all of my property, real, personal and mixed, to do with as she pleases."

The widow did not renounce the provisions of the will, but qualified as executrix. The testator left three unmarried infant children. The question was as to the liability of this land to the payment of the testator's debts. The court took into consideration all of the cases heretofore before this court, and came to the conclusion in the majority opinion that the widow's interest was subject to sale for the debts of the testator, but that the infants' interests were not. It was there said: "Being infants, they could not renounce the provisions of the will, and are not estopped by their failure to do so. Their mother's acceptance of the will's provisions operated to give her a fee simple, but subject to the children's right of joint occupancy with her under the statute until they should become of age. Under the terms of this will the widow's interest was subject to the payment of her husband's debts, but that can not affect the children's right to the joint enjoyment of the entire homestead for the entire period allowed by the statute."

The case last cited and Myers v. Myers, supra, seem to embody the governing principles applicable to the one at bar. In the Myers case it was held that where the testator had devised his homestead to his widow for life, and the remainder to his infant child, the failure of the widow to renounce the provisions of the will did not affect the rights of the infant child. The court did not rest the right of the child in that case upon the provisions of the will. In the Schnabel case, where the testator devised his homestead to his widow absolutely, but subject to the payment of his debts, it was held that the failure of the widow to renounce the provisions of the will, thereby electing to take under it, could not affect the rights of the infants. The substance of these decisions and others cited is that the testator may dispose of his homestead by will without prejudice to his creditors, but not to affect the rights of his unmarried infant children. But if he devises it to his widow, or to his widow and infant children subject to his debts, the widow, by electing to take under the will, will take her interest subject to the debts of the testator, because she had power and right to elect whether she would take the property subject to that burden or whether she would hold under the statute. On the other hand the infant children, having had conferred upon them by statute the right to a joint occupancy with the widow of their deceased parent's homestead during their unmarried minority, and having no power of election whether they will claim under the statute or the will of the ancestor, can not be concluded by the act of the widow, but their right fixed by statute is not affected either by the widow's act or the testator's. The appellant did not present her claim, verified as required by statute, and demand of the executrix its payment until more than one year after the executrix's qualification. The personal representative relies on this section of the Kentucky Statutes:

"Section 3334. No interest accruing after his death shall be allowed or paid on any claim against the decedent's estate unless the claim be verified and authenticated as required by law and demanded of the executor, administrator or curator within one year after his appointment."

Appellant having failed to comply with the terms of the statute, there is no escape from its penalty. She can not recover any interest accruing after the death of the testator and before judgment. From this it follows that the judgment of the circuit court dismissing appellant's petition must be reversed, and is remanded with directions to enter a judgment in favor of appellant for the amount of her note, with interest from the date of the judgment, and that the title and right of appellee, Amelia Kress, be sold in satisfaction thereof, and that the property be sold subject to the right of the infants, John and Julius Kress, to keep said premises as a homestead during their unmarried minority, and for such other necessary proceedings as may not be inconsistent herewith.

Opinion delivered herein June 3, 1902 (24 Ky. Law Rep., 403), is withdrawn.

Railroads—Damages—Compromise—Estoppel—Appellant instituted this action to recover damages for injuries received by him from gross negligence of appellee while engaged in switching cars, but alleged that he did not claim, for loss of time for a definite period after the injuries, nor for a drug bill, amounting in all to $210.25, which had been paid him by appellee, but that he claimed damages for mental and physical suffering undergone as the result of said injuries. Appellee filed a receipt for said sum, which purported to be in full settlement of all claims for damages resulting from said injuries, and pleaded said settlement in bar of this action. Appellant, in his reply, alleged that the amount paid him was intended and agreed to be only for loss of time and his drug bill, and that he could not read, but it was read to him as a settlement only for said claims, and that he signed same through fraud and misrepresentation of appellee. The lower court sustained a demurrer to the reply. Held—That as the allegations of the petition for the purposes of the demurrer must be taken as true, appellant has stated a cause of action for which he may recover if the proof sustains his allegations, as he does not make any claim for loss of time or the drug bill, but admits payment for these items. The rule which requires the repayment or tender of the amount received on a compromise does not apply as the claim presented is for different items of damage from those alleged by appellant. On the trial the jury should be told that if they believe from the evidence that the $210.25 was paid in settlement of all of plaintiff's demands against the defendant, that they must find for the defendant in this action, although they might believe that the receipt was obtained by misrepresentation or fraud.

Chas. Carroll and Carroll & Carroll for appellant.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Guffy.

The appellant instituted this action against the appellee seeking to recover judgment for injuries received by him while in the employ of the defendant, caused by the gross negligence, as he alleges, of the defendant. A description of the injuries received and of the negligence of defendant are sufficiently stated. He prayed judgment for $10,000. In addition to other averments in the petition we find the following: "Plaintiff says that for his loss of time between the date of his injury, to wit, the 2d day of June, 1900, and the — day of October, 1900, he was paid by said defendant the sum of $200, and defendant paid him the sum of $10 upon his drug bill, and he says for his loss of time between the 2d day of June, 1900, and the — day of October, 1900, he claims in this action nothing from said defendant. He says for a period of about eighteen weeks, beginning about the — day of October, and up to the — day of March, 1901, he worked for said defendant as a switchman and coupler of cars, but after the 14th day of March, 1901, his condition was such by reason of the injuries he had received as hereinbefore stated that he was compelled to quit work for said defendant, and since that time, by reason of said injury, he has been wholly unable to work, and is permanently incapacitated from labor."

The answer may be taken as a complete traverse of any negligence upon the part of defendant as well as the injuries of plaintiff. It also pleads contributory negligence. In the second paragraph of the answer it is stated in substance that defendant believes that plaintiff did receive some slight injuries while working for it on the 2d day of June, 1900, but that the same were received in consequence of the negligence of the plaintiff, and on the 14th day of October, 1900, the plaintiff made claim against the defendant for damages on account of said injuries, and thereupon, in order to compromise, settle and adjust the matter, defendant paid to McGill the sum of $210.25 in full compromise and settlement of all claims and demands of every character whatsoever which he had against defendant, its officers, agents and employees, on account of the injuries received or sustained by him in person or property on or about June 2, 1900, and that plaintiff for said sum executed and delivered to it in a full acquittance, discharge and receipt on account of any loss or damage or injury he may have sustained to person or property on account of said injuries, and that the injuries for which it paid him the sum of $210.25 are the same, and none other, than the injuries set forth in his petition, and it files herewith, marked "Exhibit Voucher 7," a copy of the agreement and settlement and receipt signed by the plaintiff, acknowledging full satisfaction thereof on account of his alleged injuries, the original of which will, if demanded, be produced on the trial of this case, and defendant pleads the same as a complete bar to plaintiff's action herein. The material part of the receipt reads as follows: "1900, October 14, received of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., two hundred and ten dollars and twenty-five cents ($210.25) in full compromise settlement and adjustment of all claims and demands of every character whatsoever which I have against said company, its officers, agents and employes on account of injuries to my person and damage to and loss of property sustained by me on or about June 2, 1900, while employed by said company in Louisville, Ky., and on account of any other injuries sustained by or damage to me at any other time and place on every other account whatsoever. Witness my hand at Louisville this October 15, 1900. It is understood and agreed that the consideration herein expressed is the sole and the only consideration of this settlement."

The reply of plaintiff denies contributory negligence, and in response to the answer, so far as the receipt aforesaid is pleaded, the reply reads as follows: "Plaintiff denies that on the 14th day of October, 1900, he made claim against defendant for damages on account of said injuries, or that thereupon, or at any time, in order to compromise, settle or adjust the matter, defendant paid to him the sum of two hundred and ten dollars and twenty-five cents ($210.25) or any sum, in full or any compromise of all or any claims or demands of any character whatsoever, except as in the petition stated he had against defendant, its officers, agents or employes, on account of the injuries received by him in person or property on or about June 2, 1900, while in the employ of defendant, and plaintiff denies that for the sum of two hundred and ten dollars and twenty-five cents ($210.25), or any sum paid by defendant to him, he then or there, or at any time, executed or delivered, or intended to execute or deliver, to defendant a full acquittance, discharge or receipt on account of any loss or damage or injury he may have sustained to person or property on account of the injuries received by him on June 2, 1900, while in defendant's employ, except as in petition and as hereinafter stated, and he denies that the $210.25, or any part thereof, paid him by defendant was paid for the injuries set forth and alleged in petition, or for any part of them. Plaintiff denies the right of defendant to plead the alleged receipt, a copy of which is filed with the answer, as a complete bar to his action.

"2d. Plaintiff for further reply says that on or about October 14 1900, he did receive from defendant the sum of $210.25, but this sum was paid by defendant and received by him in payment of his loss of time up to that date, occasioned by said injury, and for part of his drug bill contracted in treating said injury as in petition stated. Plaintiff says in his petition he stated amount as $210, but supposes that is a mistake, and now says the amount was $210.25. Plaintiff says he received said sum only in payment of his loss of time and drug bill as aforesaid, and it was represented to him by the defendant that said sum was paid for that purpose, and plaintiff did not, in consideration of said $210.25, or any part of it, agree to release defendant of liability for any personal injury received by him, or for loss of time except as hereinbefore and in petition stated. Plaintiff says at or about the time mentioned in answer he did sign and deliver to defendant a receipt. He says at said time he was unable to read said receipt, and it was read to him, and represented to him by defendant to be a receipt acknowledging payment of $200.25 in payment of his loss of time up to that date, and for $10 of his drug bill, and so believing he signed it, and he did not then or at any time intend to sign any paper acknowledging payment in full of his claim against defendant growing out of said injury, or releasing it from all liability by reason of same, and he did not know of the existence of said paper until it was referred to in answer, and he says that if he signed said paper, or one of similar character, his signature was obtained to it in ignorance of its contents, and under the belief that he was signing a paper acknowledging a payment for his loss of time and drug bill, as heretofore stated, and said signature was obtained by the false and fraudulent representations of defendant that said paper was an acknowledgment of the receipt of $210.25 as payment for his loss of time up to the date of signing, and for part of his drug bill, and for no other purpose, and said paper should not be considered for any other purpose. Wherefore, plaintiff prays as in his petition."

The court sustained a demurrer to the reply of plaintiff, and plaintiff failing to plead further, the petition was dismissed, hence this appeal. It is earnestly contended for appellee that the cases of Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. McElroy, 100 Ky., —, and Home Benefit Society v. Muehl, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1378, conclusively settle that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed, while the reverse is the contention of appellant, and it is his contention that the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Harris, 158 U. S., 331, and some Massachusetts Supreme Court decisions sustained the contention of appellant. The Kentucky cases relied on determine or adjudge that a party who has signed an agreement in a compromise for personal injury can not disregard that settlement and sue on the original cause of action, and when the settlement is pleaded simply attempt to escape its binding effect by pleading fraud or misrepresentation in the procurement of the settlement or execution of the paper. In order to escape the effect of the executed agreement and be allowed to prosecute his original cause of action he must restore the money or property received from the defendant, or make a tender thereof. This is the doctrine clearly announced in the cases supra, and we rigidly adhere to that doctrine without regard to the decisions of other courts, and it may be conceded that they are not all in accord with the decisions of this court. But the question here presented is whether the case at bar comes within the rule of the McElroy case or the insurance case. Both in the McElroy and in the one referred to in 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1378, it was admitted by the plaintiffs in their reply that they had agreed to accept a certain sum of money in settlement of their entire claim. In other words, the injury claimed by McElroy was by him settled and receipted for, and in the other case it was admitted that the plaintiff had accepted a named sum of money in settlement of her insurance policy, but each of them sought to avoid the effect of the settlement and receipt upon the ground that the same was obtained by fraud, falsehood, or from them while not in a condition to know and understand their rights. This court held that they could not be allowed to do so. That in order to be allowed to prosecute their original cause of action they must restore to the opposite parties the money they had received or tender to them the same. This is a just rule. If the original cause of action is to be litigated the parties must be placed in the position they were before the alleged fraudulent transaction occurred. The case at bar presents a different state of facts from the two cases above referred to.

It is true that the paper filed by the defendant purports to be a compromise and full settlement of all claims growing out of the injury to plaintiff mentioned in the petition, as well as other claims he might have against the defendant or any of its agents, servants, etc. His reply admits signing the document, but it also alleges the fact to be that it was only read to him, and that such was the agreement that it only paid him for the loss of time which he suffered as the result of the injury complained of and the payment of part of the drug bill expended. He also avers he could not read the document, and that he signed it under those circumstances of only settling so much. He can not recover in this case for loss of time between the date of injury and the signing of the receipt for the loss of time or drugs brought without complying with the principles announced in the two cases heretofore referred to, namely, by restoring the money. But he is not seeking to recover anything for the loss of time nor for his drug bill.

The averments of the reply must upon demurrer be taken as true, hence it must be taken as true that he could not read the receipt, and that the transaction was as he stated it in his reply, and it can hardly be denied that if his statement is true that the settlement did not necessarily include the mental and physical suffering he had undergone as the result of the injuries complained of, nor would it necessarily and absolutely, if his statements were true, preclude a recovery for a permanent impairment of his ability to labor. If A held a demand against B for the price of a house and lot, and also for rent of same antedating the purchase, and if A in collecting the rent was induced by false representations of B to sign a receipt, which also included the purchase price of the house and lot, would it be said that A must restore the rent money before he could be allowed to prosecute his claim for the purchase money? We think not. Upon the return of this case the jury should be told, if it comes to a jury trial, that if they believe from the evidence that the $210.25 was paid in settlement of all of plaintiff's demands against the defendant, that they must find for the defendant in this action, although they might believe that the receipt was obtained by misrepresentation or fraud.

Judgment reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the reply and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COLEMAN, &c. v. O'LEARY'S EX'OR, &c.

1. Wills—Masses—This action involves the construction of particular clauses of testator's will. By clauses 4 and 13 the testator directed that designated sums should be paid for masses for the repose of the soul of the testator and his relatives, who are designated by the terms of the will. In the 4th clause the person to whom this devise is to be paid, and in the 13th clause the church where the masses are to be given are designated. Held—That the devises for masses is unobjectionable and will be enforced by the court. The 11th clause, which bequeaths to the Catholic bishop of Louisville $3,000, to be invested, and the income applied in rewards of merit to pupils in the parochial poor schools in Louisville, creates a trust. A definite trustee is selected; the class to be benefited is plainly expressed; the intention is unmistakable; the bequest can be readily carried out by the named trustee under the supervision of the court if necessary, and the object plainly declared is a charitable one within the meaning of the statute, being in aid of "schools of learning." The devise in the 12th clause of $8,000 to the bishop of Cork, to be applied to any charitable uses, and so as to do the most good, is too indefinite, and will not be enforced. Clause 22 of the will gives and bequeaths to the order of the Society of Jesus, known as the "Jesuit Order," one hundred acres of land. The Society of Jesus is no legally incorporated body, and there is no trustee created who can be made subject to the control of the court and compelled to execute the provisions of the trust. Held—That the court will not enforce this bequest by supplying a trustee, as the charity is not to an identified or ascertainable object, and is, therefore, invalid.

2. Construction of statutes—Statute of Elizabeth—Doctrine of cypres—Clause 20 of the will directs that the remainder of the estate, after payment of the specified legacies and bequests, be invested and placed in trust with the bishop of the Catholic diocese of Louisville, and three others to be chosen by him, for the establishment of a home for poor Catholic men as soon as the proceeds of the estate may justify it. The construction of this clause involves a construction of the General Statutes, page 242, which was in force at the death of the testator. This statute was a re-enactment of Revised Statutes, chapter 14, page 235. It also involves the question as to whether the statute of 43 Elizabeth was adopted in this State, recognizing to its full extent the doctrine of cypres, and if so to what extent has that doctrine been changed. Held—That the statute of Elizabeth was recognized in this State prior to the passage of the statute of 1852. The doctrine of cypres was limited by judicial construction prior to the statute of 1852. The aim of this statute for upholding charities is to make such as it enumerates available whenever so defined as to be judicially identified and applied. The court is satisfied that a construction can fairly be given to this clause of the will sufficiently definite to enable the trustee to carry out, and the court to control and enforce, the testator's charitable purpose. In order that the court may be able to exercise the powers given by this statute, directing the management of the trust and settling who shall be the beneficiaries thereof, the will must be construed as requiring the establishment of the home in Louisville because the trustee is the bishop of the diocese of Louisville; the trust is reposed in him in his official capacity, and he has no power beyond this diocese. On the same principle it would seem to follow that the beneficiaries must be selected from that diocese which includes the State of Kentucky.

J. W. S. Clements and D. W. Sanders for appellants.

P. B. & U. W. Muir and S. J. Boldrick for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge DuRelle.

This appeal is to determine the validity of six clauses of the last will and testament of ~~John D.~~ O'Leary, a respected citizen and resident of Jefferson county. The will was a holograph. Certain of its provisions were held by the county judge to have been cancelled and revoked. With the exception of the cancelled clauses it was admitted to probate. Appellant, Thomas F. Coleman, suing for himself and for the heirs-at-law of John D. O'Leary, as a class, filed his bill, praying that the will be adjudged void as a whole; that the devises contained in each of the six clauses mentioned be declared void; that the estate be adjudged to be undevised estate, which descends to the heirs-at-law, and for a settlement and distribution of the estate. As alternative relief the bill prayed, in the event any or all the trusts provided in the disputed clauses should be held valid, that the trustees be required to carry out the same.

An answer was filed, and a demurrer to the answer was carried back to the petition and sustained. The question before us, therefore, is as to the sufficiency of the petition attacking the validity of the contested clauses. These clauses are as follows:

"Clause 4. I give and bequeath to the Rt. Rev. James M. Hayes, S. J., Chicago, Ill., the sum of $3,000 for masses for the repose of the souls of my mother and my aunts, Ann and Ellen, and my own.

"Clause 11. I give and bequeath to the Rt. Rev. Roman Catholic Bishop (for the time being), of Louisville, the sum of $3,000, to be invested and the income of which to be applied in rewards of merit to pupils in the parochial poor schools in Louisville.

"Clause 12. I give and bequeath to the Rt. Rev. Roman Catholic Bishop (for the time being), of Cork, Ireland, the sum of $3,000, to be applied to any charitable uses, and so as to do most good in his judgment.

"Clause 13. I direct my executor to expend the sum of $1,000 for masses for the repose of my soul and those of my mother and aunts, to be said at the Cathedral, Louisville.

"Clause 20. All the remainder of my estate, after the payment of the specified legacies and bequests, I wish to be invested and placed in trust with the Rt. Rev. Bishop of the Catholic diocese of Louisville, and three others to be chosen by him, for the establishment of a home for poor Catholic men as soon as the proceeds of my estate may justify it.

"Clause 22. I give and bequeath to the Order of the Society of Jesus, known as the 'Jesuit Order,' one hundred acres of land, at or near my place 'Doneraile,' in Jefferson and Bullitt counties, for the purpose of education or religion, they to have the privilege of selection on any lands on the west side of the Louisville & Nashville railroad right of way."

The questions, therefore, to be determined by this court involve simply the validity of these clauses. These questions are to be determined not under the present statute, which as amended was approved May 12, 1893, and became a law October 10, 1893 (Kentucky Statutes, section 317, et seq.), but as the testator died on May 14, 1893, must be determined by the statute in force at that time (General Statutes, page 242), which is a re-enactment of Revised Statutes, chapter 14, page 235. (Crawford v. Thomas, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1100).

We shall first consider the clauses directing expenditures for masses for the repose of the souls of the testator and certain named relatives, being clauses 4 and 13 of the will. These clauses undoubtedly express, definite and distinctly, the intention of the testator. Indeed the very certainty of the beneficiaries under these clauses is made the ground of attack, for there is no suggestion in this court either that they are void because of being indefinite, or as being bequests for superstitious uses, but the ground urged is that, being gifts to named persons for the benefit of the souls of the testator and of designated persons, these devises are not charities at all, but private trusts, and, therefore, void as contravening the doctrine of perpetuities.

The trustee in the fourth clause, who is also one of the heirs-at-law of testator, has filed an answer, stating want of knowledge as to whether any of the devises in the will is void for uncertainty, or any other reason, but averring that if any of the devises shall be held void he is willing that the amounts received by him be credited on his interest in decedent's estate. The attack upon these mass clauses is based especially upon the case of Festorazzi v. St. Joseph's Church, 104 Ala., 327; citing also Holland v. Alcock, 16 N. E., 305 (N. Y.); Schwartz's Will, N. Y. S., 134; McEnry's Estate, N. Y. S., 207; McHugh v. McCole, 12 N. W., 631 (Wis). In the Festorazzi case, which is reported also in 25 L. R. A., 360, a devise exactly similar to those under consideration was held to be a trust, but not a charitable use; and, being a mere private trust, to be invalid for want of a living beneficiary. The New York cases upon this subject are in hopeless confusion. The Wisconsin case cited seems, in part at least, to be based on a local statute.

We shall not attempt to go into an extended discussion of the authorities upon this question. In England, although the Statute of Elizabeth in its enumeration of charities has no mention of churches except in regard to their repair, it has uniformly been held that gifts for the maintenance or promotion of public worship were valid as charitable uses, unless contrary to the established religion. Under the statute of 23 Henry VI, chapter 10, declaring void all "uses and intents to have orbits perpetually, or the continual services of a priest forever," etc., gifts for the saying of masses and prayers for the testator's soul or the souls of others were, until the repeal of that statute, held to be superstitious uses and void. (Perry on Trusts, sections 701-2.)

In this country no such doctrine as the English doctrine as to superstitious uses has ever prevailed. As judges we have nothing to do with creeds or their orthodoxy. In the courts all denominations stand upon the same footing, and are to be treated alike. As said by Mr. Perry (section 715): "In this country, where all religious denominations, doctrines and forms of worship are tolerated—or rather protected—so long as the public peace is not disturbed, there can be, in the law, no such thing as a superstitious use."

No such doctrine is invoked on behalf of appellants. The validity of the bequests is to be tested by the same principles that would be applied to a devise in aid of the religious observances of any other denomination. The mass, according to Webster's International Dictionary, is "the sacrifice in the sacrament of the Eucharist, or the consecration and oblation of the Host." It is, as we understand it, a public service—a public act of worship—by which, according to the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, the priest who celebrates it "helps the living and obtains rest for the dead." As said by the court in Hoeffler v. Clogon, 171 Ill., 462: "It is intended as a repetition of the sacrifice on the cross, and it is the chief and central act of worship

In the Roman Catholic Church. It is a public and external form of worship, a ceremonial which constitutes a visible action. It may be said for any special purpose, but from a liturgical point of view, every mass is practically the same. The Roman Catholic Church believes that Christians who leave this world without having sufficiently expiated their sins are obliged to suffer a temporary penalty in the other, and among the special purposes for which masses may be said is the remission of this penalty. A bequest for such special purpose merely adds a particular remembrance to the mass, and does not, in our opinion, change the character of the religious service and render it a mere private benefit. And while the testator may have a belief that it will benefit his soul or the souls of others doing penance for their sins, it is also a benefit to all others who may attend or participate in it. An act of public worship would certainly not be deprived of that character because it was also a special memorial of some person, or because special prayers should be included in the service for particular persons."

A gift, in other respects proper, for the establishment of a church would not, in our judgment, be avoided by a provision that the church should be called by the name of the testator, or that a tablet or a memorial window should be erected therein bearing his name. Nor do we see any reason why the application of the fund to the designated purpose may not be enforced by the courts upon the application of the heir. We are of opinion, therefore, that the fourth and thirteenth clauses of the will are not objectionable, and that the judgment of the chancellor as to them was correct. The cases upon this subject may be found collated in an excellent note to the case of Moran v. Moran, 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq., 55.

The next clause for consideration is clause 11, by which a trustee is selected and a trust created, the income whereof is to be applied in rewards of merit to poor pupils in the parochial schools of Louisville. A definite trustee is selected. The class to be benefited is plainly expressed; the intention is unmistakable; the bequest can be readily carried out by the named trustee, under the supervision of the court if necessary, and the object, plainly declared, is, in our judgment, a charitable one within the meaning of the statute, being in aid of "schools of learning." A similar bequest, providing for prizes for essays upon medical subjects, was sustained in Almey v. Jones, 17 R. I., 270. As to this clause the judgment of the chancellor is affirmed. The bequest in the 12th clause to the Bishop of Cork, to be applied to any charitable uses, and so as to do the most good, in his judgment, is practically identical in language with the bequest which was held invalid in the case of Spalding v. St. Joseph's Industrial School, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1107.

The point is made by counsel who was appointed attorney to defend for the Society of Jesus and the Bishop of Cork upon the entry of the warning order, that their case is not before this court because, although he filed demurrers for each defendant to the petition and the chancellor declared these devises good, the judgment of July 11, 1901, neither overrules nor sustains either one of these demurrers, but only carries back to the petition the demurrers of the plaintiff to the answers filed by Bishop McCloskey and his associates and James M. Hayes. But inasmuch as the judgment dismissed absolutely the petition of the plaintiff, and seems to intend that the petition is dismissed as to all the defendants, we have considered the case as if all the parties named as appellees were before the court, and we are of opinion that the chancellor's ruling as to this clause was erroneous.

We shall next consider the 22d clause, bequeathing to the Order of the Society of Jesus, known as the "Jesuit Order," 100 acres of land at or near the testator's place, "Doneraile," in Jefferson and Bullitt counties, for the purposes of education or religion, they to have the privilege of selection on any lands on the west side of the Louisville & Nashville railroad right of way. The Society of Jesus is a religious order founded by Ignatius Loyola. It is understood to be composed of missionary and teaching priests of the Roman Catholic faith. As we understand it, there is no legally incorporated body, but the priests are bound only by their vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, and, after a second novitiate, by a fourth vow requiring them to go wherever the Pope may send them for missionary duty. They are governed by a general, and the society has been established in the United States for many years, but this record does not disclose the headquarters of the society or the names of any of its officers. It would seem, therefore, that there is no trustee created by this bequest who can be made subject to the control of the court and compelled to execute the provisions of the trust. The lack of a trustee, however, would be immaterial under our statute, and the trust would not be permitted to fail because an "inadequate, illegal or inappropriate" mode of execution had been prescribed, provided the charity were to "an identified or ascertainable object" which could be judicially determined, and thereby effectuate the declared intention of the donor. Is there such an object in this case? Can the court, unable to bring the Society of Jesus before it, appoint a trustee and select for his execution a religious or educational object which will effectuate the intention of the donor, "and not arbitrarily and in the dark, presuming on his motives or wishes, declare an object for him?" We do not think so. Whatever educational or religious purpose the chancellor or his trustee or this court might select would be open to the objection that it was not the declared intention of the testator, and that it was possibly an object of which he would not have approved. To effectuate a charitable use in this State it is necessary that the courts should be able to control the trustee, and, if necessary, upon the application of the decedent's heirs at law, revise his action. Should we attempt to do so in this case we should not be acting judicially. As said by Judge Robertson, in Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 866, the court "does not act judicially when it applies his bounty to a specific object of charity, selected by itself merely because he had dedicated it to charity generally, or to a specified purpose which can not be effectuated, for the court can not know or decide that he would have seen willing that it should be applied to the object to which the judge, in the plenitude of his unregulated discretion and peculiar benevolence, has been fit to decree its appropriation, whereby he, and not the donor, in effect and at last, creates the charity." We are of opinion that the bequest in the clause under consideration is clearly within the rule laid down in the Spalding case and is invalid.

We come now to the consideration of the residuary clause, being clause 20: "All the remainder of my estate, after the payment of the specified legacies and bequests, I wish to be invested and placed in trust with the Rt. Rev. Bishop of the Catholic diocese of Louisville, and three others to be chosen, by him, for the establishment of a home for poor Catholic men, as soon as the proceeds of my estate may justify it."

This clause also is attacked upon the ground that it is too indefinite to be executed, and counsel upon both sides have argued it with great zeal and learning and not altogether without temper. There is no objection to the trustee selected, and we see no valid objection to the power granted him to select his colleagues. The sole question is whether the object for which this bequest is made is sufficiently definite to be enforced. Upon this question the argument has taken such a range as to render necessary a consideration of the history of the statute in force at the date of the testator's death: The statute of 43 Elizabeth (chapter 4) came to us by virtue of the ordinance of Virginia of 1776 (9 Hening's Statutes at Large, page 127, which is printed in 1 Morehead & Brown, page 612), providing: "That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James I, and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, * * * shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force until the same shall be altered by the legislative power of this colony."

That ordinance was, by the Constitution of 1792, as re-enacted in the Constitution of 1799 (article 6, section 8) adopted as the law of Kentucky by a provision that "all laws which, on the 1st day of June, 1792, were in force in the State of Virginia, and which are of a general nature, and not local to that State, and repugnant to this Constitution, nor to the laws which have been enacted by the legislature of this Commonwealth, shall be in force within this State until they shall be altered or repealed by the general assembly." (Hunt v. Warwick's Heirs, Hardin, 62.)

It is an interesting fact that in November, 1792, a few months after the adoption by Kentucky of this ordinance, it was repealed by Virginia, which accounts in some measure for the difference between the rulings upon charities in Virginia from those which prevail in Kentucky.

The question has been elaborately argued how far the Statute of Elizabeth (to be found in 1 Morehead & Brown, page 308) was adopted as the law of this State, appellee contending that only the preamble was thereby adopted, because the ten enacting clauses of the act are necessarily local to England, and were, therefore, never adopted by either Virginia or Kentucky. On behalf of appellant it is contended that while the mode of procedure prescribed by the statute by the appointment of commissioners under the great seal of England, or the seal of the county palatine of Lancaster, as the case might require, was local to England, and not adopted by either Virginia or Kentucky, yet a corrective process by the court of chancery itself, without the intervention of commissioners, was obtained in virtue of the statute and as an outgrowth of it by the English chancellor, and to the extent it was judicial was adopted by the constitutional adoption of the Virginia ordinance, and asserted and exercised by the Kentucky courts. An examination of the authorities convinces us of the correctness of appellant's contention. It is undoubtedly true that after the adoption of the statute in England the courts asserted and exercised wider powers in the correction of abuses of charitable trusts, and did so directly, and not through the intervention of the commissioners provided by the statute. And so it was natural that when the Kentucky courts came to consider the application of the statute thus adopted to Kentucky charities, they should adopt with it the outgrowth of power derived from the chancellor's personal exercise of the royal prerogative, to the extent that it had been exercised in England, because it had come to be there exercised in form at least judicially. And it was natural that the Kentucky courts should at first have regarded all the powers which had grown out of the concurrent exercise and subsequent confusion of the judicial and prerogative power as not local to England, and should have sought to localize them in this State. And so we find Judge Nicholas, in Glass v. Wilhite, 2 Dana, 177, asserting in the broadest terms not only that the statute was in force in Kentucky, but the existence of the English cypres doctrine to its fullest extent. Said Judge Nicholas: "Notwithstanding the attention of counsel had been invited to the question whether the statute 43 Elizabeth of charitable uses was in force here, it was not contended, on the argument, that it was not. Our own reflections have not led to any plausible suggestion why it should not be considered as in force. It has never been repealed, nor is there anything in it of so peculiar and local a character as to exclude it from adoption, under the rule embracing all English statutes of a general character, prior to 4th James I. It is treated as in force, and has been acted on in several of the other States.

The establishing of the fact that it is still in force relieves us from the necessity of investigating the very vexed question as to the true extent of chancery power and jurisdiction over charitable uses, independent of that statute. It also relieves us from an investigation of the question whether, according to the principles of the common law, there is here a defect or want of cestui que trusts, to take the use according to the apparent intent of the covenant of association, or whether the uses themselves are of too indefinite and uncertain a character to be enforced, independent of that statute, for, according to a construction of two hundred years, and which has been acted on in numberless cases under that statute, neither of those circumstances will invalidate the trust, provided it be a charitable use. Where the objects of the charity and the mode of its application are pointed out, but not with sufficient distinctness or certainty to be specifically and accurately enforced, the court will, under its cypres doctrine, give it effect as near the general intent as may be, and even where there is no specific mode or object pointed out, and in some cases where the object falls or ceases to exist, the court will, in respect of the general charitable purpose, devise a mode itself for giving it effect and employing the charitable funds, supply an original want of trustees, or, if necessary, displace old and create new ones."

Almost immediately thereafter, in Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 354, Chief Justice Robertson greatly limited the doctrine laid down in the Glass and Wilhite case, still asserting, however, the cypres doctrine as a judicial doctrine to a limited extent. In the Curling case, 8 Dana, 38, it was held that a devise for the "benefit of a public seminary" was "not, as at common law, void. The statute makes it valid according to the British doctrine. And if it can be judicially executed it is good according to the Kentucky doctrine also." And so Judge Robertson held that the testator intended his bounty for the seminary of his county, and that "even if the Trigg seminary could not claim the bounty as a matter of clear and exclusive right, nevertheless we are of the opinion that the application of the fund to that seminary would effectuate the declared purpose of the testator more certainly and appropriately than any application that could be made of it to any other seminary of learning."

The statute is clearly here recognized, not as merely giving a definition of charities, or a list by which gifts supposed to be charitable might be tested, but as giving to the courts and judiciary of Kentucky certain remedial and corrective powers which would not be possessed by them in the absence of the statute. So, in the much-criticised opinion of Judge Breck, in Attorney-General v. Wallace, 7 B. Mon., 612, an exceedingly loose devise was held to give the testator's "trustworthy friends," his trustees power, under the statute of Elizabeth, to select as beneficiaries of the will certain established benevolent and charitable institutions then in existence. The validity of the clause and the propriety of the proceeding by the attorney-general as well are sustained expressly under the statute of Elizabeth and the power of the court to enforce the trust by a scheme is asserted. In 1852 the statute now under consideration was adopted. It took the preamble of the former statute with some described changes, added to the list a few charitable objects, notably churches, which, as Mr. Perry says, had been "by analogy deemed within its spirit or intendment," and added also the words "or for any other charitable or humane purpose," which can hardly be construed to do more than include the charitable purposes which had already been deemed within the spirit and intendment of the old act, and provided that all grants, etc., for such purposes should be valid, except as thereafter restricted. It provided also: "No charity shall be defeated for the want of a trustee or other person in whom the title may vest, but courts of equity may uphold the same by appointing trustees, if there be none, or by taking control of the fund or property and directing its management and settling who is the beneficiary thereof."

Now if there is a difference between this statute and the former one, which was held by the Kentucky decisions to be in force here, what effect did it have and what was its purpose? Was it intended to or did it broaden the scope of the old statute as is contended by counsel for the Society of Jesus and the Bishop of Cork? We can not think so. That statute, even in Kentucky, and even after the great opinion of Judge Robertson in the Moore case, which undertook to confine the English cypres doctrine within the limits of strictly judicial powers, had received construction which could not have suggested to the legislative mind any necessity for broadening the scope of the act. If there was need of legislation it was in the other direction. Such trusts shall be valid says the statute. How valid? Then the statute proceeds to point out the modes in which they may be validated: First, a trustee may be supplied, if necessary, in whom the title may vest; or the court may take control of the fund or property. The court may direct the management of the property, and may settle who is the beneficiary. Is there anything in this, fairly construed, that indicates an intent to empower the courts to give definition to trusts which the grantors failed to define, to furnish an intent when none is expressed, to direct the management of a fund devoted to an unascertainable object, or to settle who is the beneficiary when the testator left no olew? That statute was intended not to enlarge, but to define the powers of the court.

As illustrative of this intent we find incorporated in the 3d section the mortmain statute of 1814, limiting the amount of landed estate which may be held by any church or society of Christians.

We do not for a moment suppose this enactment was intended as a hostile attack upon charitable uses, or as looking toward such a crusade against them as took place in the time of Henry VIII, but that it was intended to limit, to define and to set boundaries to the powers of the courts we have no manner of doubt from an examination of the statute itself, and this construction was given to it by perhaps the greatest of our judges in the only opinion of this court, in which the effect and object of the Kentucky statute appear to have been considered and adjudged. The same great judge had, in the Moore case, undertaken to limit the application of the cypres doctrine by the chancellor. The doctrine then announced had not been rigidly adhered to. In Attorney-General v. Wallace, 7 Dana, 190, and in the Curling case, 8 Dana, 38, the results of the opinions by Judge Breck and by Judge Robertson himself are not supported by the doctrine announced in the Moore case, though the intent of the testators was declared to exist in such form as to make that doctrine applicable. But in Cromie's Heirs v. Louisville Orphans' Home, 3 Bush, 373, the effect of the Kentucky statute was considered. Said the court through Judge Robertson: "While the statute of Elizabeth concerning charities was constructively abolished in Kentucky (Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 77), it was in American phase substantially re-enacted. (Ibid, page 235 ) And thus, though the ultra-judicial cypres doctrines which royal prerogative attached as excrecences to the statute of Elizabeth had, by its repeal, been cut off as tumors, the aim of our own statute for upholding charities is to make such as it enumerates available whenever so defined as to be judicially identified and applied."

The English statute was re-enacted, but "in American phase." Charities could still be created according to American doctrine. The outgrowth of the English statute was not to exist here, and the aim of our own statute was compactly and definitely expressed. It was a conservative enactment. It did not put charitable uses upon the same plane as private trusts. They were not void as against the statutes as to perpetuities. They were not to be defeated for want of a trustee. They were not required to be so definite as to be valid as private trusts. But the "American phase" of the statute of charitable uses did require a reasonable certainty, for it required the charitable objects to be so defined as to be judicially identified. The courts were no longer to exercise the prerogative of changing or making wills, and the judge refers approvingly to the repudiation of the cypres doctrine in New York, and to the strictly judicial application of charities in that State. He believed, and said so in the opinion, that the object of the repeal of the British statute "was to substitute a system more congenial with our institutions, and by a legislative endorsement of the doctrine suggested in Moore v. Moore, supra, to eliminate the cypres doctrine of England." We find nothing in the statute to indicate that it was intended as an enabling act, as the statute of Elizabeth was. It does not undertake to enlarge the power of the chancellor in any way. It gives no power to enforce an indefinite gift. It provides that a trust shall not fail for want of a trustee, but it does not empower the courts to create a cestui que trust. The court will, under the statute, settle who are the beneficiaries of a trust, if one is created, but it must settle them from the words of the gift; they must be judicially ascertained. It is not doubted that the individual beneficiaries of the bounty need not be named. That would render the gift a mere private use, and subject to the rule against perpetuities. And while the donee of a power may create or cause to spring a private use, limited in duration by the law against perpetuities, such is not the law as to charitable uses which are perpetuities. The donor must select his charity. He may delegate power to select the individual recipients of his bounty, but a gift to charity in general is too vague to be enforced. (Spalding v. St. Joseph's Industrial School, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1107.) A charitable use which is relieved from the operation of that rule must be so definitely expressed that the courts can judicially, and with reasonable certainty, apply the gift to that object.

We may notice here the very interesting argument of appellants' counsel as to the difference between the statute of Elizabeth and the Kentucky statute. In the older statute these words are used, "for relief of aged, impotent and poor people," while our statute reads "for the relief or benefit of aged, or impotent and poor people;" from which it is argued that while the older statute might have permitted a charity for the poor though not helpless, or for the aged, though not poor, our statute does not permit a charitable use for the benefit of the rich, though old or impotent, or for the poor, unless they were old or impotent. But we think the distinction sought to be made lies only in the language used, and does not exist in the meaning of the two statutes. In the old statute, as in the new, the poor and the aged, for whose relief charitable uses were permitted, were the poor and the aged who needed charity, and under neither statute would a charity for sturdy beggars or elderly millionaires be properly sustained. And so we think it is with such language when used in a gift to be applied under either statute. The "poor" will be construed to mean not the poor who are abundantly able to provide for themselves, but the poor who need assistance, and "aged" to mean such aged people as are properly objects of charity.

Nor do we think that the devise in question is objectionable as a sectarian charity or as a devise to provide for hospitality rather than charity. This court has never recognized it as an objection to a charitable use that its bounty was confined to members of one race or one religion. Nor, on the other hand, do we think that the word "poor as used in this devise can be properly construed as indicating a merely hospitable purpose. The purpose of this devise was, in our judgment, charitable. The sole question is whether it was definite enough to be enforced. Tested by this statute, is the bequest too vague and indefinite to be sustained? It is suggested for appellees that in order that the court may be able to exercise the powers given by section 2 of the act (Revised Statutes, page 236), directing the management of the trust and settling who shall be the beneficiaries thereof the will must be construed as requiring the establishment of the home in Louisville, because the trustee is the bishop of the diocese of Louisville, the trust is reposed in him in his official capacity, and he has no power beyond his diocase. On the same principle it would seem to follow that the beneficiaries must be selected from that diocese, which, as we understand, includes the State of Kentucky. If the devise can be sustained, it must be upon such a construction, and that is the interpretation we must give it in order to make it sustainable.

On the other hand, these objections are urged to the validity of the devise: First, that it does not name a charitable object under our statute which requires that the poor who may be beneficiaries of a charitable use must also be aged or impotent, an objection already considered; second, because no power is given to any one to select the object of the charity; third, because no place or district or country is named in which the home is to be established, and no place or district or class is reasonably defined from which the beneficiaries are to be selected; and, fourth, because no one is given power to make such selections. Assuming the object of the devise to be sufficiently definite, we have little difficulty with the second objection.

A trustee is named, the appointment of three associates is provided for, and the fund is devoted "for the establishment of a home for poor Catholic men as soon as the proceeds of my estate may justify it." And if the will furnishes a guide to the purpose of the testator, the trustee and his associates have authority to act in the selection of a site for the home, and in its establishment and management, under the control and direction of the chancellor. But it is objected that there is nothing in the will which places any limitation of time or place or circumstance upon the establishment of the home, or any limitation of district or boundary or class which will enable us to judicially ascertain or identify the objects of the testator's bounty. With considerable hesitation, and after much consideration, the court has reached the conclusion that a construction can fairly be given to this clause of the will sufficiently definite to enable the trustee to carry out, and the court to control and enforce, the testator's charitable purpose.

The trustee selected to receive the trust fund is not selected as a person, but as an official of the church. He is the Rt. Rev. Bishop of the Catholic diocese of Louisville. As such he has under his immediate dominion not only such matters as are strictly ecclesiastical, but to a great extent the charities of the church. Whether he still exercises the powers of a corporation sole this record does not disclose, but he undoubtedly exercises supervision over the recognized charities of the Roman Catholic Church in his diocese. And while there is a recognized distinction between a gift to create a charitable institution, without naming its scope or location or designating territory or otherwise, the class from which the beneficiaries are to be selected, such as appellants claim the gift in question is, and a gift for a purpose recognized as charitable under the statute to an established and organized institution, having defined and stated aims and purposes, which, by virtue of the selection of that institution, can be written in the terms of the gift, it may be that there is a just analogy between gifts of the latter class and a gift for a recognized charitable purpose to a church official in his official capacity, having jurisdiction as such over the charitable institutions of like character within a defined territory and managed under regulations and upon conditions which may be considered as adopted by the donor by the selection of such official, and thereby written into the terms of his gift. It may not be too great a stretch of the court's powers of interpretation to presume that the donor made the gift upon terms in harmony with the purposes of kindred organizations in that ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and for the benefit of such similar objects of charity as are provided for in that district.

. Giving this construction to the clause in question, that the home was intended to be established in Louisville, and that the beneficiaries were to be selected from Catholic poor men in that diocese, it follows that the trust is such as the chancellor can control and enforce, and, if necessary, settle who are the beneficiaries thereof. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the chancellor as to this clause was not erroneous. The paragraphs of the answer which plead knowledge on the part of the appellants of the administration under the will are good, to the extent that in so far as the appellants have knowingly permitted the executors and the trustees under the void clauses to proceed with the execution of the will as if valid, and to expend the fund for the benefit of the supposed objects of charity, no recovery can be had, nor, if investments have been made in execution of the supposed purposes of the void clauses, can recovery be had for the loss, if any, occasioned by such re-investment.

In the particulars indicated in the opinion the action of the chancellor in carrying back and sustaining the demurrer to the petition was erroneous. The demurrer should have been sustained in part as indicated herein. If appellants can show a refusal to recognize their visitorial right, or if any abuse of the trust or misapplication of the fund can be shown, the court can enforce such right. In this respect the petition seems to be defective, and on the return of the case leave may be given to amend.

For the reasons given, and to the extent indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment dismissing the petition, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

RICHMOND AND LANCASTER TURNPIKE ROAD CO. v. MADISON COUNTY FISCAL COURT.

Condemnation of turnpikes—Constitutional law—In this action to condemn a turnpike the circuit court, from the evidence, fixed $16,000 as the value of said pike, which is a dividend paying road, and is what it would cost to produce the turnpike road in the condition it was in when the county took possession of same. Held—That the basis of compensation assumed by the court was incorrect. Under section 242 of the Constitution, when private property is taken for public use the owner must be placed in as good a situation financially as he was before it was taken. In this case the proof showing that the stock had for many years sold at par, and paid a dividend of from 6 to 9 per cent., its market value was $20,000, and judgment should be rendered in favor of appellant for that amount.

J. A. Sullivan for appellant.

J. Tavis Cobb for appellee.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This was a proceeding to condemn the Richmond and Lancaster Turnpike Road, under the act of March 17, 1896 (Kentucky Statutes, section 4748b), and the only question in the case is, what is a fair and just compensation to the owners for the property? In the circuit court, by consent of parties, it was transferred to equity and heard by the court on both the law and facts as an equity action. The court fixed the value of the property at $16,000, and gave judgment for this amount, with interest from August 4, 1897, the date when the county took possession of the road, under an agreement that the value of the property and franchises should be determined by law, and that interest should be paid from this date on the amount finally fixed as the value of the property. It is insisted by appellee that under the rule established by this court, the evidence being conflicting, the chancellor's judgment can not be disturbed on the facts. There is great force in this contention if he proceeded upon the proper basis in determining the value of the property, but if he proceeded on the wrong basis, little weight can be attached to his finding, for the reason that if he had adopted the right basis he might have reached a very different conclusion. His judgment is in these words: "This cause came on and was heard by the court, and being sufficiently advised, is of the opinion that the basis of valuation of the property taken in this cause, as it was a dividend-paying road, is what it would cost to produce the turnpike road in the condition it was in on August 4 1897, and the court, therefore, adjudges that the Richmond and Lancaster Turnpike Road Co. recover of the Madison County Fiscal Court the sum of sixteen thousand dollars ($16,000), with interest thereon from August 4, 1897, until paid."

By section 242 of the Constitution it is provided: "Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed by them, which compensation shall be paid before such taking, or paid or secured at the election of such corporation or individual, before such injury or destruction."

Construing the constitutional provision on this subject in Henderson & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 56 Ky., 178, this court said: "The Constitution declares that no man's property shall be taken or applied to public use without just compensation being previously made to him. And according to the construction given to this provision in the cases of Sutton's Heirs v. City of Louisville, 5 Dana, 28, and Rice v. Danville, & Co., Turnpike Co., 7 Dana, 81, the compensation secured to the owner is the actual value in money of the property taken from him, which can not be diminished by any speculative advantage he may derive from its appropriation to the public use."

Again, on page 179, the court said: "The Constitution secures to the owner of the land just compensation for his property before he can be deprived of it. Its value to him, considering its relative position to his other lands and the other circumstances which may diminish or enhance their value, can alone afford him a just compensation for its loss.

In Robb v. Maysville, & Co., Turnpike Co., 60 Ky., 117, this decision was approved. In that case the owner offered to prove what the land sought to be condemned was worth to him. The trial court excluded the evidence and this was held error. The court said the owner was not authorized to fix a fanciful estimate of the value of the property and make that the criterion of his recovery, but that the inquiry was "what would be its value to him, situated as it is, if he were not the owner of it, but owned the adjacent property under the circumstances as they now exist?"

Again, in Asher v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 87 Ky., 391, the court said: "The owner must be placed in the same condition, in a pecuniary point of view, that he would be if the land was not condemned."

The precise point raised in this case was not involved in either of these cases, but the principle is the same. When private property is taken for public use the owner must be placed in as good a situation financially as he was before it was taken. Otherwise, to the extent that this is not done, his property has simply been confiscated for the use of the public. The question, therefore, is not what it would cost to produce the turnpike road in question in the condition it was in on August 4, 1897, but what was the real value of the property as it stood on that date.

The proof for the appellee showed that it had cost $20,000 to build the pike, but that it was not in as good condition as new, and that a pike like it could now be built for about $1,300 a mile. There were twelve miles of the pike, which, at $1,300 a mile, would amount to $15,600 and the court seems to have made this evidence the basis of his judgment. On the other hand, it was shown by the appellant that the road, after paying all expenses and appropriating a considerable sum annually for the keeping up of the property, had paid for a number of years dividends averaging 9 per centum annually. During this time the roadbed was improved from the fact that they used a superior quality of metal to what was used originally; there was no complaint at any time that the road was out of order; the company was never indited, and the pike was regarded as one of the best in the county. There were a number of other pikes that were feeders to it; the geographical condition of the surrounding country was such that a turnpike could not well be built; the road ran through one of the best sections of Madison county, where land was sold high; the travel on the pike was increasing with the population; the stock for a number of years had sold at par or more than that, and was in great demand. The charter of the company was granted before the act of 1856 reserving to the legislature the power to amend laws subsequently passed. The amount of the capital stock in the company was $20,000. There is some proof that the metal on the pike had worn and was not as thick as originally, still there is no doubt from the evidence that the company could have declared a dividend of 6 per centum annually out of its earnings, and with the remainder, in a few years, had the metal as thick as was desired, and we are by no means sure from the proof that the trouble with this pike was not due to the fact that when the county took charge the company had not made its usual annual repairs, a thing which, in the ordinary course of business, was done in the fall, and after the county took charge it received no attention for several years, and during that time was used very hard, as it was a free pike. But, however this may be, we are satisfied from the evidence that the property was intrinsically worth $20,000 on the 4th of August, 1897, for we know of no better way of determining the value of a thing than its actual market price, and this stock had concededly sold for par for a number of years, and was eagerly sought at that price. Beside its roadbed, the company had a right of way thirty feet wide, which was fenced in; it had an established trade; at Silver Creek, a point on the pike, there were two large distilleries; the principal part of the tobacco raised in Madison county was raised in that section, and the road had more travel upon it than any other two pikes in the county.

The statute under which the proceeding was had clearly contemplates that all these matters shall be taken into consideration, and that the actual value of the property shall be awarded to the owners. In section 13 it provides: "It shall be the duty of said commissioners to view the road to be taken, and require the owner or owners thereof to produce the books or other evidences, the receipts and expenditures on the road, or part of the road, to be sold, amount of net earnings for said turnpike road company for each year for the past six years, and they shall hear any other evidence conducing to show the value of the property sought to be taken, and shall award to the owner or owners thereof the actual value of the property taken in said county."

There is testimony on behalf of the county to the effect that if all the other pikes had been made free and this one had remained in the hands of the owners as a toll road it would have been much less valuable than formerly. On the contrary, there is testimony for the company that this would have increased its business, for the reason that there was no other way for the bulk of its trade to get out, and that if the pikes which fed it were made free more persons would have traveled it than when they had to pay toll on these pikes. But this matter is, in our judgment, immaterial, for the reason that the county had voted for free pikes, and it was not contemplated that the people of any section of the county should pay taxes to make the other pikes in the county free and still have to pay toll on the pike they used. It is also immaterial that the county might have built a pike for $1,800 a mile. It did not propose to build such a pike. It proposed to take appellant's pike, and when it did so, it must pay appellant the real value of the property at the time of the taking. Any other rule would permit spoliation of private property when taken for public use. The act provides that the proceeding under it shall be the same as under the act for the condemnation of private property by railroads, and precisely the same principle must be adopted here as would be if a railroad company had condemned this turnpike and right of way for a railway. The private property of the citizen is sacred, but his private interest must give way to the public good when the thing itself is required for the public use. He must in such case part with his property for the public good, but under the Constitution, when he does so part with it, he must be made whole, and a pecuniary consideration must be paid to him of such amount that he will be as well off pecuniarily after the taking as he was before. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the circuit court erred in the basis he adopted for fixing the value of the property, and that upon the proper basis its value should be fixed at $20,000.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of appellant for $20,000, with interest from August 4, 1897.

HUMPHREY, &c. v. POTTER, &c.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Conveyances—Fee simple—A by his deed, conveyed two tracts of land to B, his son, in fee simple, in consideration that B would support A and his wife and pay their funeral expenses after death, and provided further that after the death of B the property should vest in the other children of A. Within a short time after this conveyance was made B reconveyed the land to A in fee simple. Creditors of A subjected said land to sale for their debts, after which this suit was instituted by the children of A, claiming said land under the deed made to B, with remainder to them. They contend that the purchasers of the land acquired an interest in same only during the life of B. Held—That by the terms of the deed to B the estate in fee simple passed to B, and the subsequent clause giving the estate in remainder to the children of A was ineffectual, and the purchasers obtained a fee simple title to the land.

W. A. Barry and J. D. Irwin for appellants.

J. P. O'Meara for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Burnam.

On the 6th of April, 1892, George Potter and wife executed the following conveyance to their son, M. T. Potter: "This deed of conveyance made and entered into this the 6th day of April, 1892, by and between George Potter and Sarah Potter, his wife, parties of the first part, and M. T. Potter, party of the second part, all of the county of Hardin and State of Kentucky, witnesseth: The parties of the first part, for and in consideration of love and affection they have for their son, Michael T. Potter, and for the further consideration that the party of the second part agrees to and binds himself to take care of, to feed and clothe the parties of the second part as long as they may live, and after their death, party of the second part binds himself to pay all necessary funeral expenses. The parties of the first part has deeded this day the farm on which they now live, containing seventy-one and three-fourth acres, being the same land deeded by C. G. Wintersmith to George Potter, and dated January 27, 1858, and recorded in deed book 12, page 84; also another tract of land, containing thirteen acres, deeded the 25th day of February, 1892, by Felix G. Humphrey and wife to George Potter, to have and to hold to said second party, his heirs and assigns forever; and after the death of the said second party the land hereby conveyed shall go to the children of M. T. Potter by his first wife and to no one else. Witness our hands the day and year first above written.

"GEORGE POTTER,
"SARAH POTTER."

On the 13th day of May, 1892, just one month after the execution of the deed by George Potter and wife to him, M. T. Potter and his wife re-conveyed the land to George Potter. The deed is as follows: "This deed made and entered into this the 13th day of May, 1892, by and between M. T. Potter and Margaret Potter, his wife, parties of the first part, and George Potter, party of the second partt all of the above-named of the county of Hardin and State of Kentucky, witnesseth: That said party of the first part, for and on account of the party of the second part, having deeded and conveyed to the party of the first part the tracts of land on which the party of the second part now lives, containing about seventy-one and three-fourth acres, and also thirteen acres adjoining said tract, which was conveyed to the said party of the second part by deed from F. G. Humphreys, dated February 25, 1892, the above-named deed which the aforesaid parties of the second part made and dated April 6, 1892, requiring and binding the herein named party of the first part to support and care for as well as bear all expenses, even burial of the parties of the second part, and the deed not otherwise, according to the will and wishes of the party of the first part, for these reasons and these accounts the parties of the first part rescind, deed and convey back to the party of the second part the above-named tracts of land, not reserving any part of it, but hereby giving all his claim back to the party of the second part, to have and to hold the same, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging unto the parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns forever."

Shortly after the execution of the last deed George Potter died intestate, and these two tracts of land were sold under a judgment of the Hardin Circuit Court to satisfy his debts, and the defendants, Felix Humphreys and G. E. Berry, became the purchasers thereof, which sales were confirmed and deeds made to the purchaser by the master commissioner of the Hardin Circuit Court pursuant to the judgment thereof. On the 12th of May, 1899, the appellees, children of M. T. Potter, by his first wife, instituted this suit, in which they allege that they are the owners of the fee simple title to both tracts of land by virtue of the deed executed on the 6th day of April, 1892, by their grandfather, George Potter, to their father, M. T. Potter, and that the defendants only acquired by their purchases at the decretal sale made under the judgment of the Hardin Circuit Court the life interest of their father, M. T. Potter; that they are committing waste by cutting trees from the land, and ask that they be enjoined from so doing and for damages for wastes already committed.

The defendants in their answer relied upon the facts hereinbefore recited. It was adjudged by the trial court that the plaintiffs were the owners in fee of both tracts of land, subject to the life estate of M. T. Potter, and defendants were enjoined from cutting any timber except such as was necessary to keep up the place, and we are asked upon this appeal to determine what interest M. T. Potter took under the deed from his father. In the granting clause of the deed from George Potter to his son, M. T. Potter, there is no limitation on the estate granted. It conveys the full fee simple title. The words are then added that after the death of the second party the land shall go to the appellees. In other words, after vesting the grantee with a fee-simple title, the grantor adds words which change this fee into a life estate. In numerous recent decisions by this court it has been held that wills and deeds with similar provisions convey the fee-simple title to the original grantee. In Barth v. Barth, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 1840, the clause of the will under consideration was as follows: "I devise and bequeath to my wife, Sarah Ann Barth, all my property, real and personal, and choses in action of every description of which I am the owner, or to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease; also all my insurance on my life, absolutely and forever, with power to sell or dispose of as she deems proper, and all the property of whatever kind or description which remains at her death to be equally divided among my three sons, John C., Philip and Charles Barth, each to receive and share alike." It was held that the widow took the fee.

In Ray v. Spears, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1854, the conveyance was to the grantee in fee, but in the habendum clause it was provided that if the grantee should die without any child or children, that the land or proceeds should go back to the grantors and his heirs. In that case it was held that the grantee took a fee-simple title. In Clay v. Chenault, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1855, the testator devised 275 acres of land to his sons, Waller and Anderson Chenault, reserving the right by codicil to require his sons, if they sold the land, to reinvest the proceeds in other land as he might direct. By a codicil he gave them the right to sell and convey this land and make the purchaser a good title, but provided that the proceeds arising from the sale should be invested in other lands, and that if they should die without children surviving, that such proceeds were to revert to his estate. Waller Chenault died without making any disposition of said land, and it was held in a suit by the heirs of Anderson Chenault that he took the fee-simple title, and the land passed under his will and not that of his father. In the case of Cox v. Anderson's Adm'r, ante, 721, decided at the present term of this court, testator devised in fee to his wife, Sally Ann Gibbs, all of his property, real and personal, but provided that at her death $1,000 of the property so devised should go to the Mt. Zion Church. It was held that she took the fee in the entire property. Following the reasoning in these cases, we are of the opinion that M. T. Potter, under the deed from his father, was vested with the fee-simple title, and that appellees took no interest thereunder, and that his subsequent deed to his father reconveyed the fee to him, and that it was subject to the claims of creditors.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE PUBLIC WAREHOUSE CO. v. JAMES.

Warranty—Measure of damages—Evidence—In this action to recover damages for breach of warranty in the sale of a tract of land, where a strip of land was taken by the city under a superior title for a street, it was competent to show that the particular strip had a peculiar value of its own because of its adaptability for building purposes. In such action it is not competent to show the value of the land fourteen years after the conveyance for the purpose of claiming that the diminished value, as indicated by the assessment of a later date, was due to ouster of the part recovered. The assessor's judgment as to the value of the lot before and after the opening of the street was admissible, and the reasons upon which he based his judgment in making the reduction were likewise admissible, but the assessment lists were not competent evidence. The same evidence would be competent in fixing the damages for the taking in this case as would have been competent in an action for condemnation by the city, therefore, it was proper to admit evidence as to the value of the strip of land for whatever purpose it might have been used.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellant.

Wm. Furlong and John Roberts for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is the third appeal of this case. The opinions on the former appeals may be found in 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1727, and 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1216. The action is upon a covenant of warranty for damages for its breach, because of the easement or right of the city to extend a street over a portion of the land conveyed and warranted, existing at the time of the conveyance. The matters alleged as error by appellant and complained of on this appeal are as follows: There was some proof to the effect that the strip of land taken was fronting on the street and was worth more than similar land at the rear of the lot which did not front on the street. This was one of the points discussed on the first appeal. However, on this trial it does not appear that the right to recover was made to depend particularly upon this fact, but that it developed incidentally in the course of the evidence that the strip of land was worth more because of its location, and because of the surface conditions at that point. We are of opinion that it was competent to show that the particular strip taken under the superior outstanding title by the city had a peculiar value of its own because of its adaptability for certain purposes, as, for example, for building purposes. This was shown, and this was the principal effect of the evidence objected to.

The second ground alleged as error is that the consequential damages to the remaining tract of land, caused by the city's establishing the graded street when opened in such manner as to make a deep cut in front of appellee's lot, was one that was not an incident, it is claimed, to the city's right to take and occupy this strip for its street. On the last appeal we held just to the contrary to this contention, and the circuit court followed that ruling.

In a suit upon a warranty, where a part of the property is taken under superior title, it is not competent to show the value of the land fourteen years after the conveyance for the purpose of claiming that the diminished value, as indicated by the assessment of a later date, was due to ouster of the part recovered. In this case the city assessor testified that he had examined the property carefully and critically after the opening of the street, and as the result of such examination he had reduced the assessment valuation by something over $1,100. We are of opinion that it was not relevant nor proper to have admitted the assessment rolls as evidence in this case, but the assessor's judgment as to the value of the lot before and after the opening of the street was admissible, and the reasons upon which he based his Judgment in making the reduction were likewise admissible. The fact that the assessment lists were used in the case do not appear to the court to have been material or prejudicial, because at the utmost they merely show that the assessor had acted upon the same line as he had testified upon.

On the last appeal we held that the same evidence would be competent in fixing the damages for the taking in this case as would have been competent in an action for condemnation by the city, therefore, it was proper to admit evidence as to the value of the strip of land in question for whatever purpose it might have been used.

Perceiving no error in the record prejudicial to appellant, the judgment must be affirmed.

CONTINENTAL TOBACCO CO. v. KNOOP.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Master and servant—Negligence—Defective machinery—This action was instituted by appellee to recover damages for injuries sustained from the fall of an elevator while in the employ of appellant. The proof showed that the cause of the elevator falling was the slipping of the wire cable from its socket. A verdict and judgment for $4,000 in favor of appellee resulted, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the court properly refused to give a peremptory instruction to find for defendant, and as appellee was seriously and permanently injured the verdict was not excessive. It was the business of the appellant to furnish its employes for their use an elevator in a reasonably safe condition, and if one of its employes was injured because of such failure a cause of action would arise therefor.

Joyes, Jarvis & Swope for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, while an employe of the appellant, was seriously and permanently injured by the falling of its elevator from the third floor to the cellar of its tobacco factory. The appellee and two other workmen were hoisting a hogshead of tobacco from the cellar to the third floor, when the wire cable to which the elevator was suspended slipped from its socket.

There is some conflict in the testimony as to what caused the elevator to fall, but there was sufficient evidence tending to prove that it was the result of the defective condition of the elevator to authorize the submission of the case to the jury. In fact the evidence of the plaintiff tends to show that it was an old elevator, and was frequently found to be out of order. The appellee had no supervision of the elevator, and it was not a part of his duties to examine into the condition of the elevator, with a view of discovering any defects in it. He did not have the same opportunity as the master to ascertain the defects, if any existed. It was the business of the appellant to furnish its employes for their use an elevator in a reasonably safe condition, and if one of its employes was injured because of such failure, a cause of action would arise therefor. Whether the appellant performed its duty by furnishing that character of elevator was a question for the jury. Likewise it was a question for the jury to determine whether the appellee was injured in consequence of a breach of such duty. We are of the opinion that the court properly refused to give the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the appellant. (Wilson v. Williams, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 587.) We must decline to disturb the verdict on the ground that it is excessive. The testimony shows that the appellee's leg was broken in two places; that his back was seriously injured; that he received a great shock; that he has been unable to work since that time. He was injured in the early part of February, and he was unable to perform any labor in the October following.

There is no escape from the conclusion that he was permanently and seriously injured.

In addition to other grounds, the appellant relies upon the following: First, that the appellee has received about $400 by way of compromise, and no part of which had been repaid or tendered to the appellant before the institution of this action; second, the error of the court in instructing the jury. The appellant pleaded accord and satisfaction. It averred that it had paid the appellee his weekly wages and doctor bills, etc., from the time of his injury until some time in the following September; that it was to take the appellee back into its service when he became able to work; that it had offered to and was willing to do so; that upon these terms the appellee's claim against it was compromised and settled. The appellee denied that such a compromise was made, or that he ever agreed to accept the money and other benefits in compromise and settlement of his claim. Testimony was offered touching this issue, and the court told the jury that if they believed that such a compromise was made to find for the defendant. The jury returned a verdict of $4,000 against the appellant, and of course found against it on this issue. In fact there was little conflict in the testimony upon it, and we are of the opinion that the jury properly found that no such compromise had been made; besides, a fair deduction from the testimony of the witness for the appellant would not have justified the jury in reaching a different conclusion.

It is insisted that the jury should have been instructed that the efforts to effect a compromise were not to be taken by the jury to be an admission of negligence or liability on the defendant's part. The appellee did not endeavor to show that the appellant had admitted negligence or liability, but sought to recover by proving the circumstances and conditions under which he received his injuries. The appellant sought to establish its defense of accord and satisfaction. The court was not called upon to instruct the jury as to the weight which should be given the evidence which the appellant introduced, but to submit one of the appellant's defenses, to wit, accord and satisfaction. It was not incumbent upon the appellee to return the money which he had received for wages and medical bills in order to maintain his action. The doctrine of the McElroy case, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 790, and kindred cases do not apply to the facts of this case. In that case it was admitted that the money was received in compromise and settlement of his claim for injuries, but the plaintiff endeavors to avoid the effect of the compromise upon the ground that it had been obtained by fraud. In such a case an action could not be maintained without first tendering or refunding the money received on the compromise. The difference between the McElroy case and this one is shown in the case of McGill v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., ante, 1244, recently decided by this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

KING, &c. v. TILFORD, &c.

(Filed December 17, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Appellants, as members of the Board of Aldermen of Louisville, instituted proceedings to impeach appellees as members of the Board of Public Safety. Appellees instituted an action to enjoin the appellants from prosecuting said impeachment proceedings. The injunction was made perpetual, and this appeal is prosecuted. At the time the case was submitted the terms of office of all parties had expired. Held—That the appeal should be dismissed. A reversal would accomplish nothing, and an affirmance would not benefit appellees.

Barnett, Miller & Barnett, H. L. Stone, H. H. Herr and L. S. Leopold for appellants.

Humphrey & Davie, O'Neal & Pryor, Phelps & Thum, A. G. Caruth and Pirtle & Trabue for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge White.

The appellees were members of the Board of Public Safety of the city of Louisville, and the appellants were the Board of Aldermen of the city of Louisville in the year 1896, the Board of Safety having been appointed in 1893, and the aldermen were elected in November, 1895.

In 1896 there was instituted by two members of the Board of Councilmen of the city, proceedings to impeach the appellees as members of the Board of Public Safety before the appellants, sitting as a court to try the impeachment proceedings. Appellants assumed to have jurisdiction to try the impeachment proceeding notwithstanding the appellees' objection. To prevent the trial by appellants of the charges against appellees this action for injunction was brought by appellees. On trial in the court below the injunction was made perpetual, and this appeal was prosecuted, the record being filed December 8, 1896. The case was submitted with leave in May, 1898. By the charter governing cities of the first class the term of office of the Board of Aldermen is two years, and of Board of Public Safety four years. So that when this case was submitted for our consideration the terms of office of all the parties hereto, both appellants and appellees, had expired by operation of law. There was, therefore, at the date of submission, and now, no real controversy between these parties. The judgment of this court on this appeal would amount to nothing. A reversal would accomplish nothing, and an affirmance would not benefit appellees. Where, pending an appeal, an event occurs which makes a determination of the question unnecessary, or which would of necessity render the judgment that might be pronounced ineffectual, the appeal should be dismissed. (Cyc., volume 3, page 188, and cases cited; 159 U. S., 651, and cases cited.) This rule seems to be well nigh universal.

There being now no real controversy between these parties, and nothing but the moot question of law presented, we decline to consider it, but will dismiss the appeal, without awarding costs to or against either party.

Appeal dismissed.

Whole court sitting, Chief Justice Guffy dissenting.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO. v. HENDON.

(Filed January 7, 1903.)

1. Damages—Discontinuing telephone service—Appellee brought this action to recover damages for discontinuing telephone service in his office for about fourteen hours, resulting from the mistake of the bookkeeper in posting appellee as not having paid his subscription. No special damage was claimed. Held—That the measure of damages, in the absence of proof of special loss, is the amount paid for the service for the time during which it is refused.

2. Instructions—The court should have instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff the amount paid by him for the service for the time his phone was discontinued, taking for the basis the amount paid by the month and allowing for the time lost such part thereof as they deem right.

Fairleigh, Straus & Eagles for appellant.

Pryor & Sapinsky and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee Hendon is a physician living in Louisville; he was a patron of the appellant, the Cumberland Telephone and Telegraph Co., and had one of its instruments in his office. Appellant discontinued the telephone from 8 o'clock p. m. of October 23, 1900, to 8.45 a. m. the next morning, or something less than eighteen hours, and this action was brought to recover damages therefor. The reason the telephone was disconnected was that the bookkeeper made a mistake in posting the amount paid. His book did not show that Hendon had paid for the month of September, although he had in fact paid. On October 22d a notice was sent to him that his phone was discontinued for this reason; and he having paid no attention to the notice, twenty four hours afterwards the connection at the office was severed, although the instrument was not removed. When he got home at 6 o'clock that evening and found that he had been cut off he tried to phone to the office, but failed to get them. The next morning he went down; the mistake was at once corrected, and the instrument was no longer discontinued. The proof showed that he had not only paid for September, but had also paid in advance for October, November and December. It also showed that one person who needed the doctor for his wife that night, being unable to reach him by phone, walked to his office and waked him up. It also shows that three other persons who wished to talk with him were unable to reach him on the phone, and that when one of them asked at the office what was the matter, the assistant manager answered that his phone had been discontinued for nonpayment of rent. It is not shown that he suffered any pecuniary loss by the suspension of the service, although it would seem that he was considerably annoyed about it. On these facts the jury found for him a verdict for $200, on which the court entered judgment.

The court instructed the jury that they should find for the plaintiff at least nominal damages, and if they believed from the evidence he suffered inconvenience by reason of his telephone service being discontinued, then they should further find for him such sum as would fairly and reasonably compensate him for the inconvenience so sustained. There was nothing in the case to warrant an instruction on punitive damages, and the court properly refused to instruct the jury on this subject. The plaintiff had, by contract, acquired the right to a certain service, and this contract being broken, the measure of damages is compensation for the breach, as in other cases of broken obligations. The case is entirely different from those where there is a physical trespass, as in the case of the expulsion of a passenger from a train, where there is not only a breach of contract, but an actual tort.

The proper measure of damages to compensate for the breach of the contract is a matter of some difficulty, and we have been referred to no authorities directly in point. Where the contract is to deliver a specific message and is broken, the measure of damage has been often adjudicated, and we see no reason why the same principles should not apply to the case before us, for the contract here was in substance an undertaking to convey all messages the subscriber might wish to send, or others might wish to send to him over appellant's line within the time paid for by him. In the absence of proof of special damage for the failure to carry a message the recovery would be limited to the amount paid for the service which was not furnished. Mere inconvenience or annoyance can not be recovered for except in peculiar cases. (25 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 855-863; Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 90 Ky., 265.) Where there is a contract not for a specific message, but for the carriage of all messages within a certain time, the refusal to carry any messages for a certain part of the time is a breach of contract not different in character from the neglect to carry a specific message, and the measure of damages, in the absence of any proof of specific loss, is the amount paid for the service for the time during which it is refused. In case of special damage this in addition may be recovered under proper averments. (Robinson v. Western Union Tel. Co.)

Under the evidence the court should have instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff the amount paid by him for the service for the time his phone was discontinued, taking for the basis the amount paid by the month and allowing for the time lost such part thereof as they deemed right.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. FRAZEE.

SAME v. FRAZEE, &c.

SAME v. SAME.

(Filed January 7, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Damages for loss of live stock in transportation—Continuance—Evidence—Appellees brought this action against appellant to recover damages for the value of four horses burned while being transported from Frankfort, Ky., to Memphis, Tenn. Appellant took the depositions of sundry witnesses, who were turfmen of years of experience and actual acquaintance with the value of such stock, but the court sustained exceptions to said depositions, and appellant then made a motion for a continuance of the case, when it was agreed that the depositions should be read as the statements of absent witnesses, but on the trial the court excluded all their testimony of facts showing that their judgment as to the value of these horses was entitled to weight by reason of their experience as turfmen. Held—That this was prejudicial error. The court erred in allowing plaintiffs to read to the jury from his private catalogue the history of Charade, the sire of one of the horses. The witness might state the facts in regard to the history of Charade, so far as they were personally known to him, or he might prove these facts by the testimony of other witnesses who had personal knowledge on the subject, but he could not read to the jury a newspaper article or other publication reciting the facts. Books of pedigree are admitted under the statute, but mere private publications of the history of horses stand on entirely different ground as it was hearsay evidence.

2. Measure of damages—Agreed valuation—The valuations of the horses fixed by the railroad company in its bill of lading does not limit the recovery to the amounts therein stated, as it is apparent there was in fact no agreed valuation, as this is a printed form and the amounts are all printed *p it. A carrier can not limit his responsibility for negligence by stipulations that he shall not be liable beyond a certain amount for the loss of the property.

Ira Julian and Edward W. Hines for appellant.

Jas Andrew Scott and John W. Ray for appellees.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellees shipped over appellant's road four horses in a car from Frankfort, Ky., consigned to Memphis, Tenn. When the car reached Russellville, Ky., and was standing in the yard there, it caught fire, and by reason of this the horses were destroyed, or very much damaged. This suit was brought to recover damages for the injury to the horses. The suit was brought very shortly before the term at which it was tried, and after filing its answer the defendant took the depositions of a number of witnesses on its behalf. The court sustained exceptions to these depositions, it seems, on the ground that they were taken during a term of court. The defendant then filed affidavit for a continuance, and on the hearing of the motion it was agreed by the plaintiffs that the depositions might be read as the testimony of the absent witnesses. But on the trial, when the depositions were offered in evidence, the court only allowed certain parts of the depositions to be read, and of this the defendant now complains.

The plaintiff insisted that the horses were blooded stock, and very valuable by reason of their pedigree as well as their intrinsic merits. The depositions taken by the defendant were given by turfmen of years' experience and actual acquaintance with the value of such stock. The value of their testimony depended almost wholly upon their means of knowledge. The court excluded all their testimony of facts showing that their judgment as to the value of these horses was entitled to weight by reason of their experience as turfmen. This was error, and it was very prejudicial. To obtain a trial at that term the plaintiffs had consented that the depositions might be read. The statements of the witnesses, showing the weight to which their judgment was entitled, were of the utmost importance, for without this the jury may have given the testimony very little consideration, as the testimony of a witness on this subject, unless he is shown to be an expert, is of little value.

The plaintiffs were also allowed to read to the jury from his private catalogue the history of Charade, the sire of one of the horses. This was error. The witness might state the facts in regard to the history of Charade, so far as they were personally known to him, or he might prove these facts by the testimony of other witnesses who had personal knowledge on the subject, but he could not read to the jury a newspaper article or other publication reciting the facts. Books of pedigree are admitted under the statute, but mere private publications of the history of horses stand on entirely different ground, and are subject to all the objections to hearsay evidence. As the value of a horse depends upon his pedigree, this incompetent evidence was prejudicial to the defendant.

By the bill of lading sued on it was stipulated as follows: "This contract entered into at the above time and place between the Louisville & Nashville

R. R. Co., hereinafter called the carrier, and L. D. Frazee, hereinafter called the shipper, witnesseth, That the carrier will carry live stock at the rate established by it therefor, or, where certain risks, duties and liabilities are assumed by the shipper, as hereinafter specified, will carry such live stock at greatly reduced rates, and (if shipped in car-load quantities) will furnish the shipper or his agent free transportation on the train with said live stock.

"In the present instance the shipper elects to avail himself of the said reduced rate (if shipped in car-load quantities) free passage for himself or his agent on the train with said live stock, and has delivered on the cars of the carrier the following-described live stock, to wit: Consignee, destination, etc.: L. D. Frazee, Memphis, Tenn. Description of stock; four horses; one attendant.

"The carrier agrees to transport said live stock to destination if on said carrier's line of railroad, otherwise to the place where said live stock is to be received by the next connecting carrier for transportation to or towards destination, and the carrier guarantees that the freight rate thereon from point of shipment to destination shall not exceed the reduced rate of $60 per car.

"In consideration of all which the shipper hereby agrees to assume the risks, duties and liabilities hereinafter specified, and that the transportation shall be upon the following conditions, which are admitted and accepted by said shipper as just and reasonable, viz.: * * * Should damage occur for which the said carrier may be liable, the value at the place and date of shipment shall govern the settlement, in which the amount claimed shall not exceed for a stallion or jack, $150; for a horse or mule, $75; mare and colt together, $100; cow and calf together, $35; domestic horned animals, $30 each; calves, hogs or sheep, $5 each; chickens, ducks and guinea fowl, $1 per dozen; geese, $2 per dozen, and turkeys, $3 per dozen; other animals $5 each, which amounts it is agreed are as much as such animals as are herein agreed to be transported are reasonably worth."

It is earnestly argued for the appellant that there can be no recovery beyond the amounts thus specified as the value of the horses, and we are referred to a number of decisions holding that where there is an agreed valuation of property to be shipped at a reduced rate no recovery can be had beyond the valuation so fixed. But this contract fairly construed does not bring the case within the rule thus declared; and no opinion is intimated or expressed as to the soundness of that rule. It is apparent here that there was in fact no agreed valuation of the property made, as this is a printed form and the amounts are all printed in it. It has often been held in this State that a carrier can not limit his responsibility for negligence by stipulations that he shall not be liable beyond a certain amount for the loss of the property. We are urged to re-examine the subject and overrule the previous cases. This we are not inclined to do. The rule declared by the court has been made a part of the organic law of the State (section 196 of the Constitution), and the provisions of the Constitution are not to be frittered away, but must be fairly construed with a view to effect its purposes. (Orndorf v. Adams Express Co., 66 Ky., 196; L., C. & L. R. R. Co. v. Hedger, 72 Ky., 650; Rhodes v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 72 Ky., 691; L. & N.

The question is not presented as to what would be the rule if the shipper practiced a fraud on the carrier and deceived him as to the value of the goods, or intentionally undervalued his goods where the carrier's charges were graduated according to the value of the property in order to get the lower rate.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial and further proceedings consistent herewith.

TOWNSEND, &c. v. WILSON, &c.

1. Fraudulent conveyances—A, by his will, devised to B $1,000 on the condition that if he should die without children the legacy should pass to other heirs of A. B died without children and the other heirs of A brought suit and recovered judgment against the executrix for the amount of said legacy, and had a return of no property found, after which this action was instituted to set aside a conveyance made by B to C and her two children, on the ground that the deed was voluntary and void against the judgment debt. By the terms of the deed the property was conveyed to the two children, and if either died under twenty-one years of age without issue, the interest of the one so dying passed to the survivor; and if both died under twenty one, and without issue, the property passed to their mother, C. Held—That under section 1907, Kentucky Statutes, said conveyance was void as to said debt, and the conveyance was properly set aside and the property subjected to the payment of the legacy.

2. Decedent's estate—Evidence—C, who had a contingent interest in the estate, was incompetent to testify as to a transaction with B, showing that the conveyance was not voluntary, but made for a valuable consideration.

Butler T. Southgate for appellants.

John B. James and Breckinridge & Shelby for appellees.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Isaac Wilson died in 1863, and by his will devised to John N. Wilson $1,000 on the condition that if he should die without children the legacy should then pass to the other heirs of Isaac Wilson. John N. Wilson died without children in 1896. The residuary legatees of Isaac Wilson obtained a judgment against John N. Wilson's executrix for the amount of the legacy, and upon that judgment an execution was issued and returned "no property found." They then instituted this action to set aside as fraudulent as against them a deed made by John N. Wilson in the year 1889 for the property in controversy upon the recited consideration of love and affection to appellants, Jennie F. Townsend and her two children, Elizabeth and John W. Townsend, on the ground that the conveyance was voluntary and, there-void against their judgment debt. By the terms of the deed the property was conveyed to the two children, and if either died under twenty-one years of age without issue the interest of the one so dying passed to the survivor, and if both died under twenty-one, and without issue, the property passed to their mother, Jennie F. Townsend.

The defendants pleaded in substance that the deed was not fraudulent in fact, and that John N. Wilson, after he made the deed, had other property subject to execution more than sufficient to pay his debts. The court sustained a demurrer to this plea. While there is some conflict in the authorities, the rule in this State has been from the beginning that if a party be indebted at the time of a voluntary conveyance it is presumed to be fraudulent as to his existing debts, regardless of the amount of the debts, the intentions or circumstances of the party conveying or the amount of property conveyed. (Hanson v. Buckner, 34 Ky., 251.) This rule has been crystallized in our present statute, which provides: "Every gift, conveyance, assignment, transfer or change made by a debtor of or upon any of his estate without valuable consideration therefor shall be void as to all his then existing liabilities." (Kentucky Statutes, section 1907.)

As to existing liabilities, by the express terms of the statute, every conveyance by a debtor of any of his estate is void. The purpose of the statute is to place the property of the debtor, which is thus conveyed away, in precisely the same situation as to his existing debts as if the conveyance had not been made. As to these debts the conveyance is a nullity. (Enders v. Williams, 58 Ky., 350; Slater v. Sherman, 68 Ky., 206; Yankey v. Sweeney, 85 Ky., 62.)

The court, therefore, properly sustained the demurrer to this part of the answer. The defendants also pleaded that the deed was not made in consideration of love and affection, but for a valuable consideration, and in support of this plea the mother, Jennie Townsend, was introduced as a witness, but the court sustained exceptions to her testimony in so far as she stated transactions between her and the decedent, J. N. Wilson, on the ground that she was testifying for herself. She was a party defendant to the action, and in the event that her two children died in infancy, and without issue, took the property in fee under the deed in controversy. She had, therefore, a vested interest in the property, although it was defeasible upon the children, or either of them, surviving their majority or leaving issue. But although her interest might thus be defeated, she had a certain interest in the property, and was thus testifying for herself. While there are cases in other States allowing the testimony of a party in interest as to a transaction with a decedent where the controversy is wholly with strangers, little weight can be given to such decisions, for the question must depend upon the language of the statute, and our statute is different from that in many other States. It provides, subject to certain exceptions that need not be noticed, that "no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done, or omitted to be done, by * * * one * * * who is dead when the testimony is offered to be given." (Civil Code, section 606.)

As we have said, Mrs. Townsend was testifying for herself; she testified concerning a transaction with J. M. Wilson, who was dead when the testimony was offered to be given. The original statute allowing parties to testify for themselves read very differently. (See original General Statutes.) The purpose of the change appears to have been not only to exclude the testimony of a party as to a transaction with a decedent "in actions or special proceedings with the executor, administrator," etc., as provided in the original statute, but in all actions where the person with whom the transaction occurred is dead and can not be introduced to contradict the testimony of the interested party. Thus in Harpending v. Wiley, 80 Ky., 452, where a transaction had taken place with an agent who was dead at the time of the trial, it was held that the defendant could not testify for himself as to the transaction with the agent, although his estate was in nowise concerned. (Maxie v. Bethel, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1085.) So also in Hurry v. Kline, 98 Ky., 358, the defendant was not allowed to testify as to what took place between him and the obligee in the note, where the suit was by the assignee, although the estate of the assignor was not liable upon the assignment. In Turner v. Mitchell, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1784, the plaintiff sought to recover upon the ground that one of several sureties in the note had first taken an assignment of the note to himself, and then assigned one-half of it to the plaintiff. The surety was dead at the time of the trial, and it was held that the plaintiff could not testify as against a co-surety to the transaction between him and the dead man. The same rule was recognized in Haggins v. Arnett, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 809; Manhattan Life Insurance Co. v. Beard, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1747.

Aside from the statute the parties in interest can not testify at all. The legislature in changing the rule and allowing them to testify as to their acts and doings has seen fit to except, among other things, transactions with deceased persons, for the reason that if such testimony of a party in interest were allowed, it would place his adversary at great disadvantage because of the difficulty in meeting it after the death of the person with whom the transaction was had, and, besides, the temptation to perjury and undue advantage would be given one of the litigants.

The circuit court, therefore, properly excluded the evidence referred to, and as without this there was nothing to impeach the recitals of the deed, properly subjected the land to the debt.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO. v. FRENCH, BY, &c.

Street railways — Negligence — Instructions—Appellee, by next friend, brought this action to recover damages of appellant for personal injuries received from a collision with a trolley car, alleging that the car struck him at a footway crossing at the intersection of Ormsby avenue and Eighteenth street. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted, urging as error the failure of the court to instruct the jury that if the injury did not occur at the crossing a less degree of care was required of the motorman, and that if the collision did not occur on the crossing no recovery could be had under the pleadings. Held—That the failure to give such instruction was not error, and as there was evidence to support the allegations of the petition a recovery was properly had. In operating dangerous machinery at a high rate of speed over the streets of a great city the appellant is bound to know that men, women and children have an equal right to its use and will be upon it, and it is its duty to be constantly on the lookout and to take all reasonable precautions to avoid injuring them, and this duty obtains not only at the footway crossings, but at every other point of a public street, and one of these precautions is to give notice of their approach by the customary signals, and when necessary to avoid injury to other persons to slow up and, if necessary, stop their car. This duty, under the circumstances, is no more than ordinary care.

2. Verdict not contrary to evidence—The verdict is not flagrantly against the evidence.

Fairleigh, Straus & Eagles for appellant.

B. H. Young and M. W. Ripy for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

One of the defendant's trolley cars struck the plaintiff, a boy nine years of age, at the intersection of Ormsby avenue and Eighteenth street, in the city of Louisville, inflicting severe injuries, and this suit was brought by his next friend for damages. A jury trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendants have appealed. They assign three reasons why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed: First, that the trial court erred in not instructing the jury that if the collision did not occur at the footway crossing of Eighteenth street and Ormsby avenue, but between the intersection of the streets, plaintiff could not recover under the pleadings in the case. And that as there was testimony that the collision did not take place immediately on the crossing, but after the car had passed beyond it, the jury should have been instructed that a less degree of care was required on the part of the agents of defendant in charge of the car to avoid collision with foot travelers than at footway crossings.

The plaintiff, in his petition, alleges that whilst he was going along Ormsby avenue and crossing Eighteenth street, a trolley car belonging to the defendant, running at a high rate of speed, without giving any signal or warning of its approach, ran against him, and as the result thereof his back, bladder and kidneys were injured and his health permanently impaired. The answer was a traverse, and a plea of contributory negligence. As is usual in such cases, the testimony was quite conflicting. The mother of the plaintiff testified that he was hurt exactly at the crossing of Ormsby and Eighteenth streets; that the car was running at a high rate of speed, and did not ring the bell or give any signal of its approach; that plaintiff had stopped on the crossing to await the passage of a milk wagon, going in the opposite direction to the trolley car; and that as it passed he started across the street and was struck by the car. Mrs. Bedinger, a witness for appellee, testifies that she saw plaintiff standing on the crossing waiting for the wagon to get out of his way; and that as soon as it did so he started across; that just at this moment the defendant's car passed at a high rate of speed, without ringing the bell, or giving any other signal of its approach, and struck the plaintiff just as he came from behind the wagon.

On the other hand, a number of persons, who were introduced as witnesses for the defendant, testified in substance that when the trolley approached the crossing the bell was sounded, and the speed of the car diminished; and that about thirty feet beyond the crossing the car met a wagon coming into the city; and that as the front end of the car got to the back end of the wagon plaintiff ran out from behind the wagon against the side of the car; that they did not see him until he came from behind the wagon, too late to have stopped the car. The trial court instructed the jury substantially that it was the duty of the motorman in charge of the car to lessen its speed as it approached the intersection of Eighteenth and Ormsby avenue, and to have given notice of its approach by the usual signals, and to have had the car under his control, and to have kept a lookout ahead to avoid injuring any person using the street or crossing at that point, and if the jury believed that he failed to discharge these duties and to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to persons using the crossing, and plaintiff was injured by reason of such failure, that they should find for him, provided they also believed from the evidence that the plaintiff at the time was not himself guilty of negligence, which helped to bring about the injury, and but for which he would not have been injured. If, on the other hand, they believe that the motorman discharged the duties indicated, and exercised ordinary care to prevent injury to persons using the crossing, that they should find for the defendant. The petition proceeds upon the theory that the collision occurred upon the footway crossing, and there is testimony to support this contention. The instructions of the court are drawn in conformity with the averments of the petition. And whilst there is testimony conducing to show that the actual collision was a short distance from the footway crossing, it was the intersection of the two streets, and this slight divergence between the averments of the petition and the testimony as to the actual point of collision is, in our opinion, wholly immaterial. The defendant in operating dangerous machinery at a high rate of speed over the streets of a great city is bound to know that men, women and children have an equal right to its use, and will be upon it; and it is defendant's duty to be constantly on the lookout, and to take all reasonable precautions to avoid injuring them, and this duty obtains not only at the footway crossings, but at every other point of a public street, and one of these precautions is to give notice of their approach by the customary signals, and when necessary to avoid injury to other persons to slow up, and, if necessary, stop their car. This duty, under the circumstances, is no more than ordinary care. The instructions given by the trial court conform substantially to this view of the law, and which has been frequently announced by this court, and by the ablest text-writers on this subject. In our opinion the trial court did not err in failing to give the instruction asked by the defendant on this point.

The third ground of complaint is that the finding of the jury is flagrantly against the weight of evidence. The question of negligence is one of fact, and our duty is performed when we see that there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict. The jury under our system are the sole judges of the weight and credibility of the testimony. If it be true that the defendant failed to give notice of their approach to the footway crossing by the customary signals, and put it out of their power to stop the car by the high rate of speed at which they were going, after they saw, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have seen, the danger of the plaintiff, they were guilty of negligence. There was sufficient proof on this point, if the jury gave credit to it, to justify their verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

SHANNON v. PADGETT.

Alex. Lackey and A. J. Garred for appellant.

H. C. Sullivan and Stewart & Stewart for appellee.

Appeal from Lawrence Circuit Court.

Chief Justice Burnam delivered the following response to motion to dismiss appeal:

The motion to dismiss the appeal in this case, on the ground that appellant has satisfied the judgment appealed from, must be overruled, first, because such ~~judgment~~ does not preclude him from prosecuting the appeal; and, second, because the notice of the motion required by rule 13 was not accompanying the motion.

GLOVER, &c. v. CHECK, &c.

(Filed January 9, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Personal representative—Compensation—The testator died leaving an estate valued at about $200,000, the most of which was invested in shares of valuable stock, was distributed to the beneficiaries in kind, and only $52,797.09 came to the hands of the executors to be applied in the payment of debts and legacies. The lower court made an allowance to the executors of $10,000 for their services, insisting that under section 3883, Kentucky Statutes, the compensation should have been limited to 5 per cent. on the amount received and distributed by them, which would amount to only $2,639.85. Held—That in view of the fact that the executors rendered special services beneficial to the estate, the allowance to them should be fixed at $5,000 under the statute.

Albert S. Brandles for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

R. R. Glover, a citizen of Louisville, died in January, 1900, the owner of about seventy-five separate parcels of real estate located in the city of Louisville, worth in the aggregate about $100,000, and a personal estate which was appraised at about $200,000, of which $168,700 were invested in 1,687 shares of the stock of the National Casket Co.; $7,100 in seventy-five shares of the Louisville Cotton Oil Co.; $5,000 in ten bonds of the National Casket Co., and the balance of the personalty, consisting of other stocks, cash on hand, notes, etc. After making a number of special bequests, which aggregated about $40,000, decedent devised the residue of his estate, after the payment of his debts, to his three surviving children, and appointed his son-in-law, W. T. C. Cross, and his business associate, G. W. Check, his executors, both of whom qualified and jointly administered upon the estate. The surviving widow, who was the second wife of decedent, renounced the provisions of the will, and asked that dower be allotted to her, but her claim to dower was subsequently adjusted by turning over to her two hundred and fifty shares of the National Casket Co. stock, $5,000 in National Casket Co. bonds, and seventy-five shares in the Louisville Cotton Oil Co., and by the payment to her of $1,574 in cash, and the transfer to her of certain real estate owned by the decedent, all of which property aggregated about $62,000. There came to the hands of the executors $52,797.09, a part of which arose from the sale of real estate, and a part from mortgages executed by them upon real estate, and which they paid out in the extinguishment of the various special devises and debts of decedent, leaving personal estate of decedent amounting to about $152,000, which was invested in securities, the great bulk in the stock of the National Casket Co. Shortly after their qualification as executors they instituted this suit in the Jefferson Circuit Court, asking a settlement of their accounts, and that they be allowed reasonable compensation for their services and for the services of their attorneys. The case was referred to the master commissioner, who allowed the executors $3,000 for attorneys' fees, and fixed their allowance at $10,000. The devisees filed exceptions to so much of this report as allowed the executors any sum in excess of $2,639.85, 5 per cent. commission upon the funds actually received and disbursed by them, which were overruled and the report confirmed, and the devisees have appealed. Section 3883 of the Kentucky Statutes provides: "The allowance to executors, administrators and curators shall not exceed 5 per cent. of all the amounts received and distributed: Provided, That upon proof heard in open court, upon proper notice to the parties in interest, the court may make allowance when the executor, administrator or curator has, in the proper discharge of his duties in attending to, administering and settling the estate in his hands, been required to perform extraordinary services. But such allowance shall not exceed a fair compensation for the time occupied, and expenses incurred in protecting, attending to, collecting and settling such estates and 5 per cent. on all amounts received and distributed."

In Renick's Ex'or v. Renick, &Co., 92 Ky., 336, the personal estate consisted of $64,570.37, and a large tract of land worth in the aggregate of about $250,000. A bitter and protracted litigation grew up over the probate of the will, which was finally decided in favor of the propounders, and which was greatly due to the energy, sagacity and influence of the executor, to whom the commissioner allowed $10,000. But this court, upon appeal, held that he was only entitled to a commission of 5 per cent. upon the amount actually collected and paid out under the statute as it then existed. Probably owing to the hardship of this case the legislature enacted section 3883 of the statute quoted supra. The only effect of the amendment to the statute is to authorize the court to make an additional allowance in excess of 5 per cent. to a personal representative, who has, in the proper discharge of his duties in settling the estate in his hands, been required to perform extraordinary services, and even then, such additional allowance is limited to a fair com-compensation for the time occupied and expenses incurred in protecting, attending to, collecting and settling such estate. There is nothing in the amendment which changes the rule announced in Renick v. Renick, and many other cases, that a personal representative is not entitled to commissions upon the value of lands, bonds, stocks, notes, etc., which they were not authorized to sell and reduce to cash, but which went in kind to the devisees or heirs at law. (Garr's Ex'or v. Roy, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1697.) But in Reed v. Reed, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2186, it was held that, in addition to a commission of 5 per cent. upon actual cash passing through their hands, the executors were entitled to a reasonable allowance for services in caring for and distributing the estate devised in kind, and for services in attending to litigation in which the estate was involved. It appears that, in addition to rendering valuable services in adjusting the claim of the surviving widow for dower, the executors discovered nineteen lots, valued at $9,500, which belonged to the estate of decedent, which had not been appraised, and also gave considerable attention to the real estate which passed under the will to the residuary devisees, and also succeeded in effecting a provident settlement of a considerable claim asserted against the estate by the Methodist Church. And we are, therefore, of the opinion that they are entitled to an allowance in addition to the usual commission of 5 per cent. upon the money which actually passed through their hands, and that they should be allowed $5,000 in gross for their services.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to reduce the allowance to the executors from $10,000 to $5,000, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

VANDYKE v. MEMPHIS, NEW ORLEANS & CINCINNATI PACKET CO.

(Filed January 9, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Negligence—Evidence—In this action by a roustabout to recover damages of the owners of steamboat for negligence in permitting a trap door to remain open through which plaintiff fell, sustaining serious injuries, the defendants were permitted to introduce in evidence a record kept by the shipping clerk to prove that the name of plaintiff was not among the list of roustabouts. Held—That said evidence was improperly admitted as the proof failed to show that it was properly kept, besides books of this kind are usually admitted only as affirmative evidence and not to establish a negative proposition.

2. Master and servant—Fellow servants—Instructions—The court below instructed the jury to the effect that they could find for plaintiff only in case the injury resulted from the negligence of agents or officers of defendant superior in authority to plaintiff. Held—That said instruction was erroneous and prejudicial as there was no question of fellow servants in the case. A master employing a servant impliedly engages with him that the place in which he is to work shall be reasonably safe and he must exercise ordinary care to keep it safe. The servant has a right to look to the master for the discharge of this duty, and it is immaterial to whom the master may entrust the discharge of the duty which the law imposes upon him. He can not delegate it to a servant so as to exempt himself from liability for injuries caused to another servant by its omission, but is responsible to the servant.

who is injured from a want of proper care in the person to whom the duty is delegated without regard to the rank or title of the agent entrusted with its performance.

Matt O'Doherty and J. J. Fitzgerald for appellant.

Harris & Marshall for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On Monday, February 27, 1899, appellant, Charles Vandyke, entered into the employment of appellee as a roustabout on its steamer, Buckeye State, then at Louisville on its way down the Ohio river. Between 3 and 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the next day, while engaged in loading the boat with baled hay at Grand View, Ind., he fell in an open hatchway, sustaining injuries, to recover for which he instituted this suit. The proof introduced for him on the trial tended to show that he was thirty-eight years of age, and, before he was injured, a stout and healthy man; that after the injury he was unable to work, and his power to labor was substantially destroyed. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

On the trial Charles McKenzie was introduced by the plaintiff as a witness, and testified that he was one of the deck hands, and just behind the plaintiff at the time he was injured by falling into the hatchway. He described the circumstances of the injury and corroborated plaintiff's testimony. The defendant then introduced the captain of the boat, and asked him if McKenzie was on the boat on that trip. He answered that he hardly thought he was. The defendant then introduced the record of the boat kept by the shipping clerk, who was not introduced as a witness, and showed by it that McKenzie's name did not appear in the list of roustabouts kept by him on that trip. The clerk who was introduced was not present when the second clerk took the names, but testified that the latter tried to get them all. He also stated that some times these roustabouts took different names. This proof failed to show that the record was correctly kept, and it should not have been admitted. On the contrary, it tended strongly to show that though the second clerk tried to get all the names, he might not have done so. There is another objection to this evidence. Books of this kind are usually admitted only as affirmative evidence, and not to establish a negative proposition. Thus it has been held that the time book of the employer kept in tabular form, in which the days the hands worked were set down, was not admissible in evidence to show that the plaintiff did not work on certain days. (Lawhorn v. Carter, 74 Ky., 7; Morse v. Potter, 4 Gray, 292; Mattocks v. Lyman, 46 Am Dec., 133.)

At the conclusion of the evidence the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the law made it the duty of the defendant and of its agents and servants, charged by it with the care and supervision of its steamboat, to observe ordinary care, to have and maintain the decks and hatchways thereof upon and around which plaintiff was working, when injured, in a condition reasonably safe for the use of the plaintiff and the defendant's other employes in the discharge of their duties, and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the defendant, or any of its said agents, failed to observe such care, and that by reason of such failure upon their part plaintiff received the injury by him alleged, then the jury should find for the plaintiff, unless they shall believe from the evidence; that plaintiff by negligence on his part, if any, so far contributed to his injury that but for it he would not have been injured."

The court refused to so instruct the jury, and in lieu of the instruction asked instructed the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that unless they believe from the evidence that the accident causing the injuries complained of to this plaintiff was due to or caused by the negligence of the defendant company, or its agents or officers superior in authority to the plaintiff, the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find. If the jury believe from the evidence that the accident was caused by the negligence of fellow servants of plaintiff, that is, by servants or employes of the defendant company on the same level of employment with the plaintiff, or not superior in authority or rank to him, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find.

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the injuries to the plaintiff were caused by the negligence of employes or servants or agents of the defendant company superior in authority, grade or rank, as servants to the plaintiff, the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should so find, unless the jury shall also believe from the evidence that the plaintiff himself was also guilty of negligence which contributed to the causing of said accident, and but for which negligence on his part, if any such there was, the accident would not have occurred, in which latter event the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find."

This was error. There was no question of fellow servants in the case. A master employing a servant impliedly engages with him that the place in which he is to work shall be reasonably safe, and he must exercise ordinary care to keep it safe. The servant has a right to look to the master for the discharge of this duty, and it is immaterial to whom the master may entrust the discharge of the duty which the law imposes upon him. He can not delegate it to a servant so as to exempt himself from liability for injuries caused to another servant by its omission, but is responsible to the servant who is injured from a want of proper care in the person to whom the duty is delegated without regard to the rank or title of the agent entrusted with its performance. (Union Pacific Co. v. Snyder, 152 U. S., 689; Northern Pacific Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S., 642; Huff v. Railroad Co., 100 U. S., 213; Flike v. Railroad Co., 53 N. Y., 549; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 204.)

There was testimony that a man named Joseph Mack was entrusted with the business of looking after the opening and closing of the hatches, and the jury may have concluded that the negligence, if any, in leaving the hatch open was his, and that he was not a servant of the company superior in authority to the plaintiff. The mate was shown to be at the other end of the boat, and no other officer was about the hatch, so the form of the instruction was misleading and prejudicial to the plaintiff.

As the case must be tried again, we will not discuss the facts. We see no other error in the rulings of the court, but for the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a new trial.

THOME, &c. v. ALLEN.

(Filed January 13, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Albert Brandles and Lieber & Lincoln for appellants.

Jas. T. S. Baker and John Roberts for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In the opinion delivered in this case it was erroneously assumed that the $3,000 of securities held by the trust company were turned over to the assignee of Clark Thome, when in fact they were delivered to Clark Thome in person before his assignment to Lincoln. It follows that so much of the opinion as directed that the assignee pay into court sufficient funds from the trust estate to pay off the indebtedness due Mrs. Allen was error, and the opinion is modified in this respect. Appellee is entitled to a personal judgment against Clark Thome and to file her claim against the trust funds in the hands of the assignee like any other creditor. If any of the securities surrendered to Clark Thome by the trust company came to the hands of the assignee and can be identified, appellee is entitled to have them first appropriated to her judgment.

RELIANCE TEXTILE AND DYE WORKS v. MITCHELL.

1. Appeals—New trial—This action was instituted by appellee to recover damages from appellant for personal injuries received by her from hot water thrown on her from a pipe onto a lot where she and some other children were playing, inflicting painful and permanent injuries. The first trial resulted in a verdict for appellee for $100, which was set aside on motion of appellee. The second trial resulted in a verdict for $2,000 in favor of appellee. This verdict was set aside on motion of appellant and a new trial granted. The third trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for $1,500. On this appeal it is insisted that the lower court erred in setting aside the verdict for $100, and granting a new trial. Held—That this court is less inclined to disturb the action of the lower court in granting a new trial than in refusing one, and the lower court did not abuse its discretion in granting either of the new trials.

2. Measure of damages—On the first trial the court directed the jury to find for her such a sum in money as will be an adequate and fair compensation for her suffering of body and mind, resulting directly from said injury. Held—That this was erroneous. The plaintiff was not only entitled to compensation for her physical and mental suffering, but also compensation for the distorted and weakened condition in which she was left, by the injury reducing her power to earn money.

3. Contributory negligence—The child was too young to be charged with contributory negligence.

J. W. Bryan for appellant.

F. J. Hanlon and B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, Myrtle Mitchell, a little girl four years old, was badly burned by hot water thrown from a pipe leading out from appellant's factory to an adjoining lot where she and some other children were playing, and were accustomed to play. Her injury was a serious one, resulting in deformity, which will be permanent. The skin was entirely taken off, leaving the muscles bare, and she suffered intensely. She required considerable medical treatment, and it was some time before she recovered. It was charged that her injury was due to negligence of appellant. This was denied by it. On the first trial of the case the jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $100. On her motion the court granted a new trial. At the next trial the jury again found for her, and assessed the damages at $2,000. On motion of appellant the court set aside this verdict, and again granted a new trial. At the third trial of the case the jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $1,500. The court refused to disturb this verdict. Bills of exception were filed, giving the proceedings at all of the trials. It is urged for appellant that the court erred in setting aside the first verdict for $100. This is the first and most important question to be determined on the appeal.

This court is less inclined to disturb the action of the circuit judge in granting a new trial than in refusing one, for the reason that the new trial simply gives the parties another hearing without finally settling their rights, and there are many things within the knowledge of the judge who presides at the trial which he may have reason to believe prevented a fair trial, although nothing of it may appear from the bill of exceptions. The law has wisely vested in the circuit judge a judicial discretion on this subject, and on the whole case we are not inclined to disturb the action of the circuit judge in granting either of the new trials referred to.

In defining the measure of damages to be awarded the plaintiff the court directed the jury on the first trial to find for her "such a sum in money as will be an adequate and fair compensation for her suffering of body and mind, resulting directly from said injury." This was erroneous, and may have produced the small verdict rendered by the jury. The plaintiff was not only entitled to compensation for her physical and mental suffering, but also compensation for the distorted and weakened condition in which she was left by the injury, reducing her power to earn money. In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 758, the rule is thus stated: "In an action for negligent injury to the person of the plaintiff he may recover the expense of his cure, the value of the time lost by him during his disabilities and a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, as well as for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money." (To the same effect see 8 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 2d edition, 643, 651.)

As the measure of damages was not properly given to the jury, and the verdict was so disproportionately small in comparison with the injury as to show that they manifestly misunderstood the true measure of damages, the court did not err in setting the verdict aside and granting a new trial.

We see no error to the prejudice of the appellant on the third trial of the case. The child was too small to be charged with contributory negligence (South Covington, &c., R. R. Co. v. Herrklotz, 104 Ky., 400); and in fact there is nothing in the evidence showing any want of proper care on her part. The instructions asked by appellant were in substance given in the instructions of the court. On the whole record we see nothing to the prejudice of the substantial rights of appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

BOREING v. BOREING.

Divorce and alimony—Residence—Attorneys' fees—Appellant and appellee were married in 1889 and lived together as man and wife until 1893, when appellant left her husband's home and supported herself by teaching school and doing clerical work in different States of the Union, and in 1901 returned to this State and instituted an action for divorce on the ground of five years' separation; also for maintenance, alimony and her attorneys' fees. The lower court gave her judgment for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony and attorneys' fees, but denied her claim for alimony, from which she has appealed. It is insisted that she could not maintain the action, as she was not a resident of the State, and, besides, she was entitled to no alimony. Held—That the residence of the husband being in this State, it will be presumed that her residence was here; besides, the proof shows she was absent from the State temporarily while earning means for her support, as she was possessed of no property. The evidence shows that while he was never guilty of physical violence towards the appellant, he treated her constantly with cold indifference and neglect; that he was habitually rude to her lady visitors, and that his conduct greatly humiliated and depressed her. While he never stinted her in money matters, nor did she ever lack, by reason of his fault, anything to make her physically comfortable, his conduct towards her was so rude, cold and negligent as to make it apparent that she had lost his love and affection. A woman as gentle, faithful and loyal, as the record shows appellant to have been, is entitled to something more from her husband than food, raiment and shelter, and that to such a woman, living as the wife of appellee, under the conditions shown by the record, was intolerable, and appellant had the right to leave the fireside of appellee, when she found that she had lost his love and realized that she was his wife in name only. Considering the estate of appellee, the social standing of both himself and his wife, his ample fortune and his general financial ability, there should be awarded the wife such an amount as will, if invested with reasonable prudence, produce an income sufficient to support her comfortably, and which will not be disproportionate to appellee's fortune. The record does not show with sufficient clearness the wealth of appellee, and upon return to the court below the case should be referred to a commissioner, who should hear evidence and report to the court a lump sum to be allowed appellant as alimony. Appellant should be allowed as attorneys' fees $750 additional, $500 for their services in this court and $250 for their services in the court below.

W. S. Pryor and W. R. Ramsey for appellant.

T. L. Edelen, Chas. R. Brock, Tinsley & Faulkner and Hazelwood & Parker for appellee.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellee, Vincent Boreing, and the appellant, Sarah R. Boreing, were married in Laurel county, Kentucky, in 1889, and lived together as man and wife until 1893, when appellant left appellee's home, and has lived separate and apart from him, without cohabitation, ever since.

After leaving appellee, appellant departed from the State of Kentucky, and spent the greater part of the time, intervening between said date and the time when this action was instituted, in various parts of the United States, teaching school and doing clerical work in order to support herself. She finally returned to this State, and on the 23d day of February, 1901, instituted this action against her husband, praying for a divorce from the bonds of wedlock with him, upon the ground of their having lived separate and apart, without cohabitation, for five consecutive years next before the institution of the action. She further alleges in her petition, among other things, that she was without any estate or income; was out of employment or means of support, and that the appellee, her husband, was the owner of a large estate, from which he derived, together with his avocations, a large annual income, and she prays for alimony, maintenance and costs, including reasonable counsel fees. Upon the trial of the case below, the chancellor divorced appellant from appellee a vinculo matrimonii, but refused to award her either maintenance or alimony, from which latter part of the decree she is in this court on appeal.

We think the allegations of the petition are sufficient to warrant both the claims for divorce and alimony; but if there be any weight to the contention that it was necessary, in order to maintain her claim for alimony, that she should have alleged that the separation was without her fault, it is clear that appellee's specific allegation in his answer, that the separation was without his fault, cured such defect.

We do not think that appellant lost her residence in Kentucky by the fact that, in order to maintain herself, she left the State; she was still the wife of appellee, and his residence was her residence, and continued to be so during all of the time that she was absent. The separation commenced in Kentucky, and if it be necessary, in order to obtain a divorce on the grounds relied upon in this action, that her home should have been in Kentucky during the five years specified, we think that the facts in this case show that appellant had the necessary residence here. The appellant was not competent to testify in this case, and the exception to her deposition was properly sustained.

The record shows a lamentable state of affairs existing between the parties hereto. They are both people of high standing, culture and social position, and it is a matter of deep regret that their marital life should have been so unfortunately disrupted.

Appellant is shown, by all of the evidence in this case, to be a woman of the highest education and refinement, deeply religious in her life, gentle in her manners, and considerate of all with whom she came in contact; when she went to the home of appellee, as his wife, she seemed to have been a happy, bright and cheerful woman; she took up her household duties at once, and discharged them, during the time that she remained in the house of appellee, faithfully and well. All of the witnesses agree upon this, whether they have deposed for her or for her husband. The household work cast upon her was hard and onerous, and she often performed domestic labor which must have severely taxed both her strength and patience, but this record fails to show that she, at any time, complained of, or repined at, the hardness of her lot.

We are not disposed to impute any blame to appellee for this state of affairs; it may have been (and he is entitled to the presumption in the absence of evidence on that point) that there was great difficulty in obtaining household help in London, and that it was the result of his inability to obtain domestic servants that his wife had to perform the severe duties of which the witnesses speak. Perhaps we could not better illustrate her self-sacrificing fidelity to her husband's interest than by relating that the evidence shows that upon one occasion where there was a political convention being held in London, before which her husband was a candidate for nomination, his wife left the side of her dead mother, where she was watching, in order to superintend and assist in preparing dinner at his home for the entertainment of his political friends. It does not appear that this was done at the request of appellee, and we freely acquit him of any insistence that she should perform this work under these sad circumstances; but the fact does show how loyal she was to him, and how far she would sink her own sorrow in order to further his interest.

The appellee is shown, by the evidence in this case, to be a man of a high order of intellect; that he possesses great energy and financial ability, and that during all of the time that he and appellant lived together he was an exceedingly busy man. He had very large interests in various enterprises; he was a speculator in timber and coal lands in Eastern Kentucky; was president of a bank; director and large stockholder in coke and coal mining companies and other large corporations, and was absent from home a large part of his time. The evidence shows that, while he was never guilty of physical violence towards the appellant, he treated her, constantly, with cold indifference and neglect; that he was habitually rude to her lady visitors, and that his conduct greatly humiliated and depressed her. Appellee would leave home and be gone for several weeks at a time, without having informed his wife of his proposed departure, and upon his return, after such prolonged absence, would greet her with as little warmth of affection as if he had returned from an absence of a few hours only.

We do not believe that appellee ever stinted appellant in money matters, or that she ever lacked, by reason of his fault, anything to make her physically comfortable; but we do believe that his conduct towards her was so rude, cold and negligent as to make it apparent that she had lost his love and affection. A woman, as gentle, faithful and loyal as this record shows appellant to have been, is entitled to something more from her husband than food, raiment and shelter, and that to such a woman, living, as the wife of appellee, under the conditions shown by this record, was intolerable. This court is of opinion that appellant had the right to leave the fireside of appellee, when she found that she had lost his love, and realized that she was his wife in name only.

The evidence in this case shows that appellee himself realized that he had not treated the appellant properly, as he confessed to one of his own witnesses; it shows that appellant is destitute and without any means of support, and we believe that she is entitled to a reasonable alimony. It is not necessary, in order to reach this conclusion, to hold that where the wife is destitute she is entitled to alimony without regard to whether or not the separation was the result of her fault, where the judgment of divorce is based on the five years' statute, although this court, in the case of Newsome v. Newsome, 95 Ky., 383, so held. In that case it is said: "But either may sue for and obtain a divorce by simply alleging and proving the fact they have lived apart, without any cohabitation, for five consecutive years, no judicial investigation respecting cause of separation, nor inquiry as to who is in fault, in meaning of the statute, being required in order to determine the right to divorce. It, therefore, seems to us, giving the statute a reasonable construction, the husband is required, in a case like this, to pay costs of each party without inquiring whether the wife is in fault. And as it is well settled an allowance for services of the wife's attorney, when legally authorized, may be taxed as costs, and no complaint is or could be fairly made that the amount is excessive, it was not error to make it. It seems to us equally manifest that provision of the statute denying alimony to the wife, except 'on a divorce obtained by her,' was intended to apply in that class of cases where a divorce obtained by the husband involves fault of the wife, not in cases like this, where, as either may maintain the action, it is not a material or legitimate inquiry, in determining the right, who is in fault."

It seems to us that the case at bar can not be distinguished from the case of Irwin v. Irwin, 96 Ky. Reps., 318, where this court, in speaking of the conduct of the husband toward the wife as constituting the basis of her right to a separation from him, say: "There never was any act of violence committed by the husband upon the wife, nor any threats of violence made, but such cruelty may be inflicted upon the wife by exhibitions of want of affection and a disregard of the marital relations as in the results or effect on the wife would exceed in punishment any blow that might be inflicted upon her person. * * * The coldness and indifference on the part of the appellee toward his wife for several years was such as to render her life almost intolerable. And while his conduct can not be said to be inhuman, it bordered on a degree of cruelty that must have tended to destroy her peace of mind, and render her an unhappy woman."

Upon the principle thus announced this court affirmed a judgment divorcing the parties a mensa et thoro, and awarding the wife maintenance. Under this judgment the parties lived separate and apart for five years, when, without new provocation upon the part of the husband, they were divorced a vinculo matrimonii, and alimony awarded the wife. (20 Ky. Law Rep., 1761.)

The court in the case cited ratified and approved the wife's leaving her husband for the precise character of mistreatment of which appellant is complaining, and we think her claim is as meritorious as that of the wife in the Irwin case.

We are not impressed with the offer of reconciliation made by appellee.

The circumstances and details of this transaction stamp it as an act of strategic diplomacy rather than a proposition of reconciliation flowing from a loving and contrite heart. In regard to the amount of the alimony to be allowed, we think that, considering the estate of appellee, the social standing of both himself and wife, his ample fortune, and his general financial ability, there should be awarded the wife an allowance of such an amount as will, if invested with reasonable prudence, produce an income sufficient to support her comfortably, and which will not be disproportionate to appellee's fortune; the record does not show with sufficient clearness the wealth of appellee, and upon return to the court below the case should be referred to a commissioner, who should hear evidence and report to the court a lump sum to be allowed appellant as alimony, having reference to the principle in regard thereto herein enunciated.

We think the counsel for appellant should be allowed the sum of $750 additional for their services $500 for their services in this court and $250 for their services in the court below, to be taxed as costs.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WADE v. FOSTER.

(Filed January 13, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Assignment for benefit of creditors—Agency—Bills and notes—Fraud—The Fulton Bank made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors to T. Afterwards A. and B., the uncle and brother of the cashier, agreed to take the assets of the bank and assume its liabilities. A. was substituted as assignee, and took charge of the affairs of the bank. W. Bros. were largely indebted to the bank, and a compromise was made with the assignee, by which a large amount of property was transferred to the assignee. N. held a note against W. Bros. for $8,700, on which R. was bound as surety. He held a mortgage on a part of the property which had been transferred to the assignee, to indemnify him as surety. About $5,000 of this note had been paid. In order to induce R. to surrender his mortgage lien the assignee agreed to pay the remainder due on the note. Instead of paying off this note the assignee induced N. to assign it to B. without recourse, who paid the amount due on same. B. assigned this note to appellee, who instituted suit on it. Appellee, under our statute, took the note subject to all the defenses which were available against it in the hands of B. Held—That under the arrangement with the Fulton Bank A. and B. became partners in administering the affairs of the bank and assuming its liabilities, at least B. became chargeable with constructive notice of all acts done by his associate as his agent, and that to permit A., as assignee, to take charge of the property covered by the lien of the surety on the promise to pay the debt, and instead of doing so to transfer it to B., would be to sanction the commission of a fraud. Appellee occupying no better position than his assignor, can not enforce the collection of the note.

Robbins & Thomas and J. W. Cutrer for appellant.

O. S. Tenney and H. C. McKee for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On September 27, 1890, the Fulton Bank made a deed of assignment to R. T. Tyler. A. T. Mitchell was the cashier of the bank, and on October 18, 1890, William Mitchell, an uncle of his, and R. A. Mitchell, another nephew, made a written contract with the stockholders of the bank, by which they assumed all the liabilities of the transferring stockholders and assumed their position, the Mitchells to have the assets of the bank and settle with the creditors. Pursuant to this arrangement, which was signed by substantially all the stockholders, as well as by William and R. A. Mitchell, they were placed in possession of the bank's assets, Tyler resigned and R. A. Mitchell was appointed as assignee. Appellees, the Wade Bros., under various firm names, were creditors of the bank for something like $8,000, and owed it something like $18,000. They were doing business in Mississippi, and Mitchell filed suit as assignee against them in the circuit court of Coahoma county, Mississippi, and took out various attachments. A compromise was made, which was reduced to writing, by which Wade Bros. conveyed to Mitchell as assignee a large amount of property owned by them in Mississippi.

By the terms of this conveyance it was stipulated that Mitchell, as assignee, was to pay off to the Continental National Bank a note due by Wade Bros. on which J. M. Reid was surety, which was originally given for $3,700, but on which something over $5,000 had been paid. To secure Reid as surety on this note a deed of trust had been executed to him by Wade Bros. on a part of the property conveyed to Mitchell sufficient in value to protect him from loss. He refused to surrender this, unless Mitchell assumed and agreed to pay the debt, and so in the compromise the above stipulation was put in the deed; which was duly recorded. Mitchell, as assignee, took possession of the property conveyed to him and then, instead of paying off the note to the Continental Bank as he had agreed to do, procured the bank to assign the note to William Mitchell without recourse, and William Mitchell paid to the bank the balance due on the note. Subsequently William Mitchell assigned the note to appellee, Robert M. Foster, who filed this suit upon it and recovered judgment in the circuit court.

It is insisted for the appellee that the assumption of the debt by R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, did not bind William Mitchell, and that, notwithstanding this, he was at liberty to buy the note from the bank and recover on it against both Wade Bros. and Reid. Foster, as the assignee of William Mitchell, took the note under our statute subject to all the defenses which were available against it in the hands of the assignor. So the only question in the case is, could William Mitchell have maintained the action had he remained the owner of the note?

By the contract made by William and R. A. Mitchell with the stockholders of the Fulton Bank they took the place of the stockholders, becoming liable to the creditors for the payment of their debts, and being entitled to all the surplus assets of the bank after the debts were paid. In this venture William and R. A. Mitchell were partners. R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, represented both himself and his partner, William Mitchell, in the compromise made with Wade Bros. By the terms of this compromise he obtained for the benefit of him and partner the possession of and title to a large amount of valuable property, which had been pledged for the payment of the note in controversy, and the mortgage executed to secure Reid as surety was released upon the express stipulation that he would pay this note. He held this property as assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the bank, and also for the benefit of himself and his partner, William Mitchell, who in substance were the owners of the assets of the bank, subject to the payment of the debts, and were by the terms of their contract personally liable for the debts if the assets were insufficient to pay them. William Mitchell, therefore, by the compromise, obtained from Wade Bros. a large amount of property, which was held by his partner, R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, for the purpose of discharging the debts, for which he was personally liable. He could not take the benefit of this contract without its burdens. He can not be permitted to apply the property to the discharge of the debts which he owed to the creditors of the Fulton Bank, and at the same time repudiate the terms on which the property was conveyed. He took the benefit of the conveyance. It must be presumed that he had knowledge of its terms, for he was charged with constructive notice of it. He has never repudiated the contract or offered to return the property. On the contrary, he has allowed it to be converted and applied in the liquidation of the debts of the bank. To permit him to keep the benefit of the property and not pay the note to the Continental Bank would be to sanction fraud and sharp practice. R. A. Mitchell, his partner, made the compromise and obtained the property upon the agreement that he would pay this debt. The same R. A. Mitchell, his partner, as his agent, made the arrangement for the note to be transferred by the Continental National Bank to him upon his paying to the bank the balance due on it. In both transactions he was represented by the same agent, R. A. Mitchell, and in equity must be held to have paid the money to the bank in discharge of the note according to the stipulations of the deed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

WADE, &c. v. BENT.

(Filed January 18, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Assignment for benefit of creditors—Agency—Fraudulent conveyances— The Fulton Bank made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors to T. Afterwards A. and B., the uncle and brother of the cashier, agreed to take the assets of the bank and assume its liabilities. A. was substituted as assignee, and took charge of the affairs of the bank. W. Bros. were largely indebted to the bank, and a compromise was made with the assignee, by which a large amount of real estate in Mississippi was transferred to the assignee. A part of the property thus conveyed to the assignee was a tract of land of about 1,400 acres, known as the Little Cypress World, worth about $14,000, on which was a lien for $7,400, of purchase money due a railroad company. As a part consideration of the transfer it was agreed that the assignee should pay off this lien debt. Instead of doing this, the assignee agreed with the railroad company that, without any judicial proceeding, it would advertise and sell the land and buy it for $2,316.22. This was done without any notice to W. Bros., and its bid assigned to B., and he paid the balance of the purchase money.

amounting to $6,100, and took an assignment of the notes for same. After getting the notes in this way B. assigned them to his daughter, the appellee, who instituted this action to recover the amount thereof. Held—That under the arrangement with the Fulton Bank A. and B. became partners in administering the affairs of the bank and assuming its liabilities, at least B. was chargeable with notice of the trust, and his daughter, as assignee of the notes, occupies no better position than her father. While the deed does not state the agreement to pay the debt of the railroad company, it is proven by parol. The proof shows that A., the assignee, participated in a fraudulent arrangement with the railroad company, by which it obtained title to the land and transferred same and the notes to B., who is affected with such fraud, and his daughter, as assignee, can not enforce the collection of the note.

J. W. Cutrer, Robbins & Thomas and John W. Ray for appellants.

H. C. McKee and O. S. Tenney for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

The facts in this case are the same as those in the case of E. B. Wade, &co. v. Robert M. Foster, ante, —, this day decided, with the following exceptions: Among other property conveyed by Wade Bros. to R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, in the compromise therein referred to, was a tract of land of about 1,400 acres, known as the Little Cypress World, and of value about $14,000. There was a lien on this tract for $7,400 of purchase money due to the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Co. In the compromise it was agreed that Mitchell, as assignee, would pay this debt to the railway company, although it was not so stipulated in the deed. Instead of paying the debt to the railway company, R. A. Mitchell procured it to sell the land under the terms of the deed, by the laws of Mississippi, and to buy it in for $2,316.22, and then to assign its bid to William Mitchell, and also to assign to him the notes for the purchase money upon his paying the balance of the notes, $6,100. The sale was made after posting notice for ten days without judicial proceeding and without Wades knowing anything about it. The railway company wanted its money, and R. A. Mitchell arranged with it to pay the debt in this way, and the assignments were made to William Mitchell without recourse. Thus the title to the property, which really belonged to the assets of the Fulton Bank, was put in the name of William Mitchell in violation of the duty of the assignee to the creditors of the bank as well as the contract made by him with the Wade Bros. The railroad company knew the land was worth much more than the debt, and was unwilling to let it go unless its debt was paid. R. A. Mitchell fixed in advance the amount, $2,316.22, at which the land was to be bid in, and agreed that the balance of the debt should be paid on the assignment of the notes.

Although the entire consideration of the deed was not correctly stated in it, the real consideration may be shown by parol evidence, and the proof leaves no sort of doubt that it was a part of the consideration of the deed that R. A. Mitchell would assume and pay this debt to the railroad company.

After getting the notes in this way William Mitchell assigned them to his daughter, Mrs. L. M. Bent, who filed this suit to recover on them.

Mrs. Bent stands in her father's shoes, and he could not be allowed to keep the property and repudiate the terms of the compromise under which it was conveyed to his partner, R. A. Mitchell, who also negotiated the transaction with the railroad company. But aside from all this, and independently of the agreement of R. A. Mitchell to pay this debt, William Mitchell has no standing in equity for the enforcement of this note. By the terms of the deed the land was conveyed to R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, subject to the unpaid purchase money. He had notice of the debt, and took the land subject to the lien. He held the land, first, in trust for the payment of the debt, and this trust he was bound honestly to administer in good faith, for the protection of Wade Bros., the makers of the notes. They had a right to demand of him good faith in dealing with the property. In a similar case the Court of Appeals of New York say: "While, as we have said, no strict and technical relation of principal and surety arose between the mortgagor and his grantee from the conveyance subject to either mortgage, an equity did arise which could not be taken from the mortgagor without his consent, and which bears a very close resemblance to the equitable right of the surety, the terms of whose contract have been modified. We can not accurately denominate the grantee a principal debtor, since he owes no debt and is not personally a debtor at all, and yet since the land is the primary fund for the payment of the debt, and so his property stands specifically liable to the extent of its value in exoneration of the bond, it is not inaccurate to say that as grantee, and in respect to the land and to the extent of its value, he stands in the relation of a principal debtor, and to the same extent the grantor had the equities of a surety." (Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y., 611; Pomeroy's Equity, section 1205; Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va., 392; McClure v. Melton, 18 L. R. A., 723.)

There is no question that the land was worth much more than the amount due upon it, and could have been sold for a surplus after paying the debt. Wade Bros. had a right to demand of R. A. Mitchell, as assignee, when he took the land subject to the lien debt, that he would deal with them fairly, and he can not be permitted in equity to enter into an arrangement with the railroad company by which the land should be bought in by it for a nominal sum, and its bid assigned to William Mitchell and the notes also to be assigned to him upon his paying the amount due the railroad company, for this would be to permit a mere subterfuge to defeat the contract, and William Mitchell can not be allowed to take advantage or profit by the wrong of his partner and representative, R. A. Mitchell. The arrangement made by R. A. Mitchell with the railroad company was not in keeping with that good faith which equity demands of the grantee of a deed for the protection of the grantor under such circumstances, and William Mitchell must be held to have paid and discharged the note to the railroad company, and can not be allowed to set it up against the grantors in the deed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

COMMONWEALTH, USE, &amp;c. v. STONE, &amp;c.

(Filed January 18, 1903.)

Sheriffs—Bonds—Sureties—County levy—The fiscal court of Nicholas county made a levy for county purposes in 1897 of 59 cents, 9 cents in excess of the constitutional limit, and the sheriff having collected $3,200 under this void levy, this action was instituted against the sureties of the sheriff on his general official bond executed under section 5556, Kentucky Statutes, to recover same. Held—That while the liability of the sheriff for said amount is unquestioned, his sureties are not bound for such illegal levy as their liability is measured by the terms of the bond.

Winfield Buckler and J. H. Minogue for appellants.

Chas. M. Wood and John I. Williamson for appellees.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The fiscal court of Nicholas county in 1897 levied a tax of 59 cents on the $100 for county purposes, 9 cents in excess of the constitutional limit; and the sheriff of the county, S. A. Ratoliff, collected about $3,200 under this void levy, and this suit was instituted against the sureties upon his general official bond to recover the amount so collected. The only difference between this case and the case of Whaley, &c. v. Commonwealth, &c., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1292, is that that suit was on the revenue bond required by section 4133 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads: "We, A. B., sheriff, and C. D. and E. F., his sureties, bind and obligate ourselves, jointly and severally, to the Commonwealth of Kentucky that said A. B., sheriff, shall faithfully perform his duties."

Whilst this is upon what is generally termed the sheriff's general official bond, required by section 5556 of the Kentucky Statutes, and reads as follows: "We, A. B., the principal, and C. D. and E. F., sureties, hereby covenant to and with the Commonwealth of Kentucky that said A. B., of ——— county, shall, by himself and deputies, well and truly discharge all the duties of said office, and pay over to such persons at such times as they may be respectively entitled thereto, all money that may come into his or their hands as sheriff."

In both cases the plaintiff sought to recover of the sureties the same fund and upon the same grounds, and to support their contention substantially the same argument is made and the same authorities relied on in this case as in that. The case is not entirely free from difficulty as respectable authorities have been found to support appellant's contention, but we conclude in the Whaley case that the best line of reasoning and the preponderance of the authorities supported the conclusion there reached. As the opinion in that case contains a full statement of the facts and reasons for our conclusion, and the court has determined to stand by the opinion delivered in that case, it is unnecessary to repeat them in detail in this proceeding.

The responsibility of the sureties must be measured by the terms of the bond as made out on strict construction. In Osenton's Adm'x v. Burnett, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 610, it was held that where a county court had levied a tax to satisfy a judgment against the county and appointed a collector to collect it, and required a bond therefor with sureties, that the sureties were not liable for the excess of money collected beyond the satisfaction of the debt named in the order requiring the bond. The court said: "The liability of the securities in an official bond is measured by its terms. The reasonable and fair construction of the terms of this bond is to confine the liability of the sureties to the work required of Burnett in collecting sufficient funds to pay the judgment and cost of proceeding. If the collector in fact collected more than was sufficient for that purpose, or might have done so with reasonable effort, he may be liable to the county, but not so the securities."

There is no question about the liability of the sheriff for the funds collected by him, but the question now to be determined is as the liability of the sureties; and whether there is such a difference in the covenant of the two bonds quoted supra as would make the sureties liable for the illegal act of the principal in the one case and not in the other.

It was held in Howard v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1411; Pulaski County v. Watson, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 61; Catron v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 650, and Adair v. Hancock Deposit Bank, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 934, that where a sheriff executed the bond required by section 4133, that the sureties thereon were liable not only for the State revenue, but also for the county levy; that all these bonds were intended to cover substantially the same liabilities and were cumulative in character, and so far as we are able to discover, the obligation of the sureties in each of them is substantially the same. As said in Whaley v. Commonwealth, "they covenant that their principal shall perform every act which the law required of him as such official to perform; and that if he fails to do that which he is required by law to do in the discharge of his official duty, they will answer for such default. But no act prohibited by the Constitution can ever become a duty."

We, therefore, conclude that the sheriff's liability for the funds sued for is not covered by the undertaking of his sureties in the bond sued on in this proceeding, and no recovery can be had; and that the chancellor properly sustained the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF ASHLAND v. FERGUSON.

Contracts—Notaries — Estoppel — Corporations—Appellee was individual bookkeeper for appellant at a salary of $50 a month for several years previous to July 18, 1893. He was also a notary public, and received the fees for making protests. On that day the bank reduced the salaries of its officers, and by resolution it was provided that the salary of the individual bookkeeper be fixed at the rate of $600 per annum, and he shall make all protests free. On the next day appellee had a conversation with the president, and told the president: "Whatever you say in the directors goes, and if you say that you will see that I get this I will go to work?" The president said: "That is all right, you were not asking too much, anyhow." The board took no further action in the matter. Appellee drew his salary of $50 monthly, making no charge for notarial fees and no demand of the money.

He left the service of the bank in February, 1896, and afterwards brought this suit against it to recover $754.50, the amount of his notarial fees between July 18, 1893, and the time he left the bank. A judgment was rendered in favor of appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted, insisting that the president had no authority to make the agreement, while appellee rests his right to recover on the ground that a contract by a public officer to receive less for his official services than the charges authorized by law or to discharge his duties gratuitously is contrary to public policy, and void. Held—That appellee had the right to accept a lumping sum, covering both his official fees and his personal services, without contravening public policy, when the sum so accepted is greater than the fees, and the arrangement is fair and fully understood. The claim for fees having been satisfied by the monthly payment of $50, can not now be sued upon. He who accepts the money of another knowing that it is paid in satisfaction of a claim, will be estopped, after thus remaining in the employment, to demand greater pay for his services.

Hager & Stewart for appellant.

P. K. Mallin for appellee.

Appeal from Boyd Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

For several years previous to July 18, 1893, appellee was individual bookkeeper for appellant at a salary of $50 a month. He was also a notary public, and received the fees for making protests. On that day the bank reduced the salary of all its officers, and by a resolution of the directors it was provided that "the salary of the individual bookkeeper be fixed at the rate of $600 per annum, and he shall make all protests free of charge." Immediately after the adjournment of the board he was notified of its action and went to see them. All of the directors but two had left. These told him in substance that this was the best they could do, and that if he did not want the place at that, they could get some one else for less. He then left, and the next morning early came down to the bank and told the president that he had had a talk with his father, who was also one of the directors, and had a proposition to make to him; that he would come back and work for the salary of $50 a month, provided the bank would give him $10 a month for notarial fees. The president said: "You know I can't do anything of that kind; you will have to see the directors about it." Appellant replied: "Whatever you say in the directors goes, and if you say that you will see that I get this I will go to work." The president said: "That is all right; you were not asking too much, anyhow." At the next meeting of the directors appellee asked the president if he had brought the matter before them, and he said no, he had forgotten it. Nothing more was said about the matter, and appellee drew his salary of $50 monthly, making no charge for notarial fees and no demand of the money. He left the service of the bank in February, 1896, and in September, 1898, filed this suit against it to recover $754.50, the amount of his notarial fees between July 18, 1893, and the time he left the bank. In the circuit court he recovered judgment, and the bank appeals. The above are the facts as shown by appellee's own testimony. There is little controversy in the proof, the only difference being as to the conversation between him and the president the next morning, the president stating that he agreed simply to refer the matter to the directors, but we do not regard this as material. Appellee knew very well that the board of directors were the proper authorities to fix the salaries of the officers of the bank. He knew that they had fixed his salary at $50 a month, including notarial fees, and he also knew that the president of the bank had no authority to make any contract with him not warranted by the action of the board of directors. He does not, therefore, sue for the $10 a month, or base any claim upon what took place between him and the president of the bank. His counsel rests his right to recover on the ground that a contract by a public officer to receive less for his official services than the charges authorized by law, or to discharge his duties gratuitously, is contrary to public policy, and void, and, therefore, appellee is entitled to recover the legal fees for his services as notary public.

When appellee remained in the bank after the board of directors had, by resolution, fixed his salary and received month after month from it the amount of salary thus fixed by the board, without demanding more or asserting any claim for other compensation for his services, he must be conclusively held to have rendered the services on the terms proposed by the board, and to have accepted those terms. When at the end of each month the $50 was paid to him it was paid not only in satisfaction of his services as bookkeeper, but also in satisfaction of his services as notary public. His fees as notary public were then earned, and he knew the amount of them. The agreement before hand to commute his fees as notary public, or to assign them to the bank, was not binding on him (Ohio National Bank v. Hopkins, 8 App. Cas., D. C., 146), but when after the services had been rendered and the fees earned, he accepted a gross sum in satisfaction of his fees and as compensation for his work as bookkeeper, a different question is presented, for he had a right to assign to the bank or to anybody else his fees for services already rendered. (Field v. Chipley, 79 Ky., 260.) The case of Holt v. Thurman, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 82, was the case of the assignment of unearned fees or salary. If at the end of any month he had refused to accept the $50, and had demanded his fees on the ground that his legal fees as notary public were more than $50, the contract referred to would have been no bar to a recovery of these fees, for the reason that a contract in advance by a public officer to take less than the legal fees for his services can not be enforced. (15 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 965, 2d edition.) But when he accepted the $50 each month in full of his services as bookkeeper and also of his fees as notary, he can no more maintain an action for his fees as notary than for his services as bookkeeper, for one has been paid just as truly as the other. The $50 a month was not paid him alone for his services as bookkeeper. It was paid him in satisfaction not only of these services, but also of his services as notary public, and was accepted by him as such, for he made no demand of anything more until after he left the service of the bank; and before July 18, 1893, his notarial fees were paid along as the work was done, and when after this, they were not paid in this way, he was bound to know that the $50 was paid in satisfaction of these fees as well as his salary as bookkeeper. The court can not inquire what part of the $50 was paid on one account or the other, for in this we have nothing to guide us. We can not say the $50 was paid for appellee's services as bookkeeper, for that is not the fact. The acceptance of a lumping sum, covering both his official fees and his personal services, contravenes no public policy, when the sum so accepted is greater than the fees, and the arrangement is fair and fully understood.

The claim for fees having been satisfied by the monthly payments of $50, can not now be sued upon. He who accepts monthly for his services the money of another, knowing that it is paid in satisfaction thereof, will be estopped, after thus remaining in the employment, to demand greater pay for his services. (Lexington v. Rennick 105 Ky, 779.) The facts of this case illustrate the justice of this rule, for the bank, acting on the idea that it did not have to pay these notarial fees, failed to collect something like three-fourths of them from its customers, and if appellee is now allowed to recover, a loss will be thrown upon it without remedy. On the undisputed facts shown by the evidence the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HOWARD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 18, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Criminal law—Malicious shooting and wounding—Evidence—Malice—On the trial of an indictment for malicious shooting and wounding, where the proof shows that the accused shot the witness in a crap game, no direct evidence of malice was required as the jury was authorized to infer malice from the circumstances proven.

2. Appeals—Evidence—The Court of Appeals will not reverse a criminal case for want of sufficient evidence if there is any evidence tending to establish the guilt of the accused.

3. Instructions—An instruction under section 1242, Kentucky Statutes, for shooting and wounding in sudden heat and passion which omitted the word "previous" before "malice" was not prejudicial to appellant.

W. T. Burch for appellant.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Criminal division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant was indicted for malicious shooting at and wounding George Boone with intent to kill him. The jury found him guilty and fixed his punishment at four year's confinement in the penitentiary.

A reversal is sought because, first, the verdict is not sustained by the evidence; second, the court gave instruction No. 2; third, misconduct of the Commonwealth's attorney on the trial of the case.

This court has frequently held that it will not reverse a case for want of sufficient evidence, if there is any evidence tending to establish the guilt of the accused. The injured party testified that he and the appellant at a crap game had a dispute over a small piece of money; he arose from the game and while putting the money in his pocket the appellant shot and wounded him. This evidence, certainly most strongly tended to establish the appellant's guilt. The jury heard the evidence introduced by the appellant, and it was the judge of the weight to be attached to it, as well as that offered by the Commonwealth. It is not the province of this court to determine the question of the weight and credibility of the evidence in a criminal or penal prosecution; it determines alone the question as to whether there is any evidence tending to establish the guilt of the accused.

It is urged that there was no evidence of malice. If the appellant shot Brown under the circumstances detailed by him, the jury was authorized to infer malice. Malice may be inferred by a jury from acts or facts proven in a prosecution for felony as any other fact may be inferred from evidence on the trial of civil cases.

Instruction No. 2 was on the question of shooting and wounding in sudden heat and passion, and is based on section 1242, Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "If any person shall, in a sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice and not in self defense, shoot at, without wounding, or shoot and wound another person, or wound a person other than the person shot at, with a gun or other instrument, loaded with ball or other hard substance, without killing such person, or shall, in like manner, cut, thrust or stab any other person with a knife, dirk, sword or other deadly weapon, without killing such person, he shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500, or confined in the jail not less than six months nor more than one year, or both, in the discretion of a jury."

It is contended that it is erroneous because, first, there was no evidence of malice and none from which it might be inferred; second, that the word "previous" was not used in the instruction.

As to the first objection stated it is sufficient to say that the penalty is only imposed when the shooting and wounding is in sudden heat and passion without previous malice. The Commonwealth is not required to prove malice to have this instruction given to the jury, for it is given on a state of facts from which the jury may infer there was no previous malice.

The court omitted from the instruction the word previous. Malicious shooting and wounding is a felony. Shooting and wounding in sudden heat and passion without previous malice is a misdemeanor under the section quoted. It would have been better for the defense had the court omitted "without malice" as well as the word "previous." If the phrase "without previous malice" is omitted, then the jury could have found the defendant guilty of a misdemeanor, instead of a felony, if it believed the shooting was done in sudden heat and passion, though with previous malice. The defendant was not prejudiced by the omission. It is true the Commonwealth's attorney asked an improper question, but the court refused to allow the witness to answer. This is not a cause for reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

WILSON, &c. v. FLANDERS, &c.

(Filed January 14, 1903.)

Executions—Liens—Pleadings—Appellees, judgment creditors of W., caused executions to be levied on eleven acres of land belonging to him and became the purchasers at sheriff's sale. Within one year after the sale they gave W. notice of motion for writ of possession as required by section 1689 of Kentucky Statutes. Before the writ was awarded W. offered to file an answer alleging that he was owner of the land, and that previous to the levy of the executions had mortgaged same to M. for $3,500, which would not be due for twenty years and that by reason thereof appellees acquired only a lien on said land subject to the prior encumbrance as provided by section 1709, Kentucky Statutes. The lower court refused to allow this answer to be filed and awarded the writ of possession to appellees, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the lower court improperly refused to permit the answer of W. to be filed and erred in awarding a writ of possession as appellees obtained only a lien on the land subject to the prior mortgage, and appellees were not entitled to the writ of possession.

Turner & Hazelrigg for appellants.

G. E. Coons and C. W. Goodpaster for appellees.

Appeal from Bath Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellees, W. B. Flanders and others, judgment creditors of the appellant, Johnson Wilson, caused executions to be levied on eleven acres of land in Bath county of which he was the owner. On April 10, 1899, it was sold by the sheriff, and appellees became the purchaser.

After procuring of the sheriff a deed of conveyance to the land, appellees gave appellants written notice, as provided in section 1689, Kentucky Statutes, that they would on February 23, 1900, enter motion in the Bath Circuit Court for judgment for the possession thereof, which motion appears to have been duly made on the day named in the notice. The executions and sheriff's deed do not appear in the record, but as the motion for possession was made before the end of the year succeeding the execution sale, it may be inferred that the land brought two thirds of its appraised value. By the petition of Johnson Wilson's wife, which was taken as her answer, and filed on the day the motion was entered, she was made a party to the proceedings and claimed to own the land, but a demurrer was filed to the answer at the following term, and properly sustained, as the facts therein alleged failed to show title in her. During the latter term, and before the demurrer to Mrs. Wilson's answer was sustained, appellant, Johnson Wilson, offered to file an answer, and later an amended answer to appellee's motion, in which he set up title in himself to the land, and the existence of a mortgage thereon to one James McCue to secure a $3,500 note held by him. The court refused to permit either the answer or amendment to be filed, but forthwith rendered judgment giving appellees possession of the land, and requiring appellants to pay the costs. From that judgment appellants prosecute this appeal.

While much is alleged in the answer and amendment by way of conclusion, they do not present the material facts, first, that a bona fide encumbrance in the mortgage to McCue of $3,500 exists on the land which is of a date antecedent to the levy and sale under appellees' executions; and, second, that the mortgage debt is unpaid. It is true that the answer was not tendered until the term succeeding the motion for the writ of possession was made, but an affidavit filed by his attorney shows that Wilson's age and feebleness (he was then eighty-one or eighty-two years of age) prevented an earlier offer to file it. So we are of the opinion that the lower court erred in refusing to permit the answer and amendment to be filed.

The mortgage to James McCue was executed December 30, 1893, by appellants, Johnson Wilson and Thomas Johnson, and embraced, in addition to the eleven acres in controversy, several parcels of land in Bath and Montgomery counties owned by them jointly, the consideration being a note of $3,500 given for money loaned the mortgagors by the mortgagee, which note, by the terms of the mortgage, can not be "collected by law for twenty years." The genuineness of this mortgage appears to have been established by judgment of the Montgomery Circuit Court, where it was attacked upon the ground of fraud in an action instituted by appellees and others, judgment creditors of appellant, and the judgment of the circuit court was thereafter affirmed by this court. (Johnson v. Johnson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 42.)

As already stated, appellees' notice and motion for the writ of possession were based upon section 1689 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that "the purchaser of land sold under execution and not redeemed as provided for in this article (that is, within a year from the date of sale), shall have the right, after obtaining a conveyance therefor (sheriff's deed), upon ten days' notice in writing to the defendant in the execution whose lands have been so sold, to enter a motion on the docket of the circuit court of the county where the lands are situated for a judgment for the possession of such lands."

It will be observed that the lands referred to in this section are such as are unencumbered by prior liens when sold under execution, for if encumbered, the purchaser at the execution sale will not be entitled to the possession, but acquires by his purchase a lien as provided by subsection 1 of section 1709, wherein it is expressly declared that "the purchaser at the sale shall acquire a lien on such property for the purchase money, and interest, at the rate of 10 per centum from the day of sale until paid, subject to the prior encumbrances."

Subsection 3 provides that "the defendant in the execution may redeem the property so sold by paying the original encumbrance with legal interest thereon, and by paying the purchaser his purchase money with 10 per centum per annum interest thereon."

The right of redemption here provided for seems to be extended beyond the time fixed by the statute in sales of unencumbered lands under execution, which is one year, and may be exercised by the defendant at any time during the continuance of the original encumbrance, and the lien in favor of the purchaser under execution. The present statute (section 1709) was re-enacted from the Revised Statutes (volume 1, article 15, section 1), and is in language substantially the same, and this court, in Atkins v. Emison, 10 Bush, 13, in construing that statute, said: "It has been repeatedly held by this court that since the adoption of the Revised Statutes, the purchaser at the sale of real or personal estate upon which there was a bona fide encumbrance by mortgage, etc., acquired only a lien on the property for the purchase money paid by him and 10 per cent. interest, subject to the prior encumbrance. This is in fact the language of the act itself. The defendants in the execution having failed to redeem the land, the only remedy left the appellant (purchaser) for the collection of his money was in resorting to a court of equity to enforce his lien, and in doing so it was incumbent on him to make all the parties interested defendants to the action. * * *

"The legislature never intended by the act in question to deprive the owner of his title, but, on the contrary, not only permitted him to redeem it, but gave to the purchaser only a lien subordinate to the bona fide encumbrances preceding it, and in the disposition of the property, or its proceeds, under the judgment of a court of equity enforcing these liens, the remnant of the mortgaged estate belongs to the mortgagor. * * *

"This lien for purchase money, made so by the statute, is in effect a junior mortgage, with the exception that when the purchaser acquires this lien by sale under execution it extinguishes the original debt, and the liability on the part of the original execution debtor no longer exists, the debt, or execution having been satisfied, the purchaser must look to the property on which this lien exists by reason of the execution sale for his indemnity, and nowhere else, as he agrees in making the purchase to pay the debt for the lien subject to the prior encumbrance."

We are of opinion, therefore, that appellees are not entitled to the possession of the land sold under their executions, but that they have only a lien thereon subordinate to the mortgage lien of McCue, and although the latter's lien can not be enforced until the expiration of the twenty years' time allowed by the mortgage for the payment of the note named therein, as it is further provided in the statute (subsection 5, section 1709) that "courts of equity shall have control of all encumbered property sold under execution, and the power to make all needful orders for the preservation, and forthcoming of the property, and its issues and profits, to satisfy the encumbrance, and to secure the rights of others," the chancellor under the power thereby conferred may, in an equitable action, with all the parties in interest before the court, grant such orders as will preserve the liens, and protect the rights of the parties, or he may, as provided by section 1691 of the statute supra, in this proceeding, and upon the return of the cause to the lower court, require such pleadings to be filed, and parties brought before the court, as may be necessary to a final equitable judgment in respect to the rights of all the parties interested.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with direction to the lower court to permit the answer and amended answer of Johnson Wilson to be filed, and to set aside the order awarding to appellees possession of the land, and for such further proceedings as may not be inconsistent with this opinion.

ALEXANDER, &c. v. TEBEAU, &c.

(Filed January 14, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Injunction—Nuisance—Base ball park—The courts will not enjoin the proposed operation of a base ball park adjoining residence property as base ball is the great American game, and is not per se a nuisance. If it is permitted to become a nuisance the court can then afford ample remedy. The law is well settled in this State that an injunction against a proposed legitimate business will not be granted simply because it is feared that it may become a nuisance, for the presumption is that it will be conducted in a proper manner. In order to warrant an injunction in such a case it must appear that the operation of the business is necessarily a nuisance. An injunction will be granted to prevent the defendant from closing up or obstructing an alley which belongs to and is appurtenant to a residence.

M. J. Holt for appellants.

Barker & Sullivan and P. B. & Upton W. Muir for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In this action the appellants, Sallie R. Alexander and Geo. H. Alexander, sought to enjoin the appellees, Geo. Tebeau, &co., from opening a base ball park in Louisville, Ky., on Seventh street, between Florence and Kentucky streets. As a cause of action they allege that the appellant, Sallie R. Alexander, owns a dwelling house immediately adjoining the park, and that the appellant, George H. Alexander, is her tenant; that the land on which it is proposed to operate a base ball park was subdivided many years since by its then owners, Margaret Dulaney and W. H. Dulaney, into lots for residence purposes; and that they sold and conveyed the lot on the northeast corner of the block to Albert Willis; that the boundary so conveyed called for Florence Place on the north and an alley ten feet wide running entirely through the block from Seventh to Eighth street on the south; and that she, in 1893, purchased the property from Willis; that her residence fronts on Florence Place and her coal house and stable on the ten-foot alley; that the alley and street are necessary for the use and enjoyment of her property; that the defendants have set posts about ten feet high across the alley preparatory to closing it and will fence in the greater portion thereof; that it is the purpose of the defendant, Tebeau, to conduct on the premises leased by him from W. H. Dulaney, for ten years, games of base ball, both on Sunday and week days, between professional players of the American Association; that the game will draw together a large number of disorderly and noisy characters, who will interfere with the enjoyment and use of their property as a home, and render it unfit for residence purposes, thereby greatly depreciating its pecuniary value, and ask that the defendant be enjoined from opening the ball park and closing the alley. The deeds from W. H. and Margaret Dulaney to Willis and from Willis to appellant are filed with the petition, and both call for the ten-foot alley in the rear of appellant's property. It is also alleged that the alley has since been used as shown on the plat at the time the property was divided for residence purposes.

A general demurrer was sustained to both paragraphs of plaintiff's petition, as amended, and their petition dismissed, and they have appealed. The law is well settled in this State that an injunction against a proposed legitimate business will not be granted simply because it is feared that it may become a nuisance, for the presumption is that it will be conducted in the proper manner. In order to warrant an injunction in such a case it must appear that the operation of the business is necessarily a nuisance. Thus in Pfingst v. Senn, 94 Ky., 556, a bill by neighboring residents in Louisville alleged the former use of premises as a pleasure garden, with ten pins, dancing and band music till early morning; that the noise would keep the neighbors awake, to the detriment of their health and comfort; that crowds of idle and disorderly persons would be attracted and become a nuisance in the street; that this was not due to mismanagement, but inhered in the business, and that defendants proposed to re-open the place. In a well-considered opinion, the judgment of the lower court sustaining a demurrer to the petition was sustained, and this court said: "Among the rights to be enjoyed by a large class of persons in a crowded city is the privilege of attending places of open air amusement such as are sought to be condemned in the petition. Undoubtedly, if the operation of these grounds become a nuisance, the chancellor will, if there be no remedy at law obtainable by complainants, interfere in their behalf."

But the injunction was refused upon the ground that a threatened nuisance would not be enjoined when the thing complained of was not per se a nuisance, and the opinion is fortified by numerous citations from the opinion of this and other courts. It can not be said that the game of base ball is a nuisance per se. On the contrary, it has taken rank as the great American game, more generally patronized perhaps than any other. Of course, if permitted to degenerate into a mere rallying place for drunkards, rowdies, bullies and men of like kidney, both the criminal and civil law would furnish adequate relief to abate such a nuisance, but we can not in advance anticipate such to be the necessary consequence of its inauguration.

The second ground relied on for an injunction is "that defendants have taken steps to close up the ten-foot alley in the rear of plaintiff's property," presents a different question. They have no more right to fence up this alley on which her coal house and stable front than they would have to close Florence Place on which her residence fronts. It was dedicated to the public in the original plat subdividing the property into lots for sale, and the deed by defendant Dulaney, & Co., to their vendor, Willis, calls for it. We are of opinion that in so far as the petition sought to restrain defendants from fencing up or in anywise interfering with plaintiffs' right to the use and enjoyment of this alley that the petition set up a good cause of action, and the demurrer should have been overruled.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

McALLISTER v. OHIO VALLEY BANKING AND TRUST CO.,
ASS'EE.

(Filed January 15, 1903.)

Assignment for benefit of creditors—Contingent remainder—Appellant made a deed of assignment to appellee for the benefit of his creditors, in which he set forth a schedule of his property and added these words: "Also all other real and personal estate of every description owned by McAllister." Appellant was the owner of an interest in land contingent on the death of the life tenant, which was not considered by either party as of any value. The trust was settled without considering this property. Subsequently the life tenant died and appellant became the owner of the fee-simple title to the land, and the assignee instituted this action, claiming that this property passed under the deed. Held—That this contingent remainder is a vendible interest under section 21 of Kentucky Statutes, and passed to appellee under the deed of assignment. The question as to whether this interest passed under the deed was a question of law, and in nowise dependent on the belief of either party.

R. D. Vance for appellant.

Yeaman & Yeaman for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

On the 23d day of February, 1897, the appellant, John H. McAllister, being indebted to various persons, and unable to pay his creditors in full, executed and delivered a general deed of assignment to the Henderson Trust Co., conveying all his property, both real and personal, for the benefit of his creditors.

The Henderson Trust Co. afterwards consolidated with the appellee, Ohio Valley Banking and Trust Co., and the latter company acquired the rights, and undertook to execute all of the duties, of the Henderson Trust Co., necessary to carry into effect said trust.

The deed of trust, the terms of which are involved in this action, contained a schedule of property, both real and personal, specifically named by the assignee as passing under the transfer, and in addition to this schedule were these words: "Also all other real and personal estate of every description owned by said McAllister." In addition to the property specifically mentioned in said deed of assignment John H. McAllister was the owner of a contingent remainder in a large tract of land situated in Henderson county, Kentucky, his future interest in which was based upon the contingency of the life tenant, Dr. C. E. McAllister, of Chicago, dying without heirs of his body.

It seems not to have been considered by either the assignee or the assignor in the deed of assignment that this contingent remainder passed under the deed of assignment to the assignee. Subsequently to the execution and delivery of the deed of assignment the life tenant, Dr. C. E. McAllister, died, without heirs of his body, and the contingent remainder interest of appellant became a fee-simple estate in said land. The appellee, the trust company, then instituted proceedings in the Henderson Circuit Court to subject the interest of John H. McAllister in said land, claiming that the interest of the assignor passed to it under the deed of assignment. Upon trial in the court below the chancellor held that said interest passed by the deed of assignment, and that the fee-simple interest was vested in appellee for the benefit of the creditors of assignor. From this judgment appellant is complaining in this court.

The question as to whether or not the contingent remainder passed under the deed of assignment to appellee is one of law, and what the assignee and assignor may have thought about the matter is quite beside the question. The assignee undertook to convey to the assignor, in trust for his creditors, all of the property owned by him, whether real or personal, and if the contingent remainder constituted a vendible interest which passed by deed or will, then it vested in the assignee, in trust for the creditors, whether the parties to the deed of assignment believed it so passed or not.

Section 75 of the Kentucky Statutes, among other things, provides: * * * "And the deed (of assignment) shall vest in the assignee the title to all of the estate, real and personal, with all deeds, books and papers relating thereto belonging to the assignor at the time of making the assignment, except the property exempt by law shall not pass unless embraced in the deed."

Section 21 of the Kentucky Statutes provides: "Any interest in, or claim to, real estate may be disposed of by deed or will, in writing."

In the case of the Bank of Louisville v. Baumeister, 87 Ky., 6, it was held that a contract for an option to purchase real estate, at an agreed price, within a specified time, is enforceable, and such option may be sold, assigned or mortgaged.

In the case of White, Trustee v. White, 86 Ky., 602, passing upon this very question, this court said: "It is contended that by the common law a contingent remainder could not be sold by a decree of court, for the reason that the decree could operate on the title only, and as no title passed to the contingent remainderman until the happening of the contingency, there could be no sale in the interim by a decree of court. But section 6, article 1, chapter 63 of the General Statutes (now section 2341 of the Kentucky Statutes) provides: 'Any interest in, or claim to, real estate may be disposed of by deed or will, in writing.' This provision clearly embraces a contingent remainder interest in land, and as R. G. White conveyed the same by deed for the equal benefit of his creditors, the chancellor should have ordered the sale of said interest."

Counsel for appellant seeks to distinguish this case from the case at bar, because in the deed of assignment, in the case cited, assignee undertook to convey his contingent remainder by name, whereas, in the case at bar, the deed of assignment does not specifically mention the contingent remainder interest of appellant as passing under the deed.

We do not think the distinction sound. The deed of assignment, as before said, undertook to convey to appellee all of the property, whether real or personal, owned by appellant at the date of the assignment, and the statute provides that such a deed shall operate to pass all property of the assignee, whether real or personal, except exempt property, which is not mentioned in the deed of assignment. The only question in this case is whether or not a contingent remainder is a vendible estate which passed by deed or will in writing. In the case of Richard Overton v. Preston Means, 2 Ky. Law Rep., 211, this court said: "Whether an interest, by devise, in lands is vested or contingent, it is vendible, and subject to sale for the satisfaction of debts." It seems to us that the question whether or not appellant's contingent remainder interest in the land in question passed, under the deed of assignment made by him to appellee, is concluded against him by the authorities herein cited.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

COMBS, &amp;c. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 15, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Bonds to keep the peace—Forfeiture—Pleadings—Appellants were sureties on a bond in a penalty of $500 that L. and B. would keep the peace, as required by chapter 2 of Criminal Code. The Commonwealth's attorney filed a written statement, alleging a breach of the bond and moved for a forfeiture of it. Summons was issued on it against the sureties, commanding them to show cause why judgment should not be rendered against them for a violation of the bond by L. The summons was served and judgment by default was rendered. On the same day appellants filed affidavits and moved the court to set aside the judgment and permit them to file demurrers, general and special, also an answer which they tendered. The lower court refused to set aside the judgment or to permit the demurrers or answer to be filed. Held—That the court abused its discretion. The forfeiture of a peace bond on motion is not authorized by law. The motions allowed by section 414, Civil Code of Practice, do not include motions on peace bonds. Such remedy can be had only by an ordinary civil action.

W. F. Hall, John Baker, E. E. Hogg and Albert Williams for appellants.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Perry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

On the 2d day of December, 1899, the appellants, D. Y. Combs and S. B. Combs, signed a bond in penalty of $500 that Logan Combs and Brown Evans would keep the peace as required by chapter 2 of the Criminal Code. On the 16th day of March, 1901, H. L. Howard, Commonwealth's attorney, filed the following motion in the Perry Circuit Court:

"H. L. Howard, attorney for the Commonwealth, states: That Logan Combs, on the 2d day of December, 1899, in Perry county, executed a peace bond before H. T. Crawford, who was at the time judge of the Perry County Court, in the sum of $500, with D. Y. Combs and S. B. Combs as his sureties; and that at the March term, 1900, of the Perry Circuit Court, and while said peace bond was in full force and effect, said Logan Combs was indicted, tried and convicted in said court upon a charge of felony, to wit, for willfully, maliciously, and with intent to kill, shooting and wounding Shade Combs; and that said shooting and wounding occurred after the execution of said peace bond. He, therefore, moves the court for an order forfeiting said peace bond, and for summons to issue against D. Y. Combs and S. B. Combs as sureties to show cause, if any they have or can, why judgment shall not be rendered against them for $500 on account of the violation of the stipulations of said peace bond by said Logan Combs."

A summons was issued upon this motion returnable to the first day of the following December term of the court, which was executed upon appellants, and on the second day of the term a judgment was rendered against them by default for the amount of the bond. On the same day, a few moments after the calling of the case, the defendant, D. Y. Combs, appeared in open court, accompanied by his attorney, and filed his affidavit, in which he set out that he had been informed by his counsel that he had a good defense to the proceeding, and desired to appear to present it; that he had employed an attorney to prepare his answer and make defense to the proceeding, and relied on him to do so. He also filed the affidavit of a practicing attorney at the Perry county bar, who said that he had been employed to defend the proceeding on the preceding day; and that he was unavoidably prevented from being in the courthouse at the time the case was called, but that within a few minutes thereafter he appeared in court and asked that the judgment should not be entered, as he was of the opinion that his client had a good defense. And he thereupon tendered and offered to file general and special demurrers to the proceeding, and an answer sworn to by appellants, in which they allege that at the time they signed the peace bond for Logan Combs it was expressly agreed and understood between them and the county judge of Perry county that R. W. Combs was also to sign the bond; and that the bond was not to become effectual or binding upon them until it was so signed by R. W. Combs. The trial court refused to allow either the demurrers or answer to be filed, and gave the judgment complained of.

In our opinion the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to set aside the judgment, and also in refusing to allow the pleadings tendered by appellants to be filed.

Section 392, which is a provision of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code, provides that "the attorney for the Commonwealth may proceed by action in the name of the Commonwealth against the defendant and his surety upon a breach of a bond for good behavior."

Section 2 of the Civil Code provides that "a civil action is a demand by pleading in a court of justice for the enforcement of an alleged right of a plaintiff against a defendant."

And it is only in cases where a specific remedy is provided by statute that rights can be enforced otherwise than by a civil action. Section 144 of the Civil Code recites some of the acts in which summary proceedings may be resorted to. For instance, a judgment may be obtained on motion by a surety against his principal, or a co-security for money paid by a client against his attorney for money collected or property received by a party or officer against a surety for cost, and by a party against an officer for money collected or property received, and for the damages which such party is entitled to recover. And there are numerous other cases in which special proceedings are authorized by statute. But our attention has not been called to any provision of the Code, and we have not been able to find any embracing "bonds for good behavior." In the absence of express statutory authority authorizing the Commonwealth to proceed by motion in this character of cases they must be remitted for the enforcement of their rights to an ordinary civil action by pleading, setting out the execution of the bond and its alleged breach.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MASON v. DEWIS.

(Filed January 13, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Breach of contract giving exclusive privilege to sell melons—Appellant instituted this action against a fair association to recover damages for breach of a contract by which appellant was given the exclusive privilege of selling melons and other refreshments on the fair grounds, alleging that appellant by its servants and agents sold melons and other refreshments over the grounds, thereby greatly damaging appellant. Held—That appellant had a valuable privilege, for a violation of which he is entitled to compensation.

2. Pleading—The allegation that the appellee did these acts maliciously and with intent to injure appellant was not necessary, as the damages to appellant were the same whether appellant did or did not sell the melons with intent to injure him.

3. Measure of damages—Appellant is not entitled to recover damages for being harrassed, annoyed and disturbed. He can only be compensated for the loss proximately resulting from the invasion of his exclusive privilege to sell watermelons and other refreshments on the grounds.

R. S. Crawford for appellant.

K. D. Perkins for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellant, Mason, instituted this action against appellee. It is averred in the petition as amended that the Whitley County Fair Association owns ground adjacent to the city of Williamsburg; that it conducted a fair on the 16th, 17th and 18th of August, 1900, which consisted in giving exhibitions of stock and farm products and awarding premiums to successful competitors; that it had the right to make charge for admission to the grounds and to charge for the right and privilege of vending watermelons and refreshments in the interior of its premises, which right it had granted to the appellant.

It is further averred that the appellant expended $300 in procuring watermelons and supplies of refreshments, and in preparing stands and in procuring assistants to carry on the business of supplying all demands for his wares; that the appellee, with the intent to injure and damage him by preventing him from selling his wares, did, against his will and consent, and that of the fair association, forcibly, by himself, his agents, servants and employes, sell and deliver watermelons over the inclosure of the fair grounds; that by such acts his privilege was rendered wholly worthless; that his wares were rendered of no value; that he lost his time in preparing his stands and expense of assistants, whereby he was damaged in the sum of $300. These are substantially the material averments made by the plaintiff, and they are to the effect that he acquired the exclusive privilege of vending watermelons and other refreshments on the fair grounds during the fair; that that right was invaded and the privilege destroyed by the acts of the appellee in selling melons over the inclosure of the fair grounds to those visiting the fair, thus causing him to lose his wares and his time and to incur expenses, all of which damaged him as stated.

The appellant acquired a valuable right when he obtained from the fair association the exclusive privilege of selling watermelons and other refreshments on the fair grounds. If he lost the enjoyment of that privilege by the acts of appellee, he sustained an injury to his rights, for which he is entitled to be redressed. For every injury the law provides a remedy, except in cases of damnum absque injuria. The right invaded was a private one, not one enjoyed in common with the public, nor was the injury inflicted on his rights suffered in common with the public. It was just as much a wrong to destroy this privilege to sell wares upon the fair grounds, as it would be for one to prevent another from using and enjoying his land and tenements; it could only differ from that in the extent of the injury received. To the extent that the acts of appellee in selling melons on the fair grounds damaged the appellant, he is entitled to recover. Selling melons over the inclosure had the same injurious effect on the rights of the appellant as if the appellee had entered within the inclosure and sold them. It is averred that the acts of the appellee were done maliciously and with the intent to injure the appellant. The right of the appellant to recover does not depend upon the intent with which appellee did the acts complained of, but because he did them with the injurious effect stated. The appellant's damages were the same whether appellee did or did not sell the melons with intent to injure him. Appellant says he was greatly harassed, annoyed and disturbed by the conduct of the appellee. For this he is not entitled to recover; he can only be compensated for the loss proximately resulting from the invasion of his exclusive rights to sell watermelons and other refreshments on the fair grounds. The case was dismissed on demurrer.

The case is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BURGHARD v. BARRETT'S TRUSTEE.

(Filed January 15, 1902—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Trusts—B., by his will, nominated two trustees, who were to have the right to control and manage the estate, pay the income to the beneficiaries and sell property and reinvest the proceeds, and directed that the purchaser should not be required to look to the reinvestment of the purchase money. He also directed that his wife should have the authority to nominate a trustee to fill any vacancies that might occur, and might relieve the trustee or trustees so appointed from executing bond. Vacancies in the position of trustee occurred more than once and the wife exercised the power of appointment to fill the vacancy. Appellee, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., was thus appointed, and proposes to sell a house and lot belonging to the trust estate, and appellant is willing to purchase same. This appeal involves the question as to the authority of the trustee by uniting with the cestuis que trust to vest the purchaser with a valid title. Held—That the trustee was properly appointed by the widow, and the deed tendered by it and the cestuis que trust passed a good title to the purchaser. The widow had full authority under the will to make successive appointments of trustees.

Isaac T. Woodson for appellant.

Harris & Marshall for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division, No. 2.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

John G. Barrett died testate in 1890, a resident of Jefferson county, Kentucky. By the third clause of his will the testator devised to his daughter, Amanda Barrett, among other things, a piece of real property in the city of Louisville, fronting about 54 feet on the west side of Third street, between Market and Jefferson streets, being the same bought of Shipp & Norris, and valued at $12,000. So much of testator's will as we think pertinent to the issues involved in this case is contained in the following clauses of that instrument, which are given entire:

"5th. I desire and direct that the title to the real estate and money or securities which I have devised and bequeathed to my said two daughters, not including what I have heretofore given or conveyed to them, shall be conveyed to John E. Norris and Thomas J. Wood, as joint trustees, to hold the same in trust for the sole and separate use of my said daughters, respectively, free from debts, control, curtesy or marital rights of any husband either of them has or may have. The said trustees shall keep the funds of my said daughters separate and distinct. They shall have power to sell and convey the said property, and reinvest the proceeds, and hold, manage and control the same, and after deducting the expenses of the trust, including repairs, insurance, taxes, assessments, etc., they are directed to pay over to my said daughters the net income to which they may respectively be entitled, and take their own receipts for such payment, and which receipts shall be a good discharge to such trustees. If either of such trustees shall decline to act, or die, or become incapable of acting, the other trustee may act with full powers, and as if he were named as sole trustee, and in such event, or in case both trustees die, or decline to act, or, in any way, cease to be trustees of both or either of said trusts, I authorize my wife, by written instrument, to appoint a successor or successors, with the same rights, powers and duties as if named herein, and in such event my wife may provide in such instrument that such trustees shall not be required to give bond or security. I direct that the said trustees named herein shall not be required to give bond or security, and I declare that the power herein given to them, and the immunity from bond, are personal confidences in them.

"6th. If either of my said daughters shall die, leaving any issue or descendant then surviving her, the entire trust fund above provided for her, with any accumulations or reinvestments thereof, shall go to such issue or descendant. If, however, either of my said daughters shall die, leaving no surviving issue or descendant, she shall have power, by last will and testament, to dispose of one full half part of the said fund to be held for her benefit, and the other half shall revert to my heirs; and if she does not exercise the right to dispose of the one-half by last will, then the whole shall revert to my heirs.

"11th. I give to my executrix full and complete power to adjust, compromise and settle all claims for or against my estate, and I empower her, in her discretion, to renew any bill of exchange or note upon which I may be bound as maker, security or endorser.

"13th. No purchaser from executrix, or any trustee under this will, shall be held to any duty of seeing to the application of the purchase money.

"15th. I nominate and appoint my wife, Ann E. Barrett, sole executrix of this, my will, and direct that she shall qualify and act as such, without giving bond or security, and I desire her to consult my said son in the management of my estate."

The trustees, John E. Norris and Thomas J. Wood, nominated by the terms of the will, qualified as trustees in due form, and all of the trust property devised to them under said will was formally conveyed to them by the executrix and heirs at law of the testator. Subsequently these trustees resigned, whereupon the Louisville Trust Co. was appointed to succeed them by Ann E. Barrett, the widow of the said John G. Barrett, whereupon John E. Norris and Thomas J. Wood conveyed all of said trust property held by them to said Louisville Trust Co. Thereafter the Louisville Trust Co. having settled its accounts as trustee, resigned, and appellee, Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., was appointed trustee for Amanda Barrett, under said will, by order of the Jefferson County Court, and qualified according to law; and thereupon Ann E. Barrett, the widow of John G. Barrett, and as executrix of said will, by writing, nominated and appointed the appellee, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as successor to the Louisville Trust Co. in the trust provided by the will of her husband, John G. Barrett; whereupon the Louisville Trust Co. conveyed by deed all of the trust property in question held by it to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co.

These various appointments and successions of trustees under the power created by the will of John G. Barrett were made and performed with great care, ceremony and circumspection, so that whatever question arises concerning the trust and power of appointment under the terms of the testator's will is free from any doubt emanating from carelessness in carrying said power into effect. After the appointment and qualification of appellee as trustee aforesaid, to wit, on the 16th day of October, 1902, it received a proposition, in writing, from appellant, E. R. Burghard, by which he offered to purchase, for the sum of $15,000, the following described property, which is a part of the trust property held by it for the use of Amanda Barrett under the will of John G. Barrett: "Lying and being in Louisville, and beginning at a point in the west line of Third street, 99 feet north of the northwest corner of Third and Jefferson streets; thence running northwardly 54 feet 6 inches; and thence westwardly at right angles to Third street 105 feet; thence southwardly in a line parallel with Third street 54 feet and 6 inches; thence eastwardly 105 feet to the beginning."

Said proposition was contingent on the trustee conveying to the purchaser a good and valid fee-simple title to said land, free from all encumbrances. This proposition was accepted by the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., trustee for Amanda Barrett, and on the 16th day of October, 1903, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as trustee, under the will of John G. Barrett, and Amanda Barrett, cestui que trust, executed and tendered to said E. R. Burghard a general warranty deed, made out in due form, for said property, in accordance with the terms of the written proposition of purchase made by Burghard. The appellant, being apprehensive as to whether said deed so tendered was sufficient to pass the title to the property in question to him, declined to accept the same, or pay the purchase price for said property, whereupon the parties, appellant and appellee, in good faith, and in order to have an adjudication upon the questions of law arising out of the transaction in question, filed this action, based upon an agreed statement of facts, and submitted the same to the chancellor in the court below, who held that the tendered deed was valid in form, and made in the execution of a power in appellee under said will sufficient to convey said property to appellant in fee simple, and gave judgment accordingly, whereupon appellant excepted and prayed an appeal to this court.

We think the deed of conveyance tendered by the trustee and cestui que trust in every way sufficient in form. No reasonable mind can seriously doubt or question that the trust company undertakes in said deed to act as trustee for Amanda Barrett under the will of John G. Barrett; the property described in the deed tendered to appellant is the same property devised to Amanda Barrett by the will of her father, and is the same property which has been transmitted by due and orderly succession through the various trustees, under the will of John G. Barrett, until it was conveyed to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., so that there can be no question about the identity of the property, or the identity of the power sought to be exercised in relation thereto. The Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. proposes to act as trustee under the will of John G. Barrett, and in no other capacity.

The deed tendered seems to be, in every way, sufficient in form, nor do we find any difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the appellee, the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., is trustee under the will of John G. Barrett, by appointment of Ann E. Barrett, in pursuance of the power given her by the terms of said will, possessing all of the power of the original trustees.

A reference to the 5th clause of the will in question discloses the following power of appointment given to testator's wife, Ann E. Barrett, with reference to the trust in question: "I authorize my wife, by written instrument, to appoint a successor or successors, with the same rights, power and duties as that named herein, and in such event my wife may provide in such instrument that such trustee shall not be required to give bond or security."

There is no force in the suggestion that the power of appointment given to Ann E. Barrett was exhausted by the appointment of the Louisville Trust Co. It is apparent, from an examination of the language used by the testator, that the power of appointment was to be continuous in the wife of the testator. It seems plain that the testator had sufficient confidence in the judgment and discretion of his wife to give her the power of appointing, upon the death or resignation of either or both of the trustees mentioned in his will, a successor or successors, with the same rights, power and duties as those possessed by the trustees nominated in the will by the testator, himself; and in order to still further show the confidence the testator had in his wife, he provided that she, in her discretion, might relieve the trustee or trustees appointed by her of the burden of giving bond or security. To limit the power in testator's wife to one appointment is an unreasonable construction, and would do violence to the language used by the testator. No good and sufficient reason can be given for such limitation of the power of appointment in testator's wife. It is conceded that the testator had sufficient confidence in her judgment and discretion to make one appointment, and to relieve her appointee of the necessity of giving bond. If she possessed the necessary discretion to make one appointment under said power, if the necessity for the same should arise, why should she not have the discretion and wisdom to be entrusted with a second or third appointment? It was the same property, the same cestui que trust, and the necessity for filling up the vacant trusteeship was precisely the same. If the testator had sufficient confidence in his wife to authorize her to make one appointment, we see no reason, in the absence of language positively requiring such a construction, to limit this power to the first appointment.

We are of opinion, therefore, that Ann E. Barrett, widow of John G. Barrett, had full power and authority, under the will of her husband, to appoint all necessary succeeding trustees, and that the exercise of said power by her has been such as to constitute appellee trustee for Amanda Barrett, under the will of John G. Barrett, and that such trustee has all of the power of sale for reinvestment which was given to Norris and Wood by the will of the testator. Appellant has nothing to do with the reinvestment of the proceeds of the sale to him by the express terms of the will, nor is it, in our opinion, necessary that the deed should contain anything on this subject.

The learned chancellor properly construed the will of John G. Barrett, in reference to the subject-matter of this litigation, and his judgment is hereby affirmed.

SIEVERS-CARSON HARDWARE CO. v. CURD.

(Filed January 15, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Evidence—Testimony of witness on former trial—This was an action to recover the amount of a loan alleged to have been made by appellant to appellee's husband. This is the second appeal of the case. Substantially the same proof was produced on the last trial as on the first. C., a witness who had testified on the former trial for appellee, died before the last trial, and his testimony, as taken by the official stenographer, was read in evidence against the objection of appellant. Held—That under section 4648, Kentucky Statutes, the evidence of a witness given on the former trial may be read in the discretion of the court, and was properly admitted in this case.

2. Appeals—Res judicata—An issue raised on the former trial, and which was considered by the Court of Appeals on the former appeal, is res judicata, and can not be considered on the second appeal.

John C. Strother and Thos. R. Gordon for appellant.

R. D. Hill for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This is the second time this cause has been before this court upon appeal from a judgment of the Whitley Circuit Court. The opinion upon the former appeal (21 Ky. Law Rep., 361), recites in substance the pleadings and proof upon the former trial. After a very careful consideration of the entire record it was then determined that the verdict in favor of the defendant was flagrantly against the weight of the evidence, and the udgment was reversed for that reason. Upon the return to the lower court a new trial was had and substantially the same proof introduced as upon the former appeal, with the exception that Mrs. Boron was permitted to testify that appellant company gave to her husband checks for $150, which she supposed was the dividend upon twenty shares of stock owned by her, which was declared July 1, 1890. This transaction is fully explained by the witness, Slevors, who testifies that the money represented by these checks was a loan to her husband. L. P. Curd, who testified upon the former trial, had died before the last trial, and over appellant's objection appellee was permitted to read his evidence from the transcript of the official report of the former trial made by the official stenographer. But we think it was competent under section 4643 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides: "That the testimony of any witness or witnesses taken by said reporter in any court, or division, as aforesaid, shall constitute a part of the record of the case, and may, in the discretion of the presiding judge, be used in any subsequent trial of the same case between the same parties, where the testimony of such witnesses can not be procured, which fact must be made to appear satisfactorily to the court by affidavit of the party desiring to use the same, or his attorney."

It is also insisted that the only issue raised by the pleadings is whether a dividend of $450 was declared in July, 1890, upon sixty shares of stock owned by appellee, was placed as a credit upon the account due by the estate of A. J. Curd to appellant by appellee's consent. This exact contention was made by appellee upon the former appeal, and the decision of the court was against her, and is now, so far as this case is concerned, res adjudicata. We have carefully re-examined the record, both upon this and the former appeal, and are of the opinion that the trial court erred in not directing the jury to find a verdict for the appellant for the amount sued for with interest.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BROOKS v. LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

(Filed January 15, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—Evidence—Appellant was a section hand working on appellee's road under a boss, and while returning from work on a hand car the section boss ordered the men to go in a hurry. Appellant, who was standing and working with his back in the direction in which the car was going, bore down on the lever, which broke, and he fell in front of the car, and was injured by being run over and having his leg broken. In this action, at the close of the evidence on both sides, the lower court gave a peremptory instruction for defendant, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the peremptory instruction was properly given. It is the duty of a master to furnish his servant tools that are reasonably safe for his use. He does not warrant that there is no defect in them, nor does the contract imply such warranty. The master is not liable for such defects in the tools which he furnishes the servant for use in his service, unless he, or those entrusted by him with the selection or inspection of such tools, had notice of such defects, or could have discovered them by the use of ordinary care in the selection or inspection of them. In order to have made out a case of negligence against the appellee it was essential that appellant should have shown that there was a defect in the part of the machinery which broke, and which caused it to break, and that the foreman knew it, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered it.

2. Pleading—An amended answer charging contributory negligence was filed, to which plaintiff filed no reply. This entitled defendant to a peremptory instruction.

J. H. Thurman and J. W. S. Clements for appellant.

W. C. McChord, Edward W. Hines and B. D. Warfield for appellee.

Appeal from Washington Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter. •

The appellant was a member of a section gang in charge of one Savage as foreman. At the close of the day, as was customary, the foreman, together with his force, boarded a hand car for the tool house, and when they were ready to start the section foreman told them to "bear down," which meant to go in a hurry. While proceeding at the rate of about eight miles per hour the "short lever" broke, which threw the appellant in front of the hand car, which ran over him, with the result that one of his legs was broken in two places. He was one of the men propelling the car, with his back toward the course that the car was going.

In making this statement the evidence offered by the appellee is not considered, because, at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, a motion was made for peremptory instruction, which was refused by the court. As the appellee's evidence did not strengthen the case attempted to be stated by the appellant, the court, at the conclusion of all of the testimony, gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the appellee, which was accordingly done. The first question arising is, did the plaintiff offer testimony sufficient to authorize the court to submit the question of negligence to the jury?

It is the duty of a master to furnish his servant tools that are reasonably safe for his use; he does not warrant that there is no defect in them, nor does the contract imply such warranty. The master is not liable for defects in the tools which he furnishes the servant for use in his service, unless he, or those entrusted by him with the selection or inspection of such tools, had notice of such defects or could have discovered them by the use of ordinary care in the selection or inspection of them. This doctrine has been repeatedly enunciated by this court. In order to have made out a case of negligence against the appellee it was essential that appellant should have shown that there was a defect in the part of the machinery which broke, and which caused it to break, and that the foreman knew it, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered it.

The case seems to have been tried in the lower court upon the idea that a case had been made out for the jury when the evidence showed that appellant was in the employ of the appellee, and that he was in the discharge of a duty when the lever broke and threw him under the car. It is urged in the brief of counsel for appellant that the law presumes negligence from the state of facts proven in this case. To support his contention he cites a certain line of cases which it is not necessary here to analyze. When a servant is injured he does not show himself entitled to recover by showing that he is injured while in the discharge of a duty, but he is required to produce some evidence tending to show that it was caused by the negligence of the master or some one representing him. (Hughes v. Cincinnati, & Co., Ry. Co., 91 Ky., 526; Wintuska v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 14 Ky. Law Rep., 579.)

It has been the uniform rule of this court, in so far as it has made an announcement on the question, that in an action of a servant against the master negligence can not be presumed, but must be proven. While we recognize the correctness of the rule enunciated in Ward v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1326, still the application of the rule would not, on the state of facts in this case, entitle the appellant to recover. That case does not decide that the master warrants that the implement or machinery or tool with which he may supply the servant for the performance of the labor undertaken shall be absolutely safe, nor does it decide that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show that there was a defect in the machinery of which the defendant was aware, or might have been aware, by the exercise of ordinary care. It simply holds that in a case like that the servant may rely upon the superior judgment of his foreman, and was not required to exercise his own judgment as to the safety of the hand car.

We are of the opinion that the appellant failed to make out a case for the jury, because he failed to show that there was a defect in the hand car known to the foreman, or one which he could have discovered by the exercise of reasonable care. There is another reason why the court properly gave a peremptory instruction. The defendant filed an amended answer in which contributory negligence was pleaded, and the plaintiff failed to reply to it. This entitled the defendant to a peremptory instruction. (White's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 15 Ky. Law Rep., 49; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Mayfield, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 224; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Nall, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 281.)

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

LEONARD v. BOYD.

L. D. & J. C. HUSBANDS v. COOK.

(Filed January 15, 1903--Not to be reported.)

1. Partnership—Profits—Appellee, Boyd, induced appellant, Leonard, to furnish the money and to form a partnership with him in purchasing Lyon county bonds, and to share the profits of the venture. A large number of bonds were thus purchased, some of them from C. After considerable trouble they effected a compromise with the county court, and realized a profit of about $10,000, and this action was instituted by appellee Boyd to recover one-half of said profits. Appellant Leonard denies appellee's right to share the profits on the ground that Boyd agreed to furnish one half the money with which to purchase the bonds, and had failed to do so. Held—That the proof amply sustained the fact that appellee and appellant were partners in the transaction, Boyd participating extensively in the purchase of the bonds and in their settlement. The failure of Boyd to furnish his share of the money in the partnership venture furnishes no defense to his claim for profits.

2. Attorneys' fees—Champerty—C., before selling his bonds as above stated, employed appellants, Husbands, as attorneys, to collect same under a contract, agreeing to pay them a fee of 20 per cent. of the amount collected, with certain conditions in case of a compromise, and in this action said attorneys are seeking to collect the amount due under said contract. Champerty is pleaded as a defense. Appellants offered to file an amended petition, asking for a reasonable compensation for services rendered. The lower court denied their claim for any fees, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That said contract, fixing the amount of fees, also the conditions, was champertous and void. The lower court erred in refusing to permit the amended petition to be filed as C., having accepted the services of the attorneys, is bound to pay them a reasonable fee. C. could not defeat their claim for a reasonable attorneys' fee by selling the bonds.

Husbands & Husbands for appellants Husbands.

T. L. Edelen for appellant Leonard.

John K. Hendrick and W. M. Reed for appellee Boyd.

Landes & Allensworth for appellee Cook.

Appeal from Lyon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, Boyd, conceived the idea that there was a great speculation in bonds which Lyon county issued in aid of the Elizabethtown & Paducah railroad: the appellant, Leonard, was reputed to be a man of large means; Boyd proposed to him that he furnish money for the purpose of buying bonds and that he (Boyd) would purchase same, and be a partner in the venture. He claims that Leonard agreed to furnish the money for the purpose of purchasing bonds held by Thompson and some owned by Cook. He did purchase bonds with money which Leonard furnished for the purpose.

On the other hand, it is contended by Leonard that Boyd agreed to furnish one-half of the money necessary to purchase bonds, but failed to do so, and, therefore, he forfeited his right to be a partner in the venture, and to participate in the profits arising therefrom. The evidence conduces to show that a settlement was effected with the county authorities, after much trouble and litigation, and that the profits arising from the transaction amounted to more than $10,000, and that Boyd was active in looking after a settlement of the matter with Lyon county. The evidence further conduces to show that Leonard regarded Boyd as his partner from the time the bonds were purchased until after their collection. This is not only proven by Boyd, but by others besides Boyd, and is supported by the circumstances surrounding the transaction. The proceeds of the bonds were deposited in the bank to their joint credit, and this was done with the consent of Leonard. In addition to that Leonard paid Boyd $1,000 on his share of the profits.

Although Boyd may have agreed to furnish one-half of the money to purchase bonds, but failed to do it, still if Leonard treated him as a partner in their purchase and thereafter until their collection, and allowed him to assist in their collection, etc., he can not now deny Boyd's right to participate in the profits. Our conclusion as to the question of fact is that Leonard was to furnish all the money necessary to be invested in the partnership, therefore, the judgment was quite as favorable to Leonard as he was entitled to have.

HUSBANDS v. COOK.

Before Leonard and Boyd purchased the bonds from Cook he had employed L. D. & J. G. Husbands, practicing attorneys, to collect his bonds, interest coupons and costs from Lyon county. Husbands & Husbands claim they were to have an amount equal to 20 per cent. of the amount collected. Cook claims they were to have 20 per cent. of the money collected on the bonds, providing they collected the debt, interest and costs, and to have nothing if they did not succeed in doing that, and were to have nothing if Cook compromised the debt against the county. Cook's defense is based upon the claim that they were to have a certain part of the fund collected, therefore, the contract is champertous and unenforceable, and, further, when he sold his bonds to Leonard and Boyd for less than the principal, interest and cost, it was equivalent to a compromise, and, for that reason, under the terms of the contract, they were not entitled to any compensation for their services.

The evidence shows that the contract was made by letters which the parties exchanged upon the subject. There is no escape from the conclusion that by the terms of the contract the appellants were to have 20 per cent. of the money which they might recover on appellee's claim against the county. The contract being champertous and void, appellants are not entitled to recover 20 per cent. of the appellee's claim against the county, nor that per cent. of the amount realized by a sale of it, unless that would be reasonable compensation for their services. This being true, necessarily that part of the contract which stipulates the specific conditions under which they were to receive the 20 per cent. are likewise void and unenforceable.

The whole contract was champertous and void, and was so at the time the appellants began to render services to the appellee in his effort to collect his claim against the county. Notwithstanding the contract is champertous, the appellee accepted the appellants' services, and the law raises a promise on the part of appellee to pay them a fair and reasonable compensation therefor. The appellants sought to recover on the champertous contract, but were not entitled to do that. Upon the facts the appellants were entitled to recover reasonable compensation for the services rendered. The court should have permitted the amendment offered to be filed which sought to recover such compensation; it would have been in the furtherance of justice to have permitted this to be filed. It could not have been misleading to the appellee or prejudicial to his rights, because, from the facts conceded by him, the liability arises.

The foregoing conclusion renders it less important to adjudicate the question of the right of Cook to sell his claim, and thus defeat their right to receive reasonable compensation for their services. We are of the opinion that he could not do so; that would not have been a compromise in the meaning of the contract, besides, that part of the contract failed to be enforceable as heretofore stated.

The case is affirmed on the appeal of Leonard against Boyd and reversed on [the appeal of Husbands & Husbands against Cook, with directions that the court ascertain what would be a reasonable fee to Husbands & Husbands, and allow it, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JOHNSON v. ZWEIGART.

1. Contracts—Parol evidence to contradict a writing—Appellant, a lawyer, brought this suit against appellee, on account of legal services and for money paid thereabout. The services are not denied. The real defense, outside the value of the services, is that the fees sued for were settled by a contract between the parties, by which it is claimed that appellee bought his claim for fees and five certain promissory notes for $2,500 cash. The question involved on this appeal is whether the sale was an absolute one, or whether it was a loaning by appellee of $2,500 to appellant, and a pledging of the notes to secure it. A written contract was introduced in evidence, reciting that appellant had delivered to appellee a number of notes, including a life insurance policy for $2,500 cash, in the second clause of which appellee obligates himself to return to appellant the unpaid notes after collecting $2,500 and interest. A receipt reciting settlement in full for attorney's fees of same date was introduced in evidence. Appellee was permitted to introduce oral testimony to vary or dispute the writing. Held—That such evidence was incompetent without an allegation of fraud or mistake. The court should have excluded all that transpired between the parties that tended to substitute a different contract or understanding for the one evidenced by the writing.

2. Instructions—The court should have instructed the jury that the effect of the writing, the first mentioned, was a mortgage or pledge of the notes therein mentioned to secure to appellee the payment of $2,500, with interest, and that the agreement to relinquish the fees, executed simultaneously and as a part of the other agreement, was without lawful consideration and void. The sole question then left to the jury was, first, whether there was a special contract by which appellant agreed to collect the notes mentioned in his account at the rate claimed; and, second, if not, then the jury should have found such sum as under the evidence was a reasonable compensation for the services rendered.

L. W. Robertson and E. L. Worthington for appellant.

G. S. Wall and L. W. Galbraith for appellee.

Appeal from Mason Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit was brought by appellant, a lawyer, against appellee, on an account for legal services and for money paid thereabout. The services are not denied. The real defense, outside the value of the services, is presented by a plea that the fees sued for were settled by a contract, made September 3, 1898, between the parties, by which it is claimed appellee bought from appellant his claim for fees and five certain promissory notes, for $2,500 cash. There is no dispute that at the time and place claimed by appellee appellant transferred to him the notes and the claim for fees, or, which is the same, appellant agreed to release his claim for fees to get appellee to take the notes for $2,500. Nor is there dispute that appellee at that time and place advanced to and for appellee the sum of $2,500 (about), and took possession of the notes and took appellant's receipt in full for the fees.

The disputed question is, was that sale an absolute one, as appellee contends, or was it a loaning by appellee of the $2,500 to appellant, and a pledging of the notes to secure it, as appellant contends. If it was the latter, then the agreement evidenced by the receipt, whereby appellant released or acquitted appellee of the fees, was without lawful consideration, that is, it was in its nature usurious, and not obligatory on appellant. The form of the transaction will not control; it is the fact that determines its character. So we must look to the whole transaction to determine what the parties intended to do, and what they did in this connection. The negotiations were begun, as is customary, by parol propositions and counterpropositions, resulting in the agreement above stated. The parties then reduced to writing their agreement, as follows:

"Maysville, Ky., September 3, 1898.

"Milton Johnson has sold and delivered to me, for the sum of $2,500 cash, the following notes, viz: Wm. Wormald, mortgage, $1,000; J. A. Coughlin, mortgage, $100; Wesley Vicroy, personal note, $125; George Myall, personal note, $1,200, and policy of insurance; John McGraw, chat. mortg., about $500.

The question presented by this appeal is whether appellee could, by his testimony, vary or dispute the writing above copied and signed by him without an allegation of fraud or mistake in its execution, and whether it was proper for the court to submit to the jury the question of the binding effect of the above-named writing. Appellee was allowed, over objections, to testify as to an oral sale, and the court submitted to the jury to decide as to whether such an oral sale was made. The court is of opinion that this question was improperly submitted to the jury. Where a series of conferences is consummated by a written document, executed by the parties for the expression of their conclusions, such writing must be regarded not only as expressing their final views, but as absorbing all other parol understandings prior or contemporaneous. It must be conclusively presumed in such a state of case, in the absence of an allegation of fraud or mistake in the execution of the paper, that the entire engagement of the parties is embraced in the writing; and where its terms are not uncertain, oral testimony of previous colloquies between the parties that would tend in any instance to substitute a new or different contract for the one evidenced by the writing, must be rejected. (2 Wharton on Evidence, section 1014; Crane v. Williamson, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 689; DeWitt v. Berry, 184 U. S., 806.)

This rule, founded upon long experience, recognizes that the parties to the agreement have seen fit to culminate all their negotiations in a memorial not subject to the uncertainties of forgetfulness or other similar infirmity, and have thereby agreed to adopt such memorial as the sole evidence of their contract. Expedience and experience alike sustain the wisdom of the rule.

Applying the doctrine to the case at bar, the court should have excluded, under the state of the pleadings in this case, all that transpired between the parties that tended to substitute a different contract or understanding for the one evidenced by the writing. It should, on the contrary, have told the jury that the effect of this writing, the one first copied above, was a mortgage or pledge of the notes therein mentioned to secure to appellee the payment of $2,500 and legal interest from September 3, 1898, and that the agreement to relinquish the fees, executed simultaneously and as a part of the other agreement, was without lawful consideration, and was void. The sole question then left to the jury was, first, whether there was a special contract (as claimed by appellee) by which appellant agreed to collect the notes mentioned in his account at the rate claimed by appellee; and, second, if not, then the jury should have found such sum as under the evidence was a reasonable compensation to appellant for the services rendered.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to award appellant a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

LEBUS v. SLADE, &c.

(Filed January 16, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Judicial sales—Insufficient description of real property—In this action improved city property was ordered to be subdivided into three lots and sold. The commissioner had the lots appraised separately and as a whole. Bids were received on the lots separately and then as a whole, and the bid on the whole was accepted. The court sustained exceptions to the report of sale, and set the sale aside on the ground that neither the judgment directing the sale nor the advertisement described the property definitely enough to apprise bidders of the boundaries they would bid for. The purchaser has appealed. Held—That the court properly set aside the sale as the description of the lots was too indefinite. The width of neither of the three lots was given in the judgment or advertisement.

J. J. Osborne for appellant.

Lafferty & King for appellees.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Real property in a city was adjudged to be sold in proceedings to enforce mortgage liens. The property was improved. It really constituted one lot. The court found and adjudged it to be susceptible of advantageous division, and ordered it to be sold in three parcels, thus: "First, lot known as residence lot fronting on Bridge street, and running back northward 142 feet; second, being known as the blacksmith shop or property, being situated immediately on the corner, the northeast corner, at the intersection of Bridge and Church streets; third, fronting on Church street, the east side thereof, and running back east to the west line of lot No. 1, herein, and known as the scales lot or property."

The commissioner executing the judgment of sale sold the property first in parcels, as above described, and then as an entirety, accepting the latter bid, it having produced more than the others. The judgment of sale did not direct the property to be sold as one lot. It was appraised in separate parcels, and as a whole. Numerous grounds of exception to the sale were filed by the owner. Among them is one that neither the judgment of sale nor the advertisement so described the property as to apprise contemplating bidders of the boundaries they would be bidding for. The circuit court sustained exceptions to the sale, and ordered the property to be surveyed, and a resale had. The purchaser has appealed. The court is of opinion that the description of the lots was insufficient to properly designate the subdivisions to be sold. The width of the first lot is not given. Neither the width nor the depth of the second is shown, nor is the width of the third. If these lots had by any record, or by some well-defined natural object, been previously marked, as subdivided, these descriptions would have answered. But so far as the record shows this was the first attempt to subdivide this property. No purchaser could have told from the description above just what he was getting. Necessarily such an uncertainty affected the bidding. The sale was properly set aside for that reason.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS, &c.

(Filed January 16, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Evidence—Husband and wife—In this action contesting a will the wife of the attending physician was a daughter of the testator, and a contestant, and testified, and afterwards her husband was introduced as a witness, to prove the mental incapacity of the testator, but the lower court refused to permit him to testify. Held—That both husband and wife could not testify, and the husband was properly rejected as a witness. On the trial a paper signed by a number of the adult contestants was introduced in evidence. The paper was an agreement to set aside the will and distribute the property as if no will had been written. There were infants whose interests would have been affected by the agreement. The paper was competent evidence to prove bias of the contestants.

H. Clay White and B. F. Graziani for appellant.

W. W. Dickerson, Wm. Carnes and A. G. DeJarnette for appellees.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

In this contest over the probate of the will of D. W. Williams the sole question at issue was the testamentary capacity of the testator.

This question was submitted to the jury by instructions which told them in substance that if they believed from the evidence that the paper offered by the propounders was signed by the testator, and by him acknowledged in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, who became such at testator's request, and in his presence, and that at the time the testator had mind and memory sufficient to take a complete and rational survey of his estate, and to know the objects of his bounty and his duty to them, and to dispose of his property according to a fixed purpose of his own, then they should find the paper to be his last will. The evidence abundantly sustained the jury's finding setting up the will. There are but two matters of evidence complained of. Dr. Robinson, who had been testator's attending physician during the fatal illness, was offered by the contestants as witness to prove mental incapacity at the time the paper was executed. The doctor was a son-in-law of the testator. His wife was named as one of the devisees, but seemed to be unsatisfied. She was a witness in favor of contestants, she being one of them. The circuit court refused to permit her husband to testify. This was correct.

Section 606, Civil Code, prohibits a husband or wife from testifying against each other; and while it allows either to testify in a case such as this, it expressly provides that both can not. By offering herself as a witness her husband became excluded. The fact that others were interested in whose behalf he would have been a competent witness can not affect the case. (Milton v. Hunter, 18 Bush, 163; Wise v. Foote, 81 Ky., 10; City of Covington v. Geyler, 93 Ky., 275.)

Before the contest was instituted some of the devisees, who were contestants, entered into a written agreement, and by their attorney solicited the other adult devisees to join in it, whereby they agreed to have the will set aside and to divide the estate among the signers as if it had descended to them by the intestacy of the decedent. All did not sign the paper. Some of the devisees, who would have been deprived entirely of their interests by the proposed agreement, were infants. This paper was offered and allowed as evidence against the contestants. It was either harmless (in which event its use in evidence was not prejudicial), or it was a proposition to unlawfully suppress a will. In the latter view it affected the good faith of the contestants, and tended to show the extent of their bias. In this view it was relevant as evidence in the case against them. There is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

MORGAN v. WICKLIFFE.

(Filed January 5, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Lucius P. Little for appellant.

Jep. C. Jonson for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Judge Paynter delivered the following dissenting opinion:

The opinion of the court will seriously affect property rights in this State. As it is disregardful of previous decisions of this court I am constrained to dissent.

The opinion is based upon the rulings of courts of other States, not upon a statute which this court has construed as being intended to get rid of the very doctrine enunciated in the opinion. Section 2185, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "The wife shall not be endowed of land sold, but not conveyed by the husband before marriage, nor of land sold, in good faith, after marriage, to satisfy a lien or incumbrance created before marriage, or created by deed in which she joined, or to satisfy a lien for the purchase money; but if there is a surplus of the land or proceeds of sale after satisfying the lien, she may have dower out of such surplus of the land or compensation out of such surplus of the proceeds, unless they were received or disposed of by the husband in his lifetime."

In Schweitzer v. Wagner, 94 Ky., 458, the court had under consideration the construction of the statute and the question here involved. In that case it appeared that the wife joined in the mortgage; in the proceedings to sell the land she was not made a party; afterwards she brought a suit to have dower assigned her out of the land. It was claimed she was not a party to the proceedings to enforce the lien, therefore, was entitled to recover dower.

The court held that the mortgage in which she joined was a deed in the meaning of the statute. In effect the court held that she by the mortgage divested herself of any right in the land, except in the surplus proceeds which the statute gave her. The statute expressly authorizes the husband to sell the land to pay a lien or incumbrance created by deed (a mortgage being a deed) in which his wife joins. If he has the right to do that, then it is the duty of the court to compel him to do it, with exactly the same effect as if he had voluntarily done the act.

The statute was intended to protect purchasers under such circumstances, for the wife loses her dower and compensation therefor in the surplus if they are received or disposed of by the husband in his lifetime. This is true, whether the surplus proceeds were received by the husband as the result of a private or judicial sale of the property to satisfy a lien or incumbrance. These conclusions are supported by Malone v. Armstrong, 79 Ky., 248; Ratliff v. Mason, 92 Ky., 190; Johnson v. Cantrill, 92 Ky., 59; Tisdale v. Risk, 7 Bush, 141.

In Tisdale v. Risk the court expressly held that the widow's "title can not be extended to the land purchased by appellant's vendor from the court and conveyed to him by the court without incumbrance of any lien in her favor."

As neither the mortgagee nor purchaser were under any liability to the wife, no bond to her was necessary, although she was unnecessarily made a party to the action. The plaintiff had no right to the surplus proceeds or liability for its application, and the purchaser was not compelled to look to the application of any part of the purchase money, therefore, the bond could not protect the wife against the act of the husband in getting the surplus proceeds, if any. It would have been an idle thing to have executed it.

Judges White and Hobson concur in this dissenting opinion.

BELL v. SMITH, &c.

(Filed January 9, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Infants—Judicial sales—A proceeding was instituted by one heir, who was an adult, against two other heirs, who were infants, one of whom was under fourteen years of age, to sell a house and lot alleged to be worth about $300, it being alleged that the property was not susceptible of division. Process was served personally on the infant under fourteen years of age, but was not served on any of the persons named in section 52, Civil Code of Practice, but the statutory guardian answered and joined in the prayer of the petition. A judgment of sale was ordered and appellant became the purchaser of the property, and instituted this action to set aside the sale on account of irregularities. Held—That the purchaser acquired a perfect title. Although process was not properly served on the infant the object of the Code was substantially complied with when the statutory guardian appeared and answered.

2. Divisibility of property—The lot is forty feet wide and 100 feet long, with a house on it, and no proof as to its indivisibility was necessary.

R. C. Stoll for appellant.

Wm. Wood and J. Alexander Chiles for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Mrs. Combs died seized and possessed of a house and lot in the city of Lexington, leaving as her only heir at law appellees, Frank Smith, Henry Burnett and John Burnett, the Burnetts being infants. Smith instituted this action against them, asking a sale of the property, averring that Henry Burnett was seventeen and John Burnett fifteen years of age; that the property was of less value than $300, and that it was not susceptible of division without materially impairing its value and asked a sale of it, and that its proceeds be divided so as to give one-third to each of them.

The court ordered the property sold, and the appellant, Bell, became the purchaser. He seeks to have the sale set aside for various reasons, the principal one being as considered herein.

One of the grounds for setting aside the sale is that the infants were not served with process as required by section 52 of the Civil Code of Practice, which reads as follows: "If the defendant be under the age of fourteen years the summons must be served on his father; or, if he have no father, on his guardian; or, if he have no guardian, on his mother; or, if he have no mother, on the person having charge of him. If any of the parties upon whom summons is directed to be served by this section is a plaintiff, then it shall be served on the person who stands first in the order named in said section, and who is not a plaintiff; and if all such persons are plaintiffs, it shall, on the affidavit of one or more of them showing that fact, be the duty of the clerk of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for the infant, and the summons shall be served on such guardian."

It appears that one of the infants was under fourteen years of age at the time the summons was served upon him. It was served by giving him a copy, not by giving a copy to the person designated in the section. The method of serving a summons on infants under fourteen years of age prescribed by the Code is to bring the attention of some one of those mentioned in the Code that the infant in which such one is particularly interested had been sued, and that his rights were to be affected thereby. It was believed that in this way the infant's interest would be looked after by the one most interested in him. While the summons was not served on the infant's statutory guardian, that guardian appeared, answered for him and joined in the prayer of the petitioner for a sale of the property. All that a summons could have accomplished had it been served upon the statutory guardian was accomplished when she appeared and answered for the infants; she and her wards were before the court. The appearance of the infants, under the circumstances stated, made the judgment conclusive on their rights. (Garr v. Eble, &c., 16 Ky. Law Rep., 661; Lawrence v. Connor, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 88; Cheatham v. Whitman, 86 Ky., 614; Shelby v. Harrison.)

The case of Isert v. Davis, 17 Ky. Law Rep., 686, does not conflict with these cases, because in that case it appeared the statutory guardian was plaintiff, and did not appear for the infant, and, of course, made no defense for him.

It is claimed that the pleading filed by the administrator of Mrs. Combs was in the nature of an action to settle the estate. It is sufficient to say that the administrator joined in the prayer to sell the land, and if any creditors had any claim upon the fund arising from the sale the court can fully protect them. It is insisted that there was no proof that the property could not be divided without materially impairing its value. The lot was 40 feet wide and 100 feet long, with a house upon it. The court will presume that it could not have been divided without materially impairing its value. (Fought v. Henry, 13 Bush, 473.)

The record is sufficient to show that the interest of each infant was less than $100. In our opinion the appellant will get a good title under his purchase.

Judgment is affirmed.

KEININGHAM V. KEININGHAM'S EX'OR.

(Filed January 16, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Wills—Duty of personal representative—K. and his wife had been divorced by a decree of the Fayette Circuit Court, in which the custody of their child, a little girl about six years old, was given to her mother. The judgment reserved the right to make further orders concerning her future custody. When the girl was about fifteen years old her father died, resident in the District of Columbia, leaving about $1,300 in money, which he disposed of by his will in trust to F., if she was living and could be found, directing said F., as his executor, to use all reasonable means and expense to find his daughter and make known to her his character and history, and to use the money given in trust in his discretion for his daughter's benefit, towards educating and training her, allowing her such sums of money for clothing and sustenance as he deemed proper, and requested that he take control of and train her as he would his own daughter. The will further provided that if the daughter should fail or refuse to obey the will of her father, then the executor should pay the bequest to the son of the executor. Shortly after the probate of the will the executor learned that the testator's daughter was living with her mother and stepfather near White Hall, Madison county, and wrote her a letter, informing her of the bequest of her father, and requesting her to come and live with him. The daughter in response wrote a letter, stating that she was happy, and well cared for, and declining to leave her mother, but expressed a desire to conform to the wishes of her father. The executor wrote another letter, expressing his willingness to take charge of her and apply the funds as directed by the will. No further response from the daughter was received, and the executor paid the fund over to the son, thus construing the acts of the daughter as a disobedience of the will of her father. The daughter brought this suit to recover the legacy. Held—That the executor did not exercise reasonable diligence in complying with the wishes of the testator before paying the money over to his son. It was his duty to see her personally, and fully explain the terms of the will to her and her mother. He had no right to demand custody of the girl while she was in the custody of the mother under decree of court. The court could have reinstated the case on the docket, and would have made proper orders for the custody, education and maintenance of the child. She is entitled to recover the legacy.

2. Jurisdiction—Although testator died resident in the District of Columbia, and his executor qualified there, the legatee had the right to sue the executor, who has removed to this State, to recover her legacy.

John H. Wilson and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellant.

T. L. Edelen for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This action was instituted by the appellant, Jennie Moss Keiningham, against the appellee, H. F. Finley, as executor of her father, James L. Keiningham, to recover a legacy devised to her by her father's will. The father of appellant died domiciled in the District of Columbia, and his will was probated in the proper court of the district, and appellee duly qualified as executor thereof and took possession of the devised estate. After making a number of small bequests to relatives, the will contains the following provisions:

"5th. I will and bequeath all the money I have on hand, or on deposit in the National Bank of the Republic in this city (after the payment of all my just debts and funeral expenses) to H. F. Finley, in trust for my daughter, Jennie Moss Keiningham, if living, and can be found.

"6th. I will that my executor hereinafter named use all reasonable means and expense to find my said daughter, and make known to her my history and character, as he shall believe me to have lived. And he will, in his discretion, use the money hereby given him in trust for my said daughter's benefit, towards educating and training her, as in his judgment shall be best for her interest, allowing such sums of money to her for clothing and sustenance, from time to time, as in his judgment shall appear to be proper and consistent with her age, wants and means in his hands, putting such money at interest as best he can for her interest, as shall not be immediately wanted for the uses above indicated, and if, when my said daughter shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, there shall be any balance in the hands of my executor, he shall pay the same, with any accrued interest in his hands, to my daughter.

"7th. If my said daughter shall not be living, or, if living, shall die before she attains the age of twenty-one years, without issue of her body living and born in lawful wedlock, then in that event my will is that all the bequest made in trust for her benefit shall be paid by my executor to my cousin, F. W. Finley, to whom I hereby give and bequeath it.

"9th. I will that my executor take control of and raise and train my said daughter as he would his own daughter in so far as the money given him for that purpose will allow, and that she will submit to him in all respects as she would to me, my purpose being for her alone to receive the benefit of her bequest hereinbefore made; but shall my said daughter fail or refuse to obey my will in this respect, then it is my will that my executor pay this bequest to my friend and relative, F. W. Finley.

"10th. I hereby appoint and request my friend, H. F. Finley, to carry out in its true spirit this my last will and testament."

After setting out the facts above recited, the plaintiff alleged that James L. Keiningham had on deposit to his credit in the National Bank of the Republic at the time of his death $1,735.75, which was taken possession of by the defendant as executor. And in the second paragraph of her amended petition she alleges that she was born on the 25th day of June, 1875; that on the 20th day of May, 1881, her mother was divorced from her father by a judgment of the Fayette Circuit Court; that she was then only six years old, and was placed in the custody of her mother. The judgment, however, reserved the right to make any orders in regard to her future custody as the court might think proper; and that by virtue of this judgment she lived with her mother and under her control until the death of her father without any communication of any kind with him; that when her father made his will he did not know of her whereabouts, or whether she was living or dead; that shortly after his death the defendant addressed a letter to her at White Hall, Madison county, Kentucky, where she was then residing with her mother and her stepfather, the letter being dated March 18, 1890, in which he informed her of her father's death, and the provisions of his will with reference to her, and invited her to become a member of his family, in accordance with her father's wishes, promising to discharge in good faith the duties imposed by his trust; that this letter was received through the mail, and was taken possession of by her mother, who wrote and mailed to the defendant in plaintiff's name the following letter:

"White Hall, Madison Co., Ky., March 18, 1890.

"Hon. H. F. Finley:

"Dear Sir—Yours of the 13th to hand, and contents noted. I thank you very kindly for the interest you and your family have manifested to me, and am sorry to be under the painful necessity of declining your offer of acceptance as a ward. You will please pardon me for expressing myself freely to you upon this subject. In the first place, understand I do not wish to interfere with or act in any way contrary to my father's last will and testament. But it was my mother who has struggled through adversity to obtain for me all the advantages I have had, and it is to her that I owe all. And it would be contrary to nature's laws for me to leave her now that I can be a comfort and help in her declining years. Truly if a child has a friend it certainly is her mother, and from my own experience have found it to be the case. My home is plentiful and happy, which necessitates me to decline your kind offer in your home. My uncle, Charles F. Smith, of Richmond, says he met you several times in Williamsburg, and would have cheerfully given you all the information concerning my whereabouts had he known of my father's illness or desire to see me before his death, as also my uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Million, would have cheerfully given my father my address last fall when he was in Kentucky on a visit. I will not say more on this subject, as there is enough being said throughout Kentucky, but it would be a great satisfaction if you would send me a copy of his will."

In response to this communication the defendant, Finley, addressed to her the following letter:

"Washington, D. C., March 21, 1890.

"Miss Jennie M. Keiningham,

"White Hall, Ky.:

"Dear Miss—Your letter of the 18th inst. to hand. Its tone is the reverse of what I wished it to be, but you are young yet, and I shall not despair. You have need of an education now, later on you may not be so 'pleasantly and plentifully situated.' With good education you can more certainly be able to aid yourself and mother, and it will be of great satisfaction to you in after life. It can but be the wish of your mother and relatives that you be educated and fitted for the position in the best circles of society and usefulness. And even though you may be so situated that you can and will obtain this, without the provisions made for you by your father, I can but hope you will take and use for your accomplishment the small, but sufficient, sum left by your father for this purpose. I know you know but little of your father's life. I know you were not forgotten by him in his earnest prayers for your welfare. You, more than all else, he desired to know and love him, and he was worthy of it. He was loved by all who knew him here, and all who loved him felt an interest in your welfare. If you will allow me, I will love you as my own daughter, and treat you in the same way; and guard and protect you as a father. I would deny you nothing that I would give my own child, and shall feel sadly disappointed if you shall refuse to accept the wish and will of your father as expressed in his will. Now it would be to the interest of my family that you should not do this, for in this event you refuse to allow me to advise and superintend your education and training, the money left in my hands for this purpose goes to my son. But I want you to have it, and you shall if you will. I can put you in school now with my own daughter; you will be surrounded with fit and pleasant associations; and you will be loved and cared for and in all respects treated as a young lady of your age should. Now I do not wish to respond to the suggestion in your letter, in substance that you could have been found and brought to the bedside of your father before he died. The reasons why this was not done are abundant, and will be satisfactory to you whenever you will give opportunity to learn them. The relations that existed between your father and mother were not pleasant, but he is dead. I have no doubt he died a Christian. If he erred in life, which all do, let the grave hide his faults, and let those that live forgive and forget all wrong, real or imaginary. He loved you and prayed for you, his prayers ought not to be in vain.

"I go home the first of next month, and would like to take you with me and put you in school. I hope you will consult your friends and relatives

In regard to this matter, and trust your own good sense and that of your friends will decide for the best.

Your friend,

"H. F. FINLEY."

That when she received this letter she was only fifteen years of age, under the control of her mother, and being well treated, provided for by her and her stepfather; that she did not know what to do, or how to act in the premises; and that she had no power, without the consent of her mother, to accept defendant's proffer of protection; that the defendant, Finley, did not come to see her, or take any steps to reinstate the divorce suit upon the docket of the Fayette Circuit Court, or to get any order as to her care and custody, so as to enable her to comply with her father's will; that on the 16th of May, 1890, then four months after he had received the funds, he paid over to his son, F. W. Inley, about $1,200 of the money devised to her by her father; that in February, 1893, he made a settlement of his accounts as her guardian with the judge of the Whitley County Court, in which he charged himself with $1,220.86 as a balance remaining in his hands as executor of her father. On this pleading the case was submitted, and the circuit judge decided that she was not entitled to any relief, and struck the case from the docket. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

It is the contention of appellees that this judgment should be affirmed for two reasons: First, because he was appointed and qualified as executor and received the assets in the District of Columbia, the domicile of testator at the time of his death; and that for this reason he can only be required to answer for the faithful discharge of his duties in the tribunals of the District of Columbia; second, that the averments of plaintiff's petition and the exhibits filed therewith clearly show a performance on his part of all the duties imposed upon him by testator's will, and a refusal on the part of plaintiff to comply with the conditions annexed to the bequest to her by the terms of the will.

Appellee has cited numerous authorities of great weight to support the contention that an executor can not be sued outside the jurisdiction of his appointment for a failure to carry out the trust imposed upon him; but in the early case of Dorsey's Ex'or v. Dorsey's Adm'r, 28 Ky., 280, it was held by this court, in an opinion by Judge Underwood, that the distributee of a decedent might enforce distribution in the courts of the State of assets received by an administrator appointed in Maryland if found in this State. This case was followed by that of Atcherson's Heirs v. Lindsey, 45 Ky., 86, in which the administrator and infant heirs of John Atcherson sought to recover of James Lindsey, who administered upon the estate of decedent in South Carolina, certain assets received by him in that State. And the contention was made in that case that as Lindsey was appointed administrator in South Carolina and received the assets sued for there, he could not be held responsible in the tribunals of this State for the surplus remaining in his hands at the suit of a local administrator and infant heirs of decedent. In response to this contention the court, through Judge Marshall, after referring to the case of Dorsey's Ex'or v. Dorsey's Adm'r, quoted supra, said: "Upon the express authority of this case, and under our own sense of what is required by convenience and justice, and of the comity due to the sovereignty and laws of South Carolina, we are of the opinion that the mere fact that Lindsey was appointed administrator in that State, and received there the assets for which he is now charged, does not of itself exempt him from all liability to be sued in the tribunals of this State for a claim growing out of his having thus received the assets, or the proceeds, of which the complainant, or some of them, are entitled. Whether any decree should finally be rendered against him on this account may depend upon the facts disclosed in his answer and upon the proof, but we think he was bound to answer."

The question was again before this court in Manion's Adm'r v. Titworth, 57 Ky., 597, and in a well-considered opinion by Judge Simpson it was decided that it was settled doctrine in this State "that the administrator or executor, who is appointed or who qualifies in another State, and there receives assets in his hands, may be sued in the tribunals of this State by the persons entitled to such assets, if he shall have removed to and settled in this State."

It follows from these decisions that appellant was entitled to maintain this suit against the appellee to recover the balance found due in his hands after the payment of the debts of the decedent in the courts of this State, if shown entitled thereto. It is apparent from even a casual reading of the will that two ideas were dominant in the mind of testator: First, he desired the bulk of the property owned by him should, after his death, go to his daughter for her education and maintenance; second, that she should be thrown under the influence of his friends and relations rather than those of her mother. To this end he directs that his executor should use all reasonable means and expense to find her and acquaint her with his history and character, and when found should take control of, raise and train her as his own daughter. The question then to be determined is whether appellee carried out in good faith the spirit and intention of testator's will with reference to his daughter, and whether she, with a full understanding of her rights, refused to accept the provision made for her with the annexed condition. It is essential to a correct decision of this question that we should look at the surroundings of the parties. Appellant at that time was only fifteen years old; she had never known her father; her life had been spent exclusively in the society and companionship of her mother and her friends, and on whom the burden and care of her support had, up to that time, been thrown. Her age, surroundings and opportunities in life rendered it wholly improbable that she would realize the importance of the proposition communicated to her by letter by an utter stranger, who, in this formal way, invited her to leave her mother and friends for the society and companionship of persons with whom she had no acquaintance, and of whom in all probability she had never heard. Besides, she could not have left the custody of her mother without her consent, even if she desired to do so, without violating the judgment of the Fayette Circuit Court, which at that time was in full force and effect. In qualifying as executor of his deceased friend appellant assumed to discharge delicate and solemn duties to his orphan and neglected child. Under these circumstances the two formal letters of appellant to her did not measure up to the full requirement of the duties assumed by him. The spirit of the will required that he should seek her out, make her personal acquaintance, detail to her the history, life and character of her deceased father, and to have impressed her with his sincerity and friendship for her, and the advantages which would have accrued to her from a loyal compliance with the wishes of her father. And when his attention was called to the conditions of the judgment of divorce, placing her in the custody of her mother, it was his duty to have gone before the judge of the court and asked his intervention, and that he be awarded the custody and clothed with the power to direct the education of this young girl. It seems that there can be no room to doubt that if these steps had been taken that some plan would have been devised under the judgment of the court to carry out the wishes of testator, and to have secured to appellant the provision made for her in her father's will. At least he should have given her, as suggested in his letter, some reasonable opportunity to change her mind, instead of hastening to pay over the money to his own son.

The trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to appellant's amended petition, and the judgment dismissing her petition is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FINLEY v. CITY OF WILLIAMSBURG.

Municipal government—Damages—Surface water—Instructions—Appellant brought this action against appellee, alleging that the city in constructing its streets and drains had collected the surface water, by diverting it from the natural course in which it was accustomed to flow, and throwing it in unusual quantities into the branch, without enlarging the culvert through which it was required to pass; that the overflow of appellant's lot thus occasioned caused great damage to appellant's property. The answer was a traverse, but admits that it did divert the drainage, covering a small area, from its natural course. It further alleges that this was done, and the culvert constructed more than fifteen years, and that the overflow complained of occurred more than five years before the institution of the action, and pleads the statute of limitation. A trial resulted in a verdict for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The proof showed that the overflows occurred every year for twelve years before the bringing of this suit, and frequently within five years. Held—That a city is liable to the property holder who has been damaged by the collection of surface water and its discharge upon his premises, provided the city did any act that caused the accumulation of surface water at the point charged. Each overflow of appellant's lot occurring within five years next before the institution of this action, if caused by appellee in the manner complained of, was a distinct trespass. So it is wholly immaterial whether the acts of appellee, which caused the increased flow of water on appellant's lot, were committed within fifteen years before the bringing of the action or not. It is sufficient if the conditions resulting from those acts continued to exist, and that in consequence thereof the injuries to appellant's property were caused within five years before the institution of the action. The court improperly instructed the jury that if appellant's property was injured by the overflow of surface water within five years before bringing the suit, and that such overflow was caused by appellee's manner of constructing the sewers on its streets, still they were not authorized to find for appellant unless they further believed from the evidence that the sewers were constructed within fifteen years before the institution of the action. They should have been instructed to find whether such conditions were produced by the acts of the appellee complained of; whether they existed at the time and were the cause of the overflow of and injury, if any, to appellant's lot, and finally whether the overflows occurred within the five years next before the bringing of the action. The court erred in giving the second instruction, authorizing the jury to apportion the damages in case the damage was caused by the insufficiency of the culvert. It was difficult, if not impossible, for the jury to perform the task required of them by this instruction.

R. S. Crawford for appellant.

Geo. P. Johnson and W. W. Lester for appellee.

Appeal from Whitley Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action was brought by appellant in the Whitley Circuit Court to recover of appellee, city of Williamsburg, damages for the overflow of his residence lot by surface water, and to compel appellee to enlarge its culvert, or provide other means of escape for the water, to prevent further injury to his property.

The overflow is alleged to have come from a branch or stream into which the city, in constructing its streets and drains, had collected the surface water, by diverting it from the natural course in which it was accustomed to flow, and throwing it in unusual quantities into the branch, without enlarging the culvert through which it was required to pass to such an extent as to carry it off; that the overflow of appellant's lot thus occasioned washed away the soil, and left pools of water, filled with filth from the privies and stables of his neighbors, standing on the lot, causing disagreeable and unhealthful odors, that compelled him to close the front of his house for days and weeks at a time.

The answer of appellee traverses the allegations of the petition, but admits that it did divert the drainage, covering a small area, from its natural course. It avers, however, that this was done and the culvert constructed more than fifteen years, and that the overflow complained of occurred more than five years before the institution of this action, and pleads the statute of limitation in bar of a recovery. Other matters of defense are relied on in the answer not necessary to consider, as they were practically ignored by the parties on the trial and by the court in the instructions given. The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict for appellee, and appellant's motion for a new trial having been overruled the case comes to this court by appeal. While the evidence introduced on the trial in the lower court was conflicting, much of it conduced to prove that appellant's property has been injured as alleged in the petition, and that the overflows of which he complains have occurred every year for twelve years next before the bringing of the suit, and frequently during the last five years of that time; and further, that some of appellee's streets, ditches and drains, by the opening of which the surface water was diverted from its natural course and thrown on appellant's lot in unusual volume, have been constructed in less than fifteen years of the institution of his action, and since the gutter complained of was made. It has been repeatedly held by this court that a city is liable to the property holder who has been damaged by the collection of surface water, and its discharge upon his premises, provided the city did any act that caused the accumulation of water at the point charged. A recent declaration of this doctrine will be found in Thoman v. City of Covington, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 117.

In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Cornelius, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1069, which was an action for damages for destruction of a field of tobacco in 1899 from the negligent construction of a culvert made by the railroad company in 1886, this court said: "The issue made in the evidence and presented to the jury by the instructions was upon the question whether the construction of the culvert was proper and skillful. This being so, it follows that the injury resulting from collecting the surface water upon the land opposite and casting it in a body upon appellee's land is not to be considered as of a permanent character, but each overflow was a distinct trespass, and the statute of limitation began to run only from the time when the overflow occurred."

The same doctrine was announced by this court in City of Louisville v. Coleburn, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 67, which was an action to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's property from the unskillful grading and paving of the carriage way of Twenty-fourth street, whereby the surface water accumulated and stood in the gutter, emitting foul and loathsome odors to such an extent as to poison the atmosphere around her lot. The plea of the statute of limitation was relied on to defeat a recovery, in discussing which this court said: "Ordinarily in actions for injury to real estate the plaintiff can only recover for injury done up to the commencement of the action. In addition to that it does not appear to us that the injury in this case is necessarily of a permanent character like that sustained from the construction and operation of a railroad, which in its nature is necessarily enduring. On the contrary it may be remedied by a regrade of the street, or, what is more probable, by the extension of the sewerage system of the city along this street." * * *

It is manifest that the oft-recurring overflow of plaintiff's lot, which appears to have been superinduced by appellee's diverting much of the surface water from its natural course, might have been prevented by enlarging its culvert or providing other means of escape for the water. Besides, the overflows that occurred within five years after the institution of the action would doubtless have been prevented if appellee had complied with its promise to provide for the escape of the water, which it seems to have made, to procure the dismissal of a former suit brought against it by appellant in the same court, for injuries similar to those now complained of.

In our view of the law, each overflow of appellant's lot occurring within five years next before the institution of this action, if caused by appellee, in the manner complained of, was a distinct trespass, as said in L. & N. R. R. Co. against Cornelius, supra. So it is wholly immaterial whether the acts of appellee which caused the increased flow of water on appellant's lot were committed within the fifteen years preceding the bringing of the action or not. It is sufficient if the conditions resulting from those acts continued to exist, and that in consequence thereof the injuries to appellant's property were caused within five years after the institution of the action.

We are of opinion that the court erred in giving instruction No. 1 as the law of the case, for it in effect told the jury that although the lot of the appellant may have been injured by overflow of surface water within five years next before the bringing of the action, and that such overflow was caused by appellee's manner of constructing the sewers on its streets, still they were not authorized to find for appellant unless they further believed from the evidence that the sewers were constructed within fifteen years before the institution of the action. It was not proper to submit to the jury the question of whether the conditions which caused the overflow of the lot were produced by appellee within or beyond the fifteen years next before the institution of the action, as it is not material, but they should have been instructed to find whether such conditions were produced by the acts of the appellee complained of, whether they existed at the time and were the cause of the overflow of and injury, if any, to appellant's lot, and finally, whether the overflows occurred within the five years next before the bringing of the action.

We likewise disapprove of the second instruction given by the circuit court as it erroneously directed the jury, if they found that appellant's damages were caused partly by reason of the insufficiency of the culvert to carry off the water, and partly by appellee's diverting water to it, but for which it would not have flowed to the culvert, they should find against appellee for such proportionate part of the damages as were caused by the diverting of the water. By this instruction the jury were led into the realm of speculation, and required to apportion the damages by allowing only such as resulted from the diversion of the water by appellee. It must be presumed that appellee knew the capacity of the gutter, and if it so negligently constructed its streets or sewers as to divert the surface water from its natural course, and throw it in increased volume where it would have to flow through the gutter in order to escape, and the gutter, by reason of its inability to accommodate the increased flow, caused the water to back upon and overflow appellant's lot, can it be said that the insufficiency of the gutter contributed any less to the injury of the lot than the diverting of the water? We think not. It was difficult, if not impossible, for the jury to perform the task required of them by this instruction. All that was needed on the point intended to be covered by it was a simple instruction defining the measure of damages applicable to the issues and state of facts presented.

On account of the errors contained in the instructions the cause is reversed and remanded for a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

LOUISVILLE AND JEFFERSONVILLE FERRY CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed June 13, 1900.)

Taxation—Statute of limitation—Section 4021, Kentucky Statutes, provides that a lien can not be enforced for taxes against property which has been transferred more than five years, but it does not limit the time within which an action shall be brought to enforce a lien for taxes against the owner. Taxes do not become due until after assessment, and the cause of action to recover same does not accrue until after assessment. Action to recover taxes are barred five years after assessment.

Humphrey & Davie for appellant.

M. H. Thatcher for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The questions involved in this case are the same as in five other cases of the same appellant against the same appellee, this day decided, except it is insisted that the statute of limitation bars a recovery. This court decided in Central Railway and Bridge Co. v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1890, that an action could be maintained under certain sections of the Kentucky Statutes, not necessary to mention, but it is sufficient to say the right to do so is not based on the act to which counsel refer. Section 4021, Kentucky Statutes, being a part of the act of November 11, 1892, gives the Commonwealth, and each county, incorporated city, town and taxing district a lien on the property assessed for the taxes due them respectively, which shall not be defeated by gift, devise, sale or alienation, or any means whatever, unless the gift, devise, sale or alienation shall have been made for more than five years before the institution of proceedings to enforce the lien, and nothing shall be exempt from levy and sale for taxes and cost incident to the sale. This section gives a state of case wherein the lien can not be enforced, but does not seem to limit the time in which the Commonwealth, county, city, etc., shall assert a lien against property undisposed of by the owner. We have examined the revenue act, and are unable to find any provision therein limiting the time in which an action shall be brought to enforce a claim for taxes against the owner. Taxes are liabilities created by statute and are barred after the lapse of five years after they are due and payable, and they do not become due until after the assessment is made (Section 2515, Kentucky Statutes.) These taxes were not assessed until 1898, and of course the statute does not bar a recovery.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEACHAM v. DEMOCRATIC STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, &c.

(Filed January 20, 1903.)

Appeals—Advancement of case—The transcript was filed in this court four days after the beginning of the term, and a motion made to docket and advance it for decision. Held—That the law does not authorize docketing and advancing the case. This court has uniformly held that under sections 753 and 754, Civil Code of Practice, appeals do not stand for trial unless the transcript is filed twenty days before the beginning of the term, except by consent of all parties in interest. Section 738, Civil Code of Practice, confirms this rule.

John W. Ray for appellant.

W. S. Pryor for appellee.

Appeal from Franklin Circuit Court.

Chief Justice Burnam delivered the following response to motion:

The appellant asks that the appeal in this case be docketed and advanced for decision at this term of the court. The judgment appealed from was rendered on the 6th day of January, 1903, and the appeal granted by the lower court. The record was filed in this court on the 9th day of January, 1903, four days after the beginning of the present term of this court.

The time for trial and decision of appeals in this court are regulated by sections 753 and 754 of the Civil Code, which are as follows:

"Section 753. Appeals shall stand for trial during the first term twenty days before which the transcript is filed in the clerk's office, if—

"1st. The appeal be granted by the inferior court; or—

"2d. The appearance of the appellee be entered five days before the day on which the case is set for trial on the docket; or—

"3d. The appellee be summoned actually twenty days, or constructively thirty days, before said day.

"Section 754. 1st. The clerk shall arrange the appeals upon the docket, setting the proper number for each day of the term; and in arranging them may have due regard to the convenience of litigants, in placing together the appeals from the several judicial districts.

"2d. He shall, at least fifteen days before each term, furnish a copy of the docket to the public printer, who shall immediately print not less than five hundred copies thereof, and send one of said copies to the clerk of each circuit court, chancery court, and court of common pleas, for public use; and the claim of the printer shall be approved and certified by the court, and be paid as other claims upon the treasury."

This court has uniformly held that under these provisions of the Code appeals do not stand for trial unless the transcript is filed twenty days before the beginning of the term, except by consent of all parties in interest. And this construction is abundantly fortified by section 738 of the Code, which provides:

"Section 738. The appellant shall file the transcript in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals at least twenty days before the first day of the second term of said court next after the granting of the appeal, unless the court extend the time, as, for cause shown, the court may do."

For these reasons the motion to docket and advance is overruled.

PIRMANN v. NEWPORT, LICKING AND ALEXANDRIA TURN-PIKE CO.

(Filed January 20, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Turnpikes—Negligence—Damages—Evidence—Appellant, in his petition, alleges that in riding over a bridge on appellant's road his horse stepped upon and broke through a defective and decayed plank in the floor, and that he was thrown from his horse to the floor and sustained severe and painful injuries, which confined him to his bed for several weeks, causing him great expense in nursing and medical attention, and sought to recover damages therefor. The petition also alleged that appellee knew, or could have known prior thereto by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, of the existence of such defective plank. At the close of appellant's evidence the court gave to the jury a peremptory instruction to find for appellee, from which ruling this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the peremptory instruction was improperly given. The evidence shows that the bridge spans a stream about eighteen feet wide and was sufficiently high for a man to walk under it without difficulty, and that several planks showed decay and cracks. The court improperly excluded evidence as to the general condition of the bridge. The law imposes upon turnpike companies the legal duty to keep its bridges safe for public travel, and to this end should cause such inspections to be made as ordinary care required, and to see that the timbers are strong and suitable for the purpose for which they are intended.

C. L. Ralson, Jr., and Ahlering & Caldwell for appellant.

S. C. Bailey for appellee.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Adolph Pirmann, instituted this suit against the appellee, the Newport, Licking and Alexandria Turnpike Co., and alleged in substance that on the 7th day of October, 1900, whilst riding horseback across a bridge on the defendant's road, his horse stepped upon and broke through a defective and decayed plank in the floor of the bridge; and that the defendant knew, or could have known prior thereto by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, of the existence of such defective plank; and that by reason thereof he was thrown from his horse against the floor of the bridge, sustaining serious injuries, from which he suffered great pain and was confined to his house and prevented from attending to his business for six weeks, and was compelled to and did pay $35 for medical services rendered him, and asked a judgment because of such injuries, suffering, medical attention, etc. The defendant controverted the affirmative averments of the petition, and plead contributory negligence. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the court directed the jury to find for the defendant upon the ground that there was no testimony conducing to show that the defendant company knew, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have known, of the decayed and rotten condition of the plank which broke, and from the judgment thereto plaintiff appeals.

The testimony is conclusive that the floor in defendant's bridge broke beneath the weight of plaintiff and his horse, as he was riding over it; and that in consequence thereof he was thrown from his horse and sustained injuries which confined him to his house for several weeks; and that they were of a very painful character, requiring the employment of a physician to whom he paid a fee of $35 for his services, besides other attention from members of his household. We do not agree with the contention of the trial court that there was no evidence conducing to show that the defect in defendant's bridge could not have been discovered by the use of ordinary care on their part. It was shown that the bridge spanned a stream eighteen feet wide, and was sufficiently high for a man to walk under it without difficulty.

Fred Weber, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he looked at the bridge after the accident from the under side and noticed that a plank close to the one which broke through was cracked entirely across and considerably sprung, and that there was also some rotten lumber on the side of the hole; and that he could see from the upper side that two other planks in the floor of the bridge were badly decayed. The plaintiff also offered to prove the general condition of the bridge, which the court, upon exception, refused to allow.

The law imposes upon turnpike companies the legal duty to keep its bridges safe for public travel, and to this end should cause such inspections to be made as ordinary care required, and to see that the timbers are strong and suitable for the purpose for which they are intended. In passing upon this question, in the case of the Frankfort Bridge Co. v. William, 39 Ky., 405, the court, through Judge Ewing, said: "The public is deeply interested in its being a safe bridge, the security and safety of the lives of the citizens as well as their property required that it should be constructed with care and caution, and its condition and safety well looked to by the company before they open their gates and hold out to the public inducements to venture upon it. It is not to be expected that the citizen when he approaches the bridge will alight and examine for himself to ascertain whether the bridge has been constructed in a workmanlike manner, and upon a suitable plan or with proper materials, but he has a right to look to and trust in the company that those things have been attended to and that the bridge is safe. If, therefore, the company have not attended to those things with ordinary vigilance at least, they are unquestionably liable to any persons who have been injured in their person or property by reason thereof."

We are of the opinion that the trial court erred in excluding testimony as to the general condition of this bridge. "The thing speaks for itself." And if the general appearance of the structure indicated neglect and decay, it was enough to put the defendant upon inquiry as to its condition.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WILSON, &c. v. WINSOR, LETTON, &c.

(Filed January 20, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Fraudulent conveyance—Husband and wife—Undue influence—In this action by appellees it is sought to cancel a deed of conveyance made by a husband and wife to a third party, who conveyed same to the husband for a consideration of $4,445.15, alleged to have been paid at the date the deed was executed. Mental incapacity and undue influence are alleged as grounds for cancellation of the deed. Held—That the evidence preponderates in favor of appellants that she was capable and competent to trade, transact business and protect her rights in business transactions with strangers, but that she was not capable and competent to deal with and protect her rights as against her husband, who, as the evidence shows, was a man of strong will power and a shrewd business man, and who had her love and confidence, she being under his control. The conveyance from the husband and wife to the husband's brother, and from the brother to the husband, was for the sole purpose of getting the title out of the wife and in the husband in order that it might descend to his child and prevent the heirs of the wife from receiving any benefit therefrom, and that the recited consideration in said deed of $4,445.15 was a pretense and false, and that she received no part of said consideration, and same was inserted in the deed to deceive. The marital relationship existing between these parties, the advanced age of the wife, the questionable strength of her will power and mind, and the unquestionable strength of his will power, makes this one of the cases which places the burden upon the grantee and those claiming under him to show by the clearest evidence that the wife understood the nature and effect of the transaction, and that it was fair and just to her.

Russell Mann, W. S. Pryor, J. M. McVey, E. M. Dickson and T. E. Ashbrook for appellants.

McMillan & Talbott for appellees.

Appeal from Bourbon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action has heretofore been in this court on appeal, as appears in 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1154. Judge Guffy, speaking for the court, reversed and remanded the cause, with directions to "set aside the agreement in the original suit and cancel the deed from the said Verlinda Cray to M. A. Cray, and the deed from M. A. Cray to John R. Cray, and adjudged the land to the real representatives or heirs at law of the said Verlinda Cray.

The court afterwards, in the same case, on petition for rehearing, said: "That so much of the opinion rendered in this case as directs the cancellation of the deed from Verlinda Cray to M. A. Cray, and the deed from M. A. Cray to John R. Cray, and adjudging the land to the real representatives and heirs at law of said Verlinda Cray, is withdrawn, but the residue of the opinion shall remain in full force, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the agreement and judgment rendered pursuant thereto and hold the same for naught, and the parties may litigate the questions involved in the original suit. In other words, all questions affecting the validity of the deed from Verlinda Cray to M. A. Cray, and the deed from M. A. Cray to John R. Cray, may be further litigated and the parties may, if they so desire, amend their pleadings and take such additional proof in support of, or adverse to, said deeds as they may desire."

On the return of this cause to the lower court appellants offered an amendment to their answer, pleading the statute of limitation. The lower court, in the exercise of its discretion, refused to allow the plea to be filed, and this court is of opinion that the lower court did not abuse its discretion in so refusing. A great many witnesses were heard on each side; the one to show that Verlinda Cray was, by reason of her advanced age, ill health and mental incapacity, incompetent to trade, transact business and dispose of her property and protect her rights, and also that her husband, John R. Cray, was a man of strong will power and a shrewd business man and trader. The other to show that Verlinda Cray was strong in body and mind and fully capable of knowing her property, the value of it, and of disposing of it with a fixed purpose and intention, and fully capable of protecting her rights in all transactions. The lower court, upon this evidence, found for the appellees.

We are of the opinion that the evidence preponderates in favor of appellants that she was capable and competent to trade, transact business and protect her rights in business transactions with strangers, but that she was not capable and competent to deal with and protect her rights as against her husband, who, as the evidence shows, was a man of strong will power and a shrewd business man, and who had her love and confidence, she being under his power and control. Let us consider the subject of undue influence independent of incompetency as affecting transactions between husband and wife.

In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 1395, we find this language: "Courts of equity examine every such transaction between husband and wife with anxious watchfulness, caution and dread of undue influence."

To the same effect is the doctrine laid down by this court in the case of Golding v. Golding, 82 Ky. Reps., 55: "The chancellor, at the instance of the wife, will scrutinize closely the conduct of the husband and the motive influencing the wife to part with her estate, and when the husband, having won the affections of his wife, has such an influence over her as to make her entirely subordinate to his will, the chancellor will not undertake to adjudge that the parties are dealing at arm's length and hold the wife to the contract, as he would a stranger. The husband will not be allowed to take advantage of the marital relation so as to invest himself with title to the wife's estate, and then insist upon her ability to resist his importunities as a reason to make her stand by the executed agreement investing him with title."

The court is of the opinion that the conveyance from Verlinda Cray and her husband to his brother, M. A. Cray, and from M. A. Cray back to his brother, John R. Cray, was for the purpose, and only purpose, of getting the title out of Verlinda Cray and in John R. Cray, that it might descend to his child and prevent Verlinda Cray's heirs from receiving any benefit therefrom; and that the recited consideration in said deed of $4,445.15 was a pretense and false, and that she received no part of said consideration, and same was inserted in the deed to deceive.

For proof of this fact we refer to the following language in the answer of John R. Cray, filed in the original action in 1891 of Verlinda Cray against him, after traversing the allegations of the petition, in general terms, viz.: "Defendant says that his said wife had no children at the time of her marriage to him or at the time of the execution of said deed; she was then about fifty years of age and it was highly improbable, if not impossible, that any children would be born to her; and she expressed the desire to give to ----- all of her real estate, and states that she desired and intended that he and his children should have the same because of her affection for them; and the said conveyance and sale of said land to M. A. Cray was made at her special instance and request, and the same was wholly voluntary upon her part."

If it was a fact that she actually received $4,445.15 in hand paid, as stated in the deed, why the necessity of using this language in his answer and seek to change the consideration, or in part change that named in the deed to love and affection? This of itself makes it evident to our mind that all was not fair and equitable on the part of John R. Cray and M. A. Cray. We also refer to the depositions of J. B. Cray and J. A. L. Wilson, the former being the son of M. A. Cray, and the other the son of appellant, and also the deposition of J. N. Ross, cashier of the Carlisle Deposit Bank. Wilson and Cray profess to have been present when said deed was executed and saw M. A. Cray pay to Verlinda Cray the amount of cash named in the deed, and that Verlinda Cray gave all of it to her husband except $1,000, which she retained. Young Cray claimed that he received the cash on a check of his father, payable to him one or two days prior to the date of the deed, April 28, 1879. The bank's books, as shown by the evidence of Ross, the cashier, show that no such transaction took place; that no such amount of money was drawn by M. A. Cray in favor of any one, from April 1, 1879, to August 13, 1879, and on August 13, 1879, his account is charged with a check given to Verlinda Cray for $2,222.57 on a check professed to have been given April 28, 1879, the date of the deed. And on September 1, 1879, his account is also charged with a check to Verlinda Cray for $1,722.59. It is certain that M. A. Cray did not, on April 28, 1879, pay to Verlinda Cray $4,445.15 in money, and also on the same date give her the two checks named above. We are convinced that the young men were mistaken about seeing the cash on that occasion, and it is possible that these checks were an after-thought, to further the deception, and were given about August and September, and were dated back to correspond with the deed.

The marital relationship existing between these parties and the advanced age of Verlinda Cray, and the questionable strength of her will power and mind, and the unquestionable strength of his will power, makes this one of the cases which places the burden upon the grantees and those claiming under him to show by the clearest evidence that Verlinda Cray, his wife, understood the nature and effect of the transaction, and that it was fair and just to her.

In the case of Smith, &Co. v. Snowden, &Co., 96 Ky. Reps., 36 38, this court, Judge Hazelrigg rendering the opinion of the court, says: "The learned chancellor was doubtless guided by the general rule that the plaintiff, who seeks to set aside a deed of the character here involved, must take the burden, and make out affirmatively a case of fraud or the existence of undue influence. * * *

"We may say in general that when such a relation exists the person obtaining the benefit must show, by the clearest evidence, that the transaction was freely and voluntarily entered into, and devoid of inequitable incidents. A most important feature in this case is the false recital of the consideration. These old people were themselves as clay in the hands of the potter. As to them the question of consideration was immaterial, but it appeared important to the grantees to show to those equally and naturally interested in the partition about to be made of the estate that a bona fide sale had been consummated for a valuable consideration. The recital of the false consideration carries with it the thought and purpose of a designing and intentional concealment of the truth, and this falsehood and concealment are the highest evidences of the fraudulent intent with which the writings were procured; not necessarily of actual but of constructive fraud, assumed in view of the relation of the superior contracting with the inferior, the independent with the dependent, the strong with the weak. The grantees, it seems to us, can find no relief in assuming the position, after the attack on the deeds was made, that the real consideration was love and affection, and an agreement to care for the grantors during the remainder of their lives."

In the case before us it is shown by the evidence that at least John R. Cray was superior in intellect and of much stronger will power than his wife, and that he obtained a great advantage of his wife in the transaction, as he obtained all her property, and recited a false consideration therefor, and under such circumstances the burden was on him to show, by the clearest evidence, that the transaction was freely and voluntarily entered into, and devoid of inequitable incidents.

Appellant failing to show this, the judgment of the lower court is, therefore, affirmed.

DILAS' ADM'R v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RY. CO.

(Filed January 20, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligence—Trespassers—J., by permission of a superintendent of appellee company, was riding on a tricycle belonging to him on the railroad and D. was riding with him on his invitation. Just before reaching their destination a passenger train struck the tricycle and killed both J. and D. This action was instituted to recover damages for killing D. At the close of appellant's testimony the court gave a peremptory instruction to find for appellee, and this appeal is prosecuted from that ruling. Held—That the peremptory instruction was properly given. The proof showed that the injury occurred very early in the morning, when it was very foggy, and that after the engineer discovered their presence he did all he could to prevent the injury, and as J. and D. were both trespassers the company owed them no duty until it discovered their peril.

2. Evidence—The court properly excluded testimony to show that the superintendent told J. that he did not care if he used the tricycle. It also properly excluded evidence to show that appellee had permitted its track to be used by the public for travel at the place where the accident occurred, as mere acquiescence on the part of the railroad company in the use of the track by the public does not confer any authority or right, or amount to a license, to use the same.

J. B. Bennett, W. T. Cole and Cole & Son for appellant.

W. H. Wadsworth for appellee.

Appeal from Greenup Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, L. T. Mowry, as administrator of the estate of Crit Dillas, deceased, instituted this action in the Greenup Circuit Court against appellee, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., to recover damages for the alleged negligent and wrongful killing of his intestate, October 28, 1897, by a passenger train in charge of its servants. The answer traverses the allegations of the petition and avers negligence on the part of the decedent.

Upon the trial in the lower court, and at the conclusion of appellant's evidence, the jury found for appellee upon a peremptory instruction from the court, and appellant having been refused a new trial, prosecutes this appeal. It appears from the record that the intestate, at the invitation of one Ad. Jacobs, was riding with him upon a railroad tricycle from the latter's house into the village of Russell, where he (Jacobs) was employed in the shops, presumably of appellee, when but a short distance from Jacobs' house, and within three miles of Russell, the tricycle was struck by the passenger train, and both Jacobs and Dilas were killed. The accident occurred between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning. A dense fog prevailed at the time, which doubtless obstructed the view of the two men on the tricycle, as well as that of the engineer and fireman on the train. It appears that the collision took place at a point about four hundred yards from a private crossing, known as Powell's crossing, and that between that crossing and Russell were two other crossings, both of which were public crossings, one, Pond Run, or Chinn's crossing, being a quarter of a mile to a half mile from Powell's crossing, and the other, Clancy's crossing, being about the same distance from Chinn's crossing.

While the evidence is somewhat conflicting, it fairly establishes the following facts that the train was running on time, and not at an unusual rate of speed: That it gave no signal, either by the ringing of its bell, or the blowing of its whistle, for the Powell crossing, but it did give the usual whistle signal for the Chinn public crossing, which, as stated, was a quarter or half mile from the Powell crossing, and one or more witnesses testify that the train whistled for the Clancy crossing.

In view of the foregoing facts we are unable to see why appellee should be held accountable for the death of appellant's intestate, for as he and Jacob were mere trespassers in thus making use of appellee's track, the latter's servants in charge of the train were under no duty to keep a lookout for them, nor does the evidence show any negligence on the part of those in charge of the train in failing to use all reasonable means to avoid the injury after discovering Dilas and Jacobs on the track. It is contended, however, that as there is evidence tending to show that the tricycle on which the parties were riding was owned by one Stout, appellee's road superintendent, and that Jacobs, with his permission, had used it for nearly two years on appellee's track in going to and from his house to Russell, his use of the track was thereby known to and acquiesced in by appellee, for which reason he and Dilas were not trespassers in thus using the track. It must be borne in mind that Jacobs, if in the employment of appellee at all, was employed to work in its shops at Russell. He had nothing to do with the track or road-bed, nor did his duties, so far as this record discloses, require him to travel over appellee's track with, or without, a tricycle, and certainly he was without authority, either express or implied, to take Dilas on the tricycle with him.

In Ky. Central R. R. Co. v. Gastineau's Adm'r, 83 Ky., 119, it was held by this court that even where one undertakes to assist an employe of a railroad company at the request of such employe, "it (the railroad company) is not required to use care to anticipate and discover the peril to such a person, but only to do so after the discovery of the danger, until then no legal duty is imposed upon it, because no one by a wrongful act can impose a duty upon another."

The doctrine announced in the case supra was followed and re-affirmed in Eastern Ky. Railway Co. v. Powell, &c., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1051, in which case the injuries sued for were inflicted in a collision between a train and hand car, the latter having been furnished by the station agent of the railroad company for the use of himself and others. In discussing in this case the want of authority on the part of the station agent to run or allow the use of hand cars on the railroad track, the court said: "There was an entire absence of proof showing Irwin had any authority to use, or to authorize any one else to use, defendant's road in the manner stated. Besides, the presumption might be indulged that the officers of a railroad would not permit a subordinate like Irwin to go upon its track, or allow others to do so, with a hand car at will, when special trains were being frequently run over the road. If he had no authority to so use the track, he could not vest any one else with such authority."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the lower court did not err in refusing to allow appellant's counsel to prove a conversation between the road superintendent, Stout, and Ad. Jacobs, in which the former said he "did not care" if the tricycle was used by Jacobs. We are also of the opinion that the court properly excluded the evidence offered by appellant, to the effect that persons had been permitted by appellee to use its track for travel at the place of the accident and from there to Russell. It was not shown by the avowal of what the witness would state, by whom and to what extent the track had been used, and, besides, as said by this court in Brown's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 145, "the mere acquiescence on the part of the railroad company in the use of the track by the public does not confer any authority or right, or amount to a license, to use the same."

Appellant has failed to plead the alleged consent of appellee's road superintendent to the use of the tricycle by Jacobs and Dilas, or that he had authority from appellee to give such consent, nor does he plead the alleged license from appellee to the public to the use of its track as a walkway.

In Embry v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 434, it was held in an action against a railroad company to recover for injuries resulting from its negligence that "the petition is fatally defective in failing to show that plaintiff had any right to be on the track, or that defendant owed him any duty, and, therefore, a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant was proper."

The law is well settled in this State by numerous decisions of this court, that as to persons who are trespassers upon its track a railroad company can only be held liable in damages for injuries inflicted by its trains, where it is shown that the danger to the injured party was discovered in time for the injury to have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care on the part of those in charge of the train. In addition to the cases above indicated the following may be cited in support of the doctrine announced, viz.: Haskins' Adm'r v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 78; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Wade, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 549, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Tinkham's Adm'r, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1784.

It is contended for appellant that appellee's engineer was guilty of negligence in failing to have the headlight of the engine burning at the time of the collision, but we are unable to see that any good could have resulted from the use of the headlight in such a fog as that which enveloped the railroad track and contiguous territory, and the engineer, whose statements are uncontradicted, testified that the headlight was extinguished at Russel because of no further service in affording light. We do not believe that appellee's servants in charge of the train, under the existing conditions, could have anticipated that persons would be on the track with a tricycle, nor was it their duty to do so. The collision occurred where appellee's track ran through a field, and at a point four hundred yards from the nearest crossing. The train, according to the evidence, was making a great noise at the time, and gave as it approached the usual signal at each of the public crossings, Clancy's and Chinn's. It was not required to whistle for the Powell private crossing, though it may at times have theretofore done so.

It is manifest, therefore, that those in charge of the train did not discover the peril of Jacobs and Dilas in time to avoid the collision. Upon the other hand, it does appear that Jacobs and Dilas were familiar with the running of the trains on appellee's road, and it follows that in venturing to use appellee's track with the tricycle, in the face of an approaching train, they were guilty of the grossest negligence, but for which they would not have been killed.

Being of the opinion that the circuit judge did not err in giving the peremptory instruction asked by appellee, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Judge Paynter not sitting because he was a witness in the case.

POWERS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Petition for rehearing—An opinion of this court reversing a judgment of conviction of appellant was filed at the September term, 1902, and a petition for rehearing was tendered and offered to be filed, to which appellant objects. Held—That the provisions of section 760, Civil Code, authorizing the filing of petitions for rehearing, does not apply to criminal cases, but this court has, by virtue of its appellate jurisdiction in such cases, power to suspend the issual of the mandate and rehear the case during the term at which it is tried. But if the power is not exercised during the term the decision in the case becomes final, and the court has no jurisdiction at a subsequent term to retry the appeal. Petition for rehearing refused to be filed.

J. R. Morton, J. G. Sims and J. B. Finnell for appellant.

T. C. Campbell, R. B. Franklin, T. B. Sebree, John K. Hendrick, B. G. Williams, Victor F. Bradley, L. W. Arnett, T. Earl Ashbrook and Davis Dundon for appellee.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Chief Justice Burnam delivered the following response to motion for rehearing:

On the first day of the present January term of this court the Commonwealth of Kentucky tendered and asked permission to file a petition for rehearing in the case of the Commonwealth v. Caleb Powers, charged with murder, which was tried and decided at the last September term of this court. The defendant, by counsel, objects to the filing of this petition on the ground that there is no authority for such proceeding.

Appeals to this court in felony cases are regulated by section 836 of the Criminal Code, which provides as follows:

"An appeal may be taken by the defendant in the following manner only:

"1st. The appeal must be prayed during the term at which the judgment is rendered, and the prayer noted on the record in the circuit court. The appeal shall be granted as a matter of right.

"2d. When an appeal is prayed the court shall, if the defendant desire it, make an order that the execution of the judgment be suspended until the expiration of the period within which the defendant is required to lodge a transcript of the record in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals. After the expiration of such period the judgment shall be executed unless the defendant shall have filed in the clerk's office of the court rendering the judgment the certificate, as provided in subsection 8 of this section, that the appeal has been taken, or a copy of the order of the Court of Appeals granting further time to lodge the transcript.

"3d. The appeal is taken by lodging in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals, within sixty days after the judgment, a certified transcript of the record. The clerk of the Court of Appeals shall thereupon issue a certificate that an appeal has been taken which shall suspend the execution of the judgment until the decision upon the appeal.

"Section 357. Appeals in criminal cases shall take precedence over all other business of the court, and be placed first upon the docket for trial.

"Section 358. They shall stand for trial at the first term succeeding the lodging of the transcript in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals, provided it be so lodged ten days before the commencement of the term.

"Section 359. When an appeal by the defendant in a case of felony is lodged within ten days before the commencement of the term, or during the term, it shall stand for trial on the tenth day after it is so lodged."

"Section 360. The appeal shall be decided at the same term at which it is tried."

It will be observed that all these provisions of the Criminal Code look to a speedy trial and decision of felony cases by this court. No provision is made for a rehearing by the defendant, and except in cases expressly provided for by statute a rehearing is not a matter of right. But we are of the opinion that this court has, by virtue of its appellate jurisdiction in such cases, power to suspend the issual of the mandate and rehear the case during the term at which it is tried. But if the power is not exercised during the term the decision in the case becomes final, and the court has no jurisdiction at a subsequent term to retry the appeal. In Nelson v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky., 594, it was decided that section 760 of the Civil Code applied to civil cases only, and as there was no provision in the Criminal Code for time in which to file a petition for rehearing, that in case of an affirmance of the judgment of conviction the mandate might issue immediately. The question in that case partly involved the decision of the one before us, and we are of the opinion that this court has no jurisdiction to grant a rehearing in this case at this term of the court.

Motion overruled.

Whole court sitting.

MASTERSON v. MASTERSON.

(Filed January 20, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Parent and child—Custody of child—A divorce having been granted appellant from her husband, the appellee, the lower court gave the custody of their infant child, a girl about eight years of age, to her father, and appellant has prosecuted this appeal. Held—That the lower court did not err in giving the custody of the child to her father, as he was in law entitled to its custody and bound for its support besides the evidence shows that the family and surroundings of the husband were such as to promote the moral and social interests of the child in every way, while the evidence as to the surroundings of the mother showed a lack of conditions that would be beneficial to the child. This court is indisposed to interfere with the decision of a chancellor concerning the custody of children unless he abuses that discretion. He is familiar with the witnesses and the surroundings of parties, and better qualified to pass upon such questions.

C. T. Atkinson and Geo. S. & John A. Fulton for appellant.

John S. Kelley and Nat. W. Halstead for appellee.

Appeal from Nelson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The question on this appeal is the right of the divorced husband (appellee) to the custody of the infant child, Mary Ruth, as against the divorced wife (appellant), the child's mother. This case has been twice before in this court on appeal. (20 Ky. Law Rep., 681; 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1196.)

The first judgment appealed from dealt mainly with the subject of alimony and maintenance. But it gave to appellee, the father, the custody of this child. In the opinion reversing that judgment as to alimony, and the maintenance of appellant, concerning the custody of the child it was said: "Appellant should also be given the custody of the infant child * * * unless there are insuperable obstacles to this not apparent from the record now before us."

On the return of the case to the circuit court further preparation of the case on both branches, that is, as to alimony and the custody of the child, was made. On the second appeal the only question decided was the one of alimony. The other question had not been decided by the circuit court. Upon that branch this court said: "That matter is yet before the chancellor, whose special duty and prerogative it is to carefully consider and conserve the interest of the child."

The circuit court, upon the evidence before it on the first trial, and the additional evidence brought into the record since, and after a privy examination of the child (now about eight years of age), adjudged that the father should have its custody for the present. From that judgment the mother has prosecuted this appeal. For appellant it is contended that this court, in controlling terms, decided, in the first opinion that she should be given the custody of the child unless there was some "insuperable obstacle" not then apparent from the record; that the facts then in the record would not alone be enough to sustain the chancellor's judgment giving the custody of the child to the father. Exactly what was meant by the term "insuperable obstacle" was not further stated in that opinion.

On the second appeal we said of this phrase: "The court intended thereby and expressly authorized a further investigation by the circuit court before requiring the custody of the child to be delivered to the mother."

The court could not have meant in the first instance to decide that, as a matter of law, the mother was entitled to the custody of her children, upon a separation from her husband unless the record presented insuperable obstacles thereto, as that term is commonly understood.

On the contrary, if the welfare of the child be equally conserved by its custody by either parent, the father, being under legal obligation for its support, is generally entitled to its custody and control. (McBride v. McBride, 1 Bush, 15; Merritt v. Swinley, 82 Va., 433.) What the court then must have meant was that, in view of the then state of the record, the sex and very tender age of the child at that time, its best interests appeared to be to consign it to the mother, but that further investigation of that question was authorized; and then, if the additional facts developed did not show an "insuperable obstacle," that is, one which in law would have been sufficient in the first instance to control the chancellor's judgment to the contrary, the child's custody should be awarded to the mother.

Thus the question is presented as though an original one, under the declaration by the court that mere excessive temper on the part of the mother (the only fact originally appearing that would militate against her claim for custody of the child) was not sufficient to exclude her claim. The facts since added tend to confirm the wisdom of the chancellor's final conclusion on this point. Without going into the detail, we will say that appellant's present circumstances and surroundings, whilst not reprehensible, indeed, rather moving one's sympathy than criticism, are such as to make it very questionable whether it would be just to the child to change its present home for hers. Appellee, who is making his home with his parents, is affording the child fair opportunities for education, and she is there surrounded by conditions conducive in a high degree to her comfort, and moral, physical and intellectual development. After all, and indeed first of all, the welfare of the child is the controlling question. (Kentucky Statutes, section 2123.) The situation of the chancellor, his presumed acquaintance with the parties and local surroundings, afford him peculiarly valuable opportunities for determining such questions. It should be only where there is a manifest abuse of his discretion in such case that his judgment should be interfered with. Should conditions change, making it proper to change his judgment, the statute gives him the right to alter the judgment so as to protect the child's welfare throughout its minority. It will doubtless be his pleasure, as it is his duty, to make such orders as will allow appellant more of the presence of this child, when, and as conditions may change, so as to make same proper.

We are unable to see that the judgment is erroneous. It is, therefore, affirmed.

1354 MORELAND'S ADM'R, &C. V. CITIZENS SAV. BANK.

MORELAND'S ADM'R, &c. v. CITIZENS SAVINGS BANK.

(Filed January 21, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Bills and notes—Duty of notary in protesting bills—Two bills for $5,000, one for $3,685, one for $3,000, and one for $3,200, were sought to be collected by suit, and the drawer and endorser seek to escape liability on the notes on the ground that the law was not observed in noting protest, giving notice of protest and writing the instruments of protests by the notaries public. The notary who protested the bills for $5,000 on the day of their maturity endorsed on them "protested for nonpayment," and in addition to that gave the day of the month and year, to which endorsement he affixed his official signature. Held—That the endorsements on the bill made by the notary were sufficient noting, and the instruments of protest were written soon thereafter and notices duly sent as required by law. The proof showing that the notary who protested two other notes made a similar noting on separate slips, but destroyed them after writing out the instruments of protest, was a sufficient compliance with the law. The only object of noting the protest is to make a basis to write out the proper instrument of protest.

2. Construction of bill—Supplying omitted words—A bill payable "one hundred and eighty days" is construed to mean that it is payable "one hundred and eighty days after date," and the protest was duly made on that idea.

3. Notice of protest—Assignment for benefit of creditors—After an assignment has been made by the maker of a note for the benefit of his creditors a notice to the assignor is sufficient to preserve his liability, and the holder of it is entitled to participate in the distribution of the estate.

4. Usury—The report of the commissioner purging the bills of usury not being excepted to in the lower court can not be questioned on appeal, and same is approved.

W. S. Pryor and Walker & Slack for appellants.

J. A. Dean for appellee.

Appeal from Davies Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The issue herein arises over certain bills of exchange. There is no issue as to the drawing, acceptance and endorsement of them. In this action it is sought to hold the accommodation drawer and endorser responsible on them. The payment is sought to be avoided by the drawer and endorser of same on the grounds that the law was not observed in noting protest, giving notice of protest and writing the instruments of protest by the notaries public.

Two of the bills over which there is a controversy are for $5,000 each, one for $3,685, one for $3,000, and one for $3,200. These bills were drawn by J. P. Moreland, accepted by S. D. Walden and endorsed by J. P. Fuqua. It appears that the bills (unless the one for $3,685 was not) were protested on the days that they matured. As to that bill it is insisted that it was not protested until the day after its maturity. That defense is interposed in addition to the others heretofore stated. I. N. Parish, N. P., protested the bills for $5,000 each on the days of their maturity and endorsed on them "protested for nonpayment," and in addition to that gave the day of the month and year, to which endorsement he affixed his official signature. W. H. Moore was the notary who protested the bill for $3,000 and the one for $3,200.

No memorandum noting the protest was left attached to either of the bills by the notary, nor was such endorsement made upon them. Either on the day the bills were protested, or on a subsequent day, the instruments of protest were written, but the evidence leaves no doubt that the notices of protest were duly mailed to the drawer and indorser of the several bills on the days they were protested.

The first thing which we will consider is whether the noting by Parish was sufficient. The authorities seem to be agreed that the noting or initial protest was unknown to the law as distinguished from the protest, but that it has grown into practice within recent years. It seems to be well established that if the instruments of protest are not written shortly after the demand and protest, the noting or initial protest is necessary as a basis for the instrument of protest. (2 Denials on Negotiable Instruments, 4th edition, section 939.)

This court, in Reed v. Bank of Kentucky, 1 Mon., 63, had under consideration the question as to the necessity of noting. The court said: "The protest was drawn up so soon as the ordinary course of business would permit, or at least in sufficient time to supersede the necessity of noting the bill at the moment."

The court seemed to be of the opinion that if the instrument of protest was written as soon as the ordinary course of business would permit, or at least in sufficient time to supersede the necessity of noting the bill at the moment, then those sought to be held liable were bound. We are of the opinion that the endorsements which Parish made on the bills were sufficient. The facts as to the bills protested by Parish differ somewhat from those protested by Moore.

We will not go into the discussion of the question of the competency of evidence to prove the course of business of notaries in protesting paper, neither is it necessary for us to determine whether the instruments of protest were written on the day the bills matured or on a subsequent day, hence the necessity is obviated of determining whether the proof is sufficient to impeach the dates of the instruments of protest, they bearing dates that the bills matured. If the noting of protest was made, the instruments of protest could have been prepared thereafter. Moore testified that when he protested the bills he attached to each of them a memorandum showing the protest, but when the instruments of protest were written he destroyed it, as he had no further use for it. Counsel for appellee urges that the preservation of these slips was essential to the validity of the protest in extenso, as they form a necessary part of the record in establishing the steps that must be taken in order to fix liability upon the drawer and endorser.

The object of noting is to have a record from which the instrument of protest can be written so a notary will not be required to rely upon his memory as to the facts. If the noting was made, the destruction of it, whether it was purposely or accidentally done, could not invalidate the instrument of protest which was based upon it. It reserves the right of the notary to prepare that instrument, and, when done, the essential steps have been taken to fix the liability upon the accommodation drawer and endorser. The bill having been protested for nonpayment and notice having been given to the drawer and endorser, the noting having taken place and the instrument of protest having been executed, the liability of the drawer and endorser was fixed. The destruction of the paper upon which the noting was made could not relieve them of the liability that had attached by the necessary act of the notary. After the several bills were drawn, and before their maturity, Moreland made an assignment to E. P. Taylor for the benefit of his creditors. When the bills were protested notices of protest were not sent to the assignee, but to Moreland. It is insisted that as the assignee accepted the trust and qualified as such assignee, notices of protest should have been given to him, instead of to Moreland, in order to bind the trust estate.

The exact question here presented has not been before this court, although this court in Callahan v. Bank of Kentucky, 82 Ky., 231, held that notice of the dishonor of a bill to one who is the assignee of the payee was sufficient. But the court said: "We must not be understood as determining whether a notice of the dishonor of negotiable paper sent to the bankrupt or insolvent alone, and not to the assignee, would or would not be sufficient, as that question is not presented in this case."

The text-writers upon this question are extremely unsatisfactory. 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 500, in speaking of the person to whom notice of protest should be given in the case of a bankrupt, says: "That perhaps the notice should be given to the assignee, if the holder knows, or might know by the exercise of due diligence, that the estate is in his hands," but he adds: "But notice might perhaps even then be sufficient if given to the bankrupt." Byles on Bills, page 216, says: "If the drawer of the bill become bankrupt, notice must nevertheless be given to him, in all events before the choice of assignees; if the assignees are appointed, perhaps notice should be given to them." Daniel on Negotiable Paper, section 1002, says: "If the party be bankrupt, it is best to give notice to him and to his assignee also. If there be yet no assignee appointed, notice to him is sufficient, and perhaps it might be sufficient, even if one had been appointed. If given to the assignee alone, it would probably be sufficient."

When a party assigns all of his property for the benefit of his creditors and places it in the hands of a trustee for distribution, all of his creditors are entitled to participate in the distribution of it. This is true whether the debts have matured or not. Moreland's liability on these bills existed at the time of the assignment, and if it was preserved, then the holder of them was entitled to participate in the distribution of the proceeds of the assigned estate. He being personally liable to the holder, it was important to it that he receive notice of protest that that liability might be preserved. When that liability was preserved it seems to us to necessarily follow that the holder of the bills is entitled to participate in the trust estate, because the very purpose of his assignment was to pay his liabilities in full or pro rata as the case may be. We conclude that notice to Moreland was sufficient to preserve his liability, and if his liability continued, there is no escape from the conclusion that the holder of the bills which evidenced it was entitled to participate in the distribution of the estate.

The bill for $3,685 reads as follows:

"Citizens Savings Bank. Owensboro, Ky., March 29, 1892. $3,685.

"No 14,773. One hundred and eighty days pay to the order of J. A.

For value received, with interest at ten per centum per annum after maturity, until paid. And charge to account of

"J. P. MORELAND.

"To S. V. WALDEN, City."

The note was protested upon the idea that the bill was payable 180 days after date. It is insisted for the appellant that it was due within 180 days. In our opinion the words import that the bill was due 180 days after date. It is often necessary for a court, by construction, to supply words obviously omitted through oversight, to give an instrument the meaning manifestly intended. In order to construe it as meaning within 180 days we would have to supply the word "within." We know from the customary way of drawing such instruments that they are usually payable at the time specified after the date upon which they are drawn. The parties did not mean that the money should be paid on or before 180 days, and if we should hold that it was to have been paid within 180 days, we should in effect hold that it was to be paid on or before 180 days.

The commissioner, to whom the case was referred to purge the bills of usury, made a report showing that he had done so. No exceptions were filed to the report and no question made as to the correctness of it, except in the brief in this court. It is too late to raise the question. It was the duty of the appellants, had there been a correction which should have been made in the report of the master commissioner, to have called the lower court's attention to it so that he could have had an opportunity to make the correction. Besides, we fail to find an error in the report of the master commissioner.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOOLLEY, &c. v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE, &c.

1. Municipal taxation—Liens—These three action were instituted to enforce the lien of the city for taxes for the years 1885-1900, inclusive. Mrs. Wolley died in February, 1897, leaving her husband and two daughters, who are the appellants herein. Actions were instituted at different times for taxes due for certain years on the several pieces of property, and appeals were had involving the question of revivor of the action, when the court held that the life interest of the husband could be subjected to the payment of the taxes without a revivor. The actions were consolidated and numerous pleadings filed, with ample time for preparation, and a trial resulted in favor of appellee, enforcing the lien. On this appeal numerous grounds are relied on for a reversal.

2. Premature trial—The objection that the action was submitted before it regularly stood for trial can not be considered on appeal, as it was a clerical misprision, and the court had power to vacate or modify it on motion under section 763, Civil Code of Practice, and no motion has been made to set it aside in the lower court. Although the court struck from the files certain amended answers, they were but reiteration of defenses previously filed.

3. Proof prima facie sufficient to sustain claim for taxes—It is insisted that the allegations of the petitions being denied the proof is insufficient to sustain a recovery. Held—That under section 2996, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that a tax bill authenticated by the assessor shall be prima facie proof that all steps have been taken to make it a binding tax bill. This statute has been declared to be valid. Substituted tax bills were on file in the papers, but the clerk by an oversight had failed to mark them "filed." This omission of the clerk does not affect the rights of parties. While there is no order of court filing the original tax bills, it is stated in the pleadings that they were filed, and this allegation not being controverted, it will, therefore, be assumed that the statements of the pleadings are true. Proof of ordinances levying taxes was not necessary as the court must take judicial knowledge of the ordinances under sections 2761 and 2775, Kentucky Statutes. When the city shows a tax bill made out and signed by the assessor, a prima facie case is made out as fully as if there had been no denial of the regularity of the tax bill, and it is unnecessary for the city to show that all the steps required by the statute in levying the tax were taken. The burden then shifts to the defendant to show that the proper steps were not taken. The assessor may make duplicate tax bills in case any should be lost, and they will have the same legal effect as the originals.

4. Res judicata—Injunction—A judgment enjoining the collection of taxes for 1894 does not prohibit the recovery of taxes for subsequent years.

5. Statute of limitation—Lack of diligence in the prosecution of actions to recover taxes for more than five years does not bar a recovery.

6. Questions settled on former appeal—Revivor—The question as to the liability of the life estate of the husband for the taxes, also the question as to revivor against the heirs of the wife, were settled on former appeals.

7. Constitutional law—Interest on unpaid taxes—Interest on unpaid taxes is not unconstitutional as it is in the nature of penalties. How taxes shall be levied, how their collection shall be enforced and what penalties may be imposed upon delinquents in the several classes of cities is a matter of legislative discretion. There is nothing in the Constitution forbidding different regulations as the necessities of the case may require in different classes of cities. Laws regulating the subject are not local or special legislation forbidden by the Constitution.

8. Assessment—Section 2985, Kentucky Statutes, which is a substantial re-enactment of the old city charter, provides that certain omissions and mistakes in the assessment shall not prevent a recovery of the tax if the lands and improvements be otherwise fully identified in the books. It is insisted that this provision is local and special. Held—That said section is valid as it applies alike to all cities of the first class, and the fact that there is but one city of that class does not change the rule. The owner of property must know whether he has paid his taxes or not, and when he is sued for the payment of the taxes on his property there is no reason that the legislature may not provide that irregularities in the assessment shall not avail him to escape the payment of his public dues when there is enough in the assessment to show the property taxed. Any of these assessments were sufficient under the statute, the property being plainly identified by the number of the lot and block as marked on the assessor's maps. Similar provisions are made for suits to collect taxes and for interest on them in other classes of cities.

9. Commissioners of sinking fund—The fact that the corporation known as the commissioners of the sinking fund has gone out of existence presents no defense to the collection of city taxes. Section 2979, Kentucky Statutes, provides that all taxes already levied or imposed under existing laws, and not yet paid, remain payable. In a number of cases decided since this act was passed the existence of the sinking fund commissioners of the city was upheld or recognized. There was an obligation on the city to pay its debts. The taxes levied for the benefit of the sinking fund are in substance levied for the payment of the debts, and the fact that they were made payable to the sinking fund commission does not affect in any manner appellant's liability, for the council was required to make a levy to meet the obligations of the city, and the form in which the levy was made did not prejudice appellants.

10. Board of Equalization—Although there has been no election of a board of equalization for any of the years from which taxes are claimed of appellants, they can not resist the payment of taxes on this ground as they did not complain of the assessments, otherwise they could have had a board of equalization appointed to consider their complaint under section 2994, Kentucky Statutes.

11. Pleadings—Appellants can not complain of the ruling of the court on demurrers to pleadings in the separate suits as the same objections were presented and disposed of in the consolidated action.

12. Statute of limitation—Parties to actions—As the wife held the lots for life, with remainder to her heirs, her children were not necessary parties to the suit in her lifetime, and limitation did not bar the action against them. They were made parties soon after her death, and the cause of action against them did not accrue until her death.

13. Manner of sale—While the lien for taxes exists on each lot the court did not err in directing a sale of so many of the lots as might be necessary to make the judgment, which was really less oppressive on the defendants than to order parts of the lots to be sold, and the court properly protected the interests of remaindermen by reserving the power over the distribution of the fund. The payment of fifteen years' taxes is a great burden, but he who enjoys the protection of society in the security of his property must share the common burden. There is only apparent hardship in the judgment and no real injustice.

R. W. Woolley and H. M. Lane for appellants.

H. L. Stone and John C. Russell for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Mary J. Woolley owned a number of lots in the city of Louisville, and these actions were instituted to enforce the lien of the city for taxes on the property for the years 1885-1900, inclusive. She died on February 2, 1897, leaving surviving her husband and two daughters, who are the appellants herein. The first suit, No. 3,140, was filed May 26, 1888, on the taxes for the years 1885-1888, inclusive. On June 18, 1888, the defendants filed a demurrer to the petition, and no further steps appear to have been taken until August 19, 1891, when they filed their answer. Nothing further was done in the case until June 30, 1900, when the plaintiff filed an amended petition, setting up the death of Mrs. Woolley. The property was assessed in the name of Mary E. Woolley; she was sued in this name, and also answered in the name of Mary E. Woolley. As we understand the record, her maiden name was Mary E. Johnston, and in this way her name was sometimes written Mary E. Woolley and sometimes Mary J. Woolley. As more than three years had elapsed after her death there was no revivor of the case against the children, but the court held that it might proceed against her surviving husband, who was a party to the action originally, and that his interest in the land might be subjected to the taxes without revivor. A reply was filed to the answer and after various amendments to the pleadings the issues were made up. The second action, known as No. 4,992, was filed August 8, 1894, to recover for the taxes for the years 1888-1894, inclusive. The defendants filed a demurrer to the petition on September 12, 1894. The demurrer was passed from time to time; the plaintiff amended its petition, and on April 14, 1896, the defendants filed answer. After this, in some way, the papers of the case were lost and nothing was done until March 12, 1898, when the plaintiff tendered an amended petition, setting up the death of Mrs. Woolley and praying a revivor. The court held the application to be too late and refused to revive the action, but on appeal to this court the judgment dismissing the action was reversed. Among other things, a consent order was entered, filing a substitute for the original petition, also duplicates of the tax bills sued on, "to have the same force and effect as the original petition and original tax bills," and the action was dismissed without prejudice as to the taxes for the years 1893 and 1894. On the return of the case from this court an answer was filed to the amended and substituted petition, to which, on November 24, 1900, the plaintiff filed a reply. The third action, known as No. 5,040, was filed on August 16, 1894, to recover the taxes for the same years as in 4,992, but on other property, which was assessed in the name of R. W. Woolley, trustee for Mary E. Woolley. The defendants filed a demurrer to the petition as in the other cases; the plaintiff filed an amended petition, and on April 14, 1896, the defendants filed answer. Nothing further was done, as in the second case, until after the death of Mrs. Woolley, when a similar amended petition was tendered, and the then record being lost, a similar substitute petition was filed and duplicates of the tax bills sued on by a like consent order. The action was dismissed without prejudice as to the taxes for the years 1893 and 1894. There was the same ruling as to revivor, appeal to this court and reversal, as in the second case. A reply was filed to the answer and various other pleadings were filed making up the issue.

On July 14, 1898, the city filed five actions, numbered 18,257, 18,258, 18,259, 18,261 and 18,262 for certain taxes for the year 1897, and garnished appellant's tenant, besides seeking to enforce a lien on the land. In each of these cases the answers were filed and some other steps taken.

On August 16, 1898, the city filed two other suits, Nos. 18,534 and 18,535, to recover for the taxes for the years 1893-1898. Certain lienholders on the property were also made defendants to the petition. The defendants filed answer on June 24, 1899.

On November 17, 1900, the cases were consolidated, and on January 3, 1901, the defendants filed an amended answer of twenty-four paragraphs in the clerk's office. On March 2, 1901, the plaintiff filed an amended petition in the consolidated cases, setting up, among other things, taxes for the years 1899-1900. On March 23, 1900, the defendants filed answer to this amended petition. The court struck from the file the amended answer filed in the clerk's office on February 16, and refused leave to the defendants to file it of record. On April 16 the plaintiff filed a reply to the answer to the amended petition, and on the 29th the defendants filed a rejoinder. On May 25 the defendants filed an amended answer, and on June 20 the court ordered that the amended answer filed on May 25 be controverted of record, and should not delay the trial of the case. The court also struck from the files the defendants' rejoinder of April 29, and the actions were submitted. To all of which the defendants objected and excepted. The court gave judgment in favor of the city, and the defendants have appealed. A great number of grounds for reversal are relied on.

1st. The actions were submitted before they regularly stood for trial.

As between the city and the defendants the issues were fully made up before its amended petition was filed on March 2. The answer to this amended petition, with plaintiffs' reply thereto, it seems to us, made up the issues completely. Certainly there was no new matter brought out in this pleading, which was not covered by the pleadings filed in the consolidated actions, and the court did not abuse a sound discretion in striking from the file the pleadings referred to which, so far as material, merely reiterated what had been gone over. We are unable to perceive that there was any issue of fact made with either of the lienholders, the Louisville Trust Co. or the Fidelity, Trust and Safety Vault Co. The actions had been pending for a long time. The parties had had very full opportunity to prepare their cases, and the court did not abuse a sound discretion in submitting them. Where the issues have not been properly completed for the requisite time, though they should have been, the party in default as to time is not entitled to a continuance. (Civil Code, section 364.) We fail to see that the defendants were in anywise prejudiced by the submission. It is not shown that they were taken at any disadvantage or deprived of any proof. Every allegation against them was controverted. "The court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party; and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." (Civil Code, section 134.)

To render judgment before the action stood for trial under the Code is a clerical misprision. The court has power after the expiration of the term to vacate or modify a judgment for a clerical misprision. (Civil Code, sections 516-518.) And no judgment which can be set aside or modified by the court that rendered it, upon motion made after the term in which it was rendered, can be reversed by this court until a motion to set it aside has been made in the inferior court and overruled. (Civil Code, section 763.) There has been no motion to set aside the judgment in the lower court, and this objection, if meritorious, is not now available.

2d. The allegations of the various petitions were all denied, and there being no proof to sustain them, the judgment is erroneous.

In section 2996, Kentucky Statutes, it is enacted concerning tax bills: "Each bill shall be authenticated by the assessor by his signature, or a stamped fac simile thereof, and when so authenticated it shall be prima facie proof that all steps have been taken to make it a binding tax bill for the amounts and purposes and against the person and property therein named or described; and this rule of evidence shall apply to the tax bills of 1885 and 1886 that have been so authenticated under the ordinance of the general council."

The validity of this statute was upheld in Louisville v. Johnson, 95 Ky., 354, and has been recognized in many subsequent cases. In certifying the original transcript the clerk stated that certain of the tax bills referred to in the petition, and the duplicate tax bills named in the consent orders above referred to, were not filed. But under a certiorari from this court he has sent up copies of these papers with the following certificate:

"I, John H. Page, clerk of the Jefferson Circuit Court, county and State aforesaid, do hereby certify that the papers attached hereto are true and correct copies of what purports to be, and evidently are, copies of the tax bills or duplicates thereof for the years 1889, 1890, 1891 and 1892, filed with the substituted petition in case No. 4,992, City of Louisville, plaintiff against R. W. Woolley, &c., defendants, said to be marked exhibits Nos. 1 to 56, inclusive. Said exhibits are and have been among the papers of this action though they are not marked as stated, nor are they marked 'filed.'"

Not only were the substituted tax bills filed by a consent order, but they were used in taking depositions and were evidently treated by the circuit court as part of the record. The only thing lacking is that the clerk failed to mark the papers filed as he should have done. This omission of his duty is not chargeable to appellee, nor are its rights affected thereby. We must, therefore, treat the papers as part of the transcript. (Day & Congleton Lumber Co. v. Max, Straddler & Co. 24 Ky. Law Rep., 640.) The case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Mayfield, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 224, was entirely different. There no order of court was made filing the pleading. While there was no order of the court filing the original tax bills, it is stated in the pleadings that they are filed therewith, and this allegation is uncontroverted and no objection was made in the trial court on the ground that the exhibits were not filed. We must, therefore, assume that the statements of the pleading are true. The exhibits are certified by the assessor as provided in the statute, and although the fact is denied by the answer, the authenticity of the certificate is established by the proof. The fact that the ordinances for the years 1885 and 1886, or copies of them, are not filed, and that there is no proof that the provisions of these ordinances were complied with by the assessor, is immaterial, because the court must take judicial knowledge of the ordinances of the city, and we find them in the biennial publication required by the statute. (Kentucky Statutes, section 2761, 2775.) When the genuineness of the tax bill is denied the city, to make out its prima facie case, must show that the tax bills were made out and signed by the assessor. (Louisville v. Kimbel, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1834.) But when this is shown the prima facie case is made out as fully as if there had been no denial of the regularity of the tax bills, and it is unnecessary for the city to show that all the steps required by the statute in the levying of the tax were taken. The burden then shifts to the defendant to show that the proper steps were not taken. The duplicate tax bills were by the terms of the consent order given the same effect as the original bills. But aside from this, where the original bill has been lost, the assessor may make out another bill from his record and certify it as provided in the statute, and it will make out a prima facie case for the city as fully as the one first made out. There is nothing in the language of the statute limiting its operation to the bill first made out by the assessor and certified by him. The legislative purpose was to make the bills duly authenticated by the assessor over his signature, or a stamped fac simile thereof, prima facie evidence. It is the official certificate of the officer that gives the bill this character, and when the original is lost we see no reason why the same effect should not be given to a duplicate of it made out and certified by the officer and proved by him to be a correct duplicate. We, therefore, conclude that the city made out a prima facie case by the tax bills referred to, no proof being taken by the defendants showing irregularities in the proceeding, or to sustain the affirmative defenses made in regard thereto.

3d. The taxes for 1885 and 1886 were barred by a judgment in a previous action between the parties.

That judgment is in these words, as admitted by the pleadings: "It is agreed, and so ordered, that the defendant, the city of Louisville, be, and is hereby, perpetually enjoined from asserting any claim for taxes in on or to the property described in the petition prior to March 31, 1884, being the day on which the petition was filed herein, and the plaintiffs shall recover their costs herein."

This judgment by its terms applies only to the taxes levied prior to March 31, 1884, and not to those for the years 1885 and 1886, or any subsequent year, although it was entered on June 19, 1889.

4th. Suit No. 3,140 not having been prosecuted with diligence for more than five years' limitation bars the taxes therein sued for.

This precise question was considered and determined otherwise in City of Louisville v. Meglemery, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 751.

5th. That action not having been revived against the heirs of Mary J. Woolley in proper time, there can be no judgment subjecting the life estate of her husband, Robert W. Woolley, to the payment of the taxes sued for, although he was a party to the action from the beginning.

In City of Louisville v. Woolley, 23 Ky. Law Rep, 405, it was held that no revivor was necessary against him, and that his life estate could be subjected to the payment of the taxes. In that case it was further held that actions 4,993 and 5,040 might properly be revived against the children of Mrs. Woolley. We regard both these questions as settled by the decision in that case, and not open now to discussion.

6th. Section 2998, Kentucky Statutes, in so far as it allows interest on taxes unpaid at 6 per centum per annum is unconstitutional and void.

This provision is taken from the act of May 12, 1884 (Session Acts, 1883-1884, volume 3, page 1274), and its validity has often been recognized by this court. (Fonda v. Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1652; Crecillus v. Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1551; Powell v. Louisville, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 554; Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1655.) While taxes do not bear interest unless it is so provided by statute (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky., 538), the imposition of penalties for the nonpayment of taxes is everywhere sustained, and the giving of interest on unpaid taxes is no more than a penalty for their nonpayment.

In Walston v. City of Louisville, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1852, this precise question was determined. The court said: "Under the Constitution the same rate of taxation must prevail in all cities of the same class, the same time for payment must be provided, and the same penalties imposed for the non-payment of taxes. To require the payment of interest on past due tax bills is somewhat in the nature of a penalty; if not, then it is compensation for indulgence in the payment of taxes. It is as much of a general law to impose a penalty for the nonpayment of taxes or to require the payment of interest on past due tax bills in cities of a class as it is to provide that taxes shall be levied and collected therein. It is a governmental function to impose taxes, and it is equally so to prescribe the method of their collection and the penalties for nonpayment."

How taxes shall be levied, how their collection shall be enforced and what penalties may be imposed upon delinquents in the several classes of cities is a matter of legislative discretion. There is nothing in the Constitution forbidding different regulations, as the necessities of the case may require, in different classes of cities.

Laws regulating the subject are not local or special legislation forbidden by the Constitution, although there is now only one city in the first class, for when any other city is placed in this class the legislation would apply to it, and were the rule otherwise there could be no adequate legislation for a class of cities if at the time there was only one city in that class.

7th. There can be no recovery of a tax based on an assessment made under the provisions of the present act or the old charter, unless such assessment is made to and in the name of and against the person as provided in the act.

The act requires the assessor to keep books in which he shall cause to be entered the names of all persons who are the owner or holders of land and the number and block of each of his lots, according to the maps in his office. (Kentucky Statutes, section 2985.) It is further enacted: "No mistake in or omission of the right name of the owner or holder of the land or improvements liable to be assessed, under the provisions of this act, shall impair any assessment thereof, if such land be designated in said books by its corresponding number and block on said map; or if such improvement be there designated by the number and block of the land on which it rests; or if such lands and improvements be otherwise fully identified in said books." (Section 2986.)

It is earnestly insisted that this statute is invalid as local and special legislation, and much force is given to the fact that in the forepart of the section quoted these words are used, "any lot of land which is not now designated by a number in the assessor's book." It is urged that by the use of the word "now," as well as from the fact that this provision was brought over from the old charter, the legislature had in mind only the city of Louisville. But although this may be true, still the fact is the act applies to cities of the first class, whether now in that class or hereafter coming into it, and, as said, in no other way could the legislature provide for the government of a city when no other city of its class is in the State than by a general law. The Constitution, by section 156, requires the legislature to divide the cities of the State into six classes, and assign to the first class cities with a population of one hundred thousand or more. As long as there is only one city of one hundred thousand population in the State, there can be but one city of the first class, but in the meantime the legislature must provide by general law for the government of cities of the first class.

The owner of property must know whether he has paid his taxes or not, and when he is sued for the payment of the taxes on his property there is no reason that the legislature may not provide that irregularities in the assessment shall not avail him to escape the payment of his public dues when there is enough in the assessment to show the property taxed. Some of the property in the case before us was assessed in the name of R. W. Woolley, trustee; some in the name of Mary E. Woolley, and some of it, after her death, in his name and the children's. Any of these assessments were sufficient under the statute, the property being plainly identified by the number of the lot and block as marked on the assessor's maps, all of which is shown by the proof. (Board of Councilmen of Frankfort v. Farmers Bank, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1738.)

8th. Section 2998, Kentucky Statutes, in so far as it allows taxes to be collected by suit in cities of the first class, is special and local legislation, and unconstitutional.

Similar provisions are made for suits to collect taxes and for interest on them in other classes of cities. (Kentucky Statutes, sections 3187, 3396, 3546, 3644.) The constitutionality of these statutes has often been recognized by this court. (Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1655; Board of Councilmen of Frankfort v. Farmers Bank, 2 Ky. Law Rep., 1738.)

9th. The corporation known as the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville no longer exists, and the taxes levied for its benefit can not be collected.

The original act creating the board of commissioners of the city of Louisville became a law on March 9, 1867, and by section 8010, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided: "The sinking fund to pay the bonded debt of the city is hereby continued as established by law. Whenever it is apparent to the board of commissioners of the sinking fund of any city of the first class that the revenue and available assets of said sinking fund will be insufficient to pay when due any future maturing bonds of said city then issued and chargeable to said sinking fund, without unduly impairing the assets of the sinking fund, and the said commissioners of the sinking fund shall certify this fact to the general council of said city, etc."

In sections 8011-8024 other duties of the sinking fund commissioners are prescribed. By section 2979 it is provided: "All taxes already levied or imposed under existing laws and not yet paid remain payable, unless the contrary be hereinafter provided." In a number of cases decided since this act was passed the existence of the sinking fund commissioners of the city was upheld or recognized. (Farson, &c. v. Board of Commissioners of Sinking Fund, 97 Ky., 119; Commissioners of Sinking Fund v. Grainger, 98 Ky., 319; Commissioners of Sinking Fund v. Zimmerman, 101 Ky., 432.) There was an obligation on the city to pay its debts. The taxes levied for the benefit of the sinking fund are in substance levied for the payment of the debts, and the fact that they were made payable to the sinking fund commission does not affect in any manner appellants' liability, for the council was required to make a levy to meet the obligations of the city, and the form in which the levy was made did not prejudice appellants.

10th. There was no election by the board of aldermen of a board of equalization by a viva voce vote.

Appellants do not show that they made complaint of any assessment. Section 2994, Kentucky Statutes, reads: "If in any year a legal board of equalization is not elected, or fails to meet, or fails otherwise to perform any essential act, or if in any year the assessment books should not remain open for the requisite time, the tax bills shall not thereby become void; but when any taxpayer in such a case complains of the assessment upon him, such a board shall then be chosen in the manner indicated, or the board theretofore chosen shall meet, as the case may be, and hear all complaints in the manner stated; and the collection of tax bills from those so complaining shall be suspended till the board has heard and disposed of their complaints."

Under this statute the objection that the board of equalization was not properly elected is unavailing. (Crecilius v. Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1551; Fonda v. Louisville, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1652; Powell v. Louisville, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 554.)

11th. The court sustained a demurrer to the petitions in actions 18,257, 18,258, 18,262 and 18,534, but gave judgment on these petitions without amendment.

In actions 18,257, 18,258 and 18,262 there was an order filing a demurrer of the defendants to the first, second and third paragraphs of the petition. The demurrer was sustained to the first and second paragraphs and overruled as to the third.

Plaintiff was given leave to amend the petitions and reparagraph the same on the face of the papers.

The three cases were then consolidated. The petitions, as copied in the transcript, are in one paragraph, and really set out but one cause of action. We must assume, therefore, that the plaintiff amended its petitions by striking out so much of them as divided it into paragraphs. After the consolidation there was an order entered overruling the defendants' demurrer to the petition. This order should be treated as made in the consolidated actions, as these cases were consolidated with the other cases, and after the consolidation pleadings going to the merits were filed, both by the defendants and by the plaintiff. In action 18,534 the defendants' demurrer to the petition was overruled.

12th. Mrs. Woolley owned only a life estate in certain lots, and limitation bars the remainderman.

The deed under which these lots were held is not produced in evidence, although the condition of the title was denied. R. W. Woolley stated that the title was conveyed by James C. Johnston to Mrs. Woolley for life, who then had no children, with remainder to her heirs. It could not be known who would be the heirs of Mrs. Woolley until she died, and, therefore, her children were not necessary parties to the suit in her lifetime. They were made parties soon after her death, and the cause of action against them did not accrue until her death.

13th. The court erred in prescribing the manner in which the property should be sold.

Our statutes confer upon the chancellor very broad discretion in enforcing tax liens. It is provided: "All tax bills uncollected in whole or in part * * * shall be deemed a debt from such person to said city arising as by contract, and may be enforced as such by all remedies given for the recovery of debt in any court of the Commonwealth otherwise competent for that purpose." (Kentucky Statutes, section 2998.)

"The action herein authorized and the judgment and subsequent proceedings therein, except as hereinafter excepted, shall be conducted in all respects like suits upon liens arising from contracts, and the court shall have jurisdiction of all suits for taxes irrespective of amount." (Section 305.)

"From the beginning of the action a lien for each tax bill assessed against the same owner, or set of joint owners, shall also arise upon every piece of land or improvement still owned by him or them with a view to the sale of less than all the pieces for all the tax bills, subject to the marshaling of burdens as against third parties, as the rules of equity may require." (Section 306.)

Under these provisions the court did not err in directing a sale of so many of the lots as might be necessary to make the judgment, which was really less oppressive on the defendants than to order parts of the lots to be sold. Section 5007, Kentucky Statutes, relates to the collection of taxes due by infants and persons of unsound mind, and is properly thus headed by the editors. It reads as follows: "The goods of infants or persons judicially found to be of unsound mind shall not be distrained for the taxes assessed on their lands or improvements; nor shall their lands during their disability be sold for less than two-thirds of their appraised value on any judgment of sale rendered for taxes and cost alone, when those lands or improvements have come to them through descent, distribution or devise or the gift or settlement of some person then deceased, or have belonged to persons of unsound mind before they became such; nor shall for taxes chargeable to the owner of the particular estate the entire estate be sold for taxes and cost alone at less than two-thirds of the appraised value, so as to defeat the reversions, remainders or future estates while any future estates are outstanding, unless the reversioners or remaindermen are ascertained and are of full age; nor shall such entire estates be put up to sale unless the particular estate of the taxpayer has first been put up and has failed to bring the amount of the taxes and costs."

The section first provides as to the goods of infants and persons judicially found to be of unsound mind; then as to their lands coming to them from some person who was of unsound mind or is deceased. It then takes up the state of case where these persons own the remainder and another the particular estate, and forbids a sale at less than two-thirds of the appraised value where the remaindermen are not ascertained or of full age, and then provides that such estate, that is, those estates as are referred to in the last clause, in which the reversioners or remaindermen are not ascertained or of full age, must not be put up to sale unless the particular estate has first been put up and has failed to bring the amount of the taxes. In other words, where the remaindermen are not ascertained or of full age the entire estate can not be sold for taxes and cost alone at less than two-thirds of its appraised value, and the particular estate of the taxpayer must be first exhausted and fail to bring the amount of the taxes before the estate of the remaindermen is sold. The section has no application to sales where the remaindermen are ascertained and are of full age.

At the conclusion of the judgment is this clause: "The court reserves power over the distribution of the fund arising from the sale as above ordered to the parties respectively entitled thereto." If it shall turn out, when the sale is made, that any injustice is done the remaindermen the court can adjust this matter between them and the life tenant, and direct him to contribute to them as the ends of justice require. But the city has a lien upon the remainder as well as the particular estate of the lots ordered to be sold as the property of the life tenant and the remaindermen, and in view of all the facts we do not see that any substantial injustice has been done any of the parties by the decree complained of.

It is true that to throw fifteen years' taxes upon the property at one time is to place upon it a great burden; but property is itself only the creature of civilized society, and taxes are the contributions made by property owners to society for its protection which they enjoy. He who enjoys the protection of society in the security of his property, without discharging his part of the common burden of maintaining the social system, violates the constitutional rule that taxes shall be uniform and equal. He not only reaps where he has not sown, but he places upon others the burden which his property ought to bear, for as the social system must be maintained, others must pay the part that in right should be paid by him. There is, therefore, only apparent hardship in the judgment, and no real injustice. It is shown by the proof that no taxes have been paid on appellants' property since about the year 1875, although, as stated, it was adjudged that the city be enjoined from collecting taxes prior to March 31, 1884.

14th. Certain paragraphs of the petitions were defective.

These defects were cured by the subsequent pleadings and by the proceedings had in the consolidated action.

Judgment affirmed.

MERCER COUNTY v. PEARSON.

Trusts—Compensation—Attorneys' fees—Mercer county voted a subscription of $125,000 in stock of the Southern Railway Co. Said bonds were placed with M., a trustee, with instructions to deliver $105,000 of them to said company when the road should be completed through Mercer county, and the remaining $20,000 to be delivered when the terminal and divisional shops should be permanently located at Harrodsburg. M. resigned his trust, and appellee was appointed his successor. He delivered the $105,000 of bonds to said company, but refused to deliver the $20,000 of bonds, as he did not consider that the company had complied with its agreement as to the location of its shops at Harrodsburg, and instituted this action to determine the validity of the bonds; also his duty as to the delivery of the entire lot of bonds to the company. He employed counsel and a protracted litigation followed, and the case having been transferred to the Federal court, was finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in favor of the validity of the bonds, and that the trustee had acted properly in delivering the $105,000 of bonds to the company, but that the $20,000 of bonds should not be delivered. The question involved on this appeal is, the liability of the county for compensation of the trustee for his services; also for his attorneys' fees. It is insisted that before the trustee had a right to institute an action in the circuit court for the purpose of recovering compensation he was compelled, under chapter 27, article 3, section 11 of General Statutes, to have presented his claim to the court of claims of the county for allowance, and had it rejected. Held—That as the trustee sought a settlement of his trust and to be advised by the court as to how it should be executed, and in the same action sought to have his compensation fixed, the circuit court being a court of general jurisdiction, was the only one which had jurisdiction of the settlement of the trust, and as a necessary incident thereto the allowance for compensation for services, and it was proper to settle both questions in one suit and avoid a multiplicity of actions. It is insisted that as the statute did not expressly provide for the compensation to the trustee for services he was to perform, and for the necessary services rendered by counsel, therefore, no liability existed upon the part of the county. Held—That Mercer county, as a quasi private corporation, was represented by a trustee, and he was entitled to compensation for his services, and to contract for the services of attorneys needed to advise him in the execution of his trust, and the county should be held liable for same. It is urged as a defense that as the trustee voluntarily assumed the custodianship of the bonds he became a voluntary trustee, and is not entitled to compensation. Held—That although the act of the legislature did not provide for compensation for the trustee, nor did the county court make any provision therefor, still, from the character of the services contemplated by the act, and the labor, expense and responsibility assumed, it can not be believed that the legislature and the county court contemplated that the trustee should act without compensation, and in addition pay the necessary expenses incident to the execution of the trust, including attorney's fees. It is adjudged that the trustee is entitled to be compensated for his services; that he should be reimbursed for the necessary expenses which he incurred, and in addition thereto be allowed a reasonable sum to compensate his attorneys for the services which they rendered. The allowance of $4,000 to the trustee is approved.

Robt. Harding for appellant.

Phil B. Thompson and W. C. Bell for appellee.

Appeal from Boyle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

By legislative authority Mercer county was authorized to vote upon the question of a subscription to the capital stock of the Southern Railway Co. At an election held for that purpose a majority of those entitled to vote expressed themselves in favor of a subscription, amounting to $125,000. Necessary steps were taken under the act to authorize the county court to make an order for the subscription of stock and to execute bonds in payment thereof. The act provided "that the county judge of such county shall order that such bonds shall be deposited with a trustee or trust company, to be held in escrow and delivered to said railway company when it shall be entitled to the same by the construction of its road through said county: Provided, however, That such trust company or trustee shall, before receiving such bonds, give bond with good security, approved by the county judge, for the faithful performance of his or its duty in the premises."

By the order of the county court $105,000 of the bonds were to be surrendered upon the road being completed through Mercer county, and $20,000 of the bonds were to be surrendered when the company should locate permanently at Harrodsburg, in Mercer county. Its terminal and divisional machine shops.

D. L. Moore was appointed and qualified as trustee. The railway company proceeded to construct the road, and claimed that it had complied with the act and the orders of the county court and had earned the bonds in question. When Moore was confronted with the responsibility of determining whether the bonds should be delivered or not, and realizing the embarrassing position he occupied, he thought it safer to resign his trust than to proceed to execute it. Thereupon the appellee, Isaac Pearson, was appointed, and duly qualified as trustee. After employing attorneys and obtaining their advice, he turned over to the railway company $105,000 worth of the bonds, and stock was issued to the county therefor.

He was confronted with the question as to whether or not the railway company had permanently located at Harrodsburg its terminal and divisional machine shops. The railway company contended that it had done so, but others interested disputed that claim. Not being able to get any advice from the county court on the question as to whether the railway company had complied with that part of the order, he instituted this action for a settlement of his trust, and to determine whether or not the $20,000 worth of bonds should be delivered to the railway company, and for compensation for the services which he had rendered the county. The case was transferred to the Federal Court, and such issues were joined as rendered it necessary for the court to determine whether or not the appellee had authority to deliver the bonds, amounting to $105,000, to the railway company, and whether or not it was entitled to the remaining $20,000 of bonds. The case finally reached the Supreme Court, where it was decided that he had acted properly in delivering the $105,000 of bonds to the railway company. It was likewise adjudged in the course of the proceedings that the $20,000 of bonds should not be delivered to the railway company.

The other questions having been settled, the question remained as to what, if any, compensation the trustee was entitled to receive for his services, and what compensation should be fixed for the attorneys which he employed to advise and assist him in the execution of the trust.

The first question presented is as to the original jurisdiction of the circuit court to determine these questions. Counsel for appellant contends that before the trustee had a right to institute an action in the circuit court for the purpose of recovering compensation, etc., for his services, he was compelled, under the General Statutes which were then in force, to have presented his claim to the court of claims of the county for allowance and had it rejected.

It is true that the General Statutes, chapter 27, article 3, section 11, provides that any person presenting a claim for allowance before the county court for a claim of $20 and upwards is entitled to appeal to the circuit court from the judgment or order of the court rejecting the claim.

There was more involved in this suit than the right of the trustee to recover compensation for services; he sought a settlement of his trust, to be advised by the court as to how it should be executed, and in the same action sought to have his compensation fixed. The circuit court, being a court of general jurisdiction, was the only one which had jurisdiction of the settlement of the trust, and a necessary incident thereto was an adjustment of the allowance for compensation for services, etc. The circuit court having jurisdiction to settle the trust, it necessarily follows that it had jurisdiction to fix the compensation of the trustee. It would have simply multiplied actions to have brought suit to settle the trust, and then applied to the court of claims for an allowance for services in executing the trust.

It is urged that as the statute did not expressly provide for the compensation to the trustee for services he was to perform and for the necessary services rendered by counsel, therefore, no liability existed upon the part of the county. To support this Wortham v. Grayson County, 13 Bush, 54, is cited, wherein it is held that where the statute requires services to be rendered by its officers where no remuneration is allowed by law, they must be regarded as ex officio services, for which no charge can be made, and that State and county governments never become debtors by implication to any of their agents. The principle of that case does not apply to this case, as it was held in Garrard County v. McKee, 11 Bush, 234, that the county, by its county court, was a quasi private corporation, and had power to employ counsel to defend suit against it and test the validity of the subscription of that county for stock in the Kentucky River Navigation Co., and to bind the county for a reasonable fee for such services.

So was Mercer county a quasi private corporation. In this transaction the appellee represented it as trustee; was entitled to compensation for his services and to contract for the services of attorneys needed to advise him in the execution of his trust, and for which the county should be held liable.

Again, it is urged that the appellee voluntarily assumed the custodianship of the bonds, thereby becoming a voluntary trustee, and, therefore, is not entitled to compensation. In Phillips' Adm'r v. Bustard, &c., 1 Ben Monroe, 349, the court had under consideration the question of the right of trustee to receive compensation for his time, trouble, skill, services, etc., where none was provided in the document creating the trust. In that case the doctrine of the British chancery antecedent to the American Revolution was invoked, which denied such compensation to a trustee. Judge Robertson, for the court, said: "We have never been able to perceive consistency in the rule or full force in the reasons assigned for it. It should be no less true in the municipal than in the divine code that 'the laborer is worthy of his hire;' and there can be no doubt that heavy and responsible trusts are rarely, if ever, undertaken as merely honorary, without expectation of indemnity at least. Moreover, there might be danger, not only of nonacceptance, but of injurious infidelity, if strangers, nominated for their skill, should know that, for all their devotion, time and responsibility, they can be entitled to no compensation, unless they make a contract, which, in many cases, can not be made for want of opportunity or competent parties. And we doubt not that, in most cases of onerous trust devolved upon strangers, there is an implied mutual understanding that there shall be a reasonable allowance for responsible, faithful and beneficial services. But the British rule has been extensively qualified, if not entirely exploded, by the local law and usage of our own Commonwealth, where tutors and curators and executors and administrators are all entitled to reasonable compensation. Here, then, the civil law maxim and all the other analogies which fortified the rule in England have been abolished. Is there now, therefore, any sufficient reason here for applying a rule so harsh and unreasonable to the solitary class of cases denominated express technical trusts? We think not. For similar reasons the courts of Pennsylvania and of our parent State, Virginia, have decided that trustees may be entitled to compensation without any express direction or contract therefor. (3 Binney, 457; 1 Washington, 246; 4 H. & Mun., 415.) And this appearing to be intrinsically just, not forbidden by policy, and not only not inconsistent with any analogy in our local jurisprudence, but perfectly consistent with its complete harmony, we do not feel authorized to repudiate it and blindly adhere to the old English rule, the reasons for which, if ever good, are now altogether inapplicable in this age and country, whenever it may be presumed that compensation was expected and seems to be reasonable and just."

Although the act of the legislature did not provide for compensation for the trustee, nor did the county court make any provision therefor, still, from the character of the services contemplated by the act and the labor, expenses and responsibility assumed, it can not be believed that the legislature and the county court contemplated that the trustee should act without compensation and in addition pay the necessary expenses incident to the execution of the trust, including attorneys' fees. As an evidence that the county court thought it proper to compensate the trustee, it made an allowance to Moore for the time that he acted as trustee.

We are of the opinion that the trustee is entitled to be compensated for his services; that he should be re-imbursed for the necessary expenses which he incurred, and in addition thereto be allowed a reasonable sum to compensate his attorneys for the services which they rendered. The court ordered an issue out of chancery as to what allowance should be made to the trustee. The jury returned a verdict for $4,000, which is less than the testimony showed he was entitled to receive. The court did not choose to disregard the verdict of the jury, and rendered judgment for the amount of the verdict.

Judgment is affirmed.

PARIS MILLING CO. v. PARIS WATER CO.

(Filed January 21, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Damages—This appeal involves the construction of a written contract between appellant and appellee made in 1890. Appellant had constructed several years before the contract was made a dam across Stoner creek for a mill pond, and agreed to permit appellee to withdraw therefrom water not exceeding 500,000 gallons daily. It was further agreed that in case it became necessary to draw off the water below a given point, in order to permit appellant to make repairs or improvements to any portion of the mill or other property of appellant, notice should be given to appellee, who should, without delay, at its own cost and expense, construct a suitable coffer dam, which shall enable appellant to make such repairs and improvements. Appellant instituted this action against appellee, alleging that

It became necessary to repair its mill property and for this purpose to draw off the water in the dam, and that it notified appellee to build a coffer dam, and that it built one so defective that it leaked to such an extent as to prevent making the repairs to the mill property, and that appellee failing to construct a proper dam after due notice, appellant constructed same at a cost of $167.17, for which it prayed judgment. In the second paragraph it alleged that it had expended $690.77 in reasonable repairs necessarily made to the mill dam and abutments, and that appellee refused to pay any part of it. A judgment for one half of said cost was prayed. The court sustained a demurrer to the first paragraph and on the trial of issue made on the second instructed the jury to find for appellant only $1.75, on which judgment was rendered. This instruction was given on proof that the repairs were not made to the dam proper across the creek, or the abutment next to the mill, but were made on the forebay wall and the wall of the water way or sluice leading from the forebay up to the mill pond. Held—That this instruction was properly given as appellee under the contract was under obligation to repair the dam across the creek and the abutment, but no further. The first paragraph stated a cause of action against appellee, as it was under obligation to construct a sufficient coffer dam.

McMillan & Talbott for appellant.

Emmett M. Dickson for appellee.

Appeal from Bourbon Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This controversy turns upon the proper construction of a written contract, in which the appellant, the Paris Milling Co., is the party of the first part, and appellees, the Paris Water Co., represents, as assignee, the party of the second part. That part of the contract here material is in these words:

“For the consideration hereinafter mentioned, the party of the first part, (the milling company) for itself, its successors and assigns, hereby agrees with the party of the second part, its successors or assigns (the water company) that it will allow the said party of the second part to withdraw water not exceeding a daily average quantity of 500,000 gallons from that portion of Stoner creek so called that forms a part of said first party's mill pond, for the purpose of supplying to the inhabitants of the city of Paris and its immediate vicinity water for fire, domestic, manufacturing and all other necessary purposes.

“The said party of the first part further agrees that said party of the second part may at any time, at its own expense, make such repairs to the dam owned by said party of the first part as it may deem necessary to prevent any waste of water from the pond by leakage, the party of the first part having first approved of the method of making and the character of such repairs.

“The said party of the first part further agrees that it will not draw down water in the pond for any purpose below a point four feet below the top of the cap-sill of the said dam.

“In case, in the opinion of the party of the first part, it becomes necessary to draw off the water below said point for the purpose of making repairs or improvements to any portion of the mill or other property of said party of the first part, notice shall be given to the party of the second part, who shall, without delay, at its own proper cost and expense, construct a suitable coffer dam, which shall enable said party of the first part to make such repairs and improvements. * * *

"Said party of the second part further agrees that it will pay to said party of the first part annually one half of the amount the said party of the first part shall expend for maintaining and making all necessary repairs upon the dam; also that it will pay one-half of the cost and expense of rebuilding said dam whenever and as often as the same shall become necessary."

Appellant filed the suit. In the first paragraph of its petition it alleged that in the summer of 1897 (the contract having been made in the year 1890) it became necessary for it to make repairs to portions of the mill, and it gave notice to appellee of the fact that it was necessary to draw off the water for the purpose of making these repairs; that appellee undertook to construct a coffer dam to enable it to make the repairs, but failed to construct a suitable coffer dam for that purpose; that the water flowed through the insufficient coffer dam erected by appellee in such quantities as to prevent appellant from making the repairs; that it notified appellee of the insufficiency of the coffer dam and requested it to make a sufficient one, which it refused to do; that thereupon appellant was compelled to erect a suitable coffer dam, and did so at a cost of $167.17, which was reasonable for the work, and had not been paid to it by appellee. Judgment was prayed for the amount so expended.

In the second paragraph of its petition appellant alleged that it had expended $690.77 in reasonable repairs necessarily made in repairing the mill dam and abutments, and that appellee refused to pay any part thereof. Judgment was prayed for one-half the amount so expended.

The court sustained a demurrer to the first paragraph of the petition. A traverse was filed of the second paragraph, and on final hearing, under a peremptory instruction of the court, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the cause of action set out in the second paragraph for $1.75, on which judgment was entered.

The question as to the second paragraph turns on the meaning of the word "dam," as used in the written contract above quoted. Stoner creek is a considerable stream. The mill company had maintained its mill on it for a number of years before the contract was made. The dam ran across the stream from a rock on one side to an abutment built of loose stones on the other. At the upper end of this abutment there was a water way conducting the waters from the pond to the wheels of the mill. The repairs were made, in so far as the court rejected them, on the fore bay wall and the wall of the water way or sluice leading from the fore bay up to the mill pond. The court properly held that these repairs were not made on the dam, and could not be recovered under the clause of the contract, requiring the water company to pay one-half the amount expended in maintaining or making necessary repairs upon the dam. The dam, within the meaning of the contract, is the structure across the stream, including the abutment on the side next to the mill. This is the common meaning of the word, and that it was used in this sense in the contract is shown by the stipulation that the mill company is not to draw down the water in the pond below a point four feet below the top of the cap-sill of the dam; also by the clause requiring appellee to pay one-half the cost and expense of rebuilding the dam when necessary. The thing which the water company was to rebuild was the structure across the stream, not the sluice way leading the water into the mill works or the forebay wall, which was under the mill and properly a part of it.

But we can not concur with the ruling of the circuit court that the first paragraph of the petition stated no cause of action. This ruling seems to rest on the ground that the mill company agreed not to draw the water down below a point four feet below the cap-sill of the dam, and that in case it became necessary to draw off the water below that point notice was to be given to the water company, so that it might erect a suitable coffer dam to maintain the necessary height of water; that the water company, in order to serve its patrons, must keep a supply of water in the pond, and that these stipulations were for the protection of the water company and not for the benefit of the mill company. We do not think that the language of the contract is fairly susceptible of this construction. It is this: "Notice shall be given to the party of the second part, who shall, without delay, at its own proper cost and expense, construct a suitable coffer dam, which shall enable said party of the second part to make such repairs and improvements." While in the stipulation in the contract that the water should be maintained at a certain height was evidently for the benefit of the water company, it is equally clear that it took this right with the burden that it should, on notice and without delay, at its own proper cost, construct a suitable coffer dam, which would enable the mill company to make repairs or improvements. It is earnestly argued that the contract can not mean that the water company was to dam up the stream so that the water would not escape in some way, but we do not see from the proof that anything impossible was demanded in this case, as a coffer dam at the sluice would, it seems, have cut off the water. The contract is, of course, to be given a reasonable construction. It does not require impossibilities, but it does require the water company to erect a suitable coffer dam to enable the mill company to make repairs, that is, to erect a coffer dam for this purpose of such dimensions and efficiency as men of ordinary care would usually be expected to provide for this purpose in the management of their own affairs.

The judgment of the circuit court as to the matters complained of in the second paragraph of the petition is affirmed, but as to the first paragraph the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. MICHELS.

Municipal government—Negligence—Obstruction of street by overhanging limbs—Appellee was driver of a patrol wagon in the city of Louisville, and while driving on Main street the top of the wagon collided with the limb of a shade tree about six or eight inches in diameter, which projected over the street, which caused the horses to break the king bolt, thus detaching the fore-wheels from the bed of the wagon and throwing him on the street, resulting in such serious injuries to his leg that amputation was necessary to save his life. He also suffered serious injury to his left arm from the fall.

Appellee recovered damages from appellant for this injury in an action alleging that it was the duty of the city to keep its streets in proper condition for travel and free from obstructions; that it knew of this obstruction and failed, after reasonable delay, to remove it. Appellant set up in defense that it was the duty of appellee, as a city employe, to know of this obstruction, and that he was guilty of contributory negligence, which will prevent a recovery. On appeal, Held—That it is not the duty of the driver of the patrol wagon to know the condition of the streets over which he drives. It is the duty of the city to keep its streets clear of obstructions which are dangerous to persons using them, and for failure to do so it is liable in damages to one who may be injured in consequence of such obstructions. The city owed a higher degree of care to appellee as driver of its patrol wagon than to the public generally, as it was his duty to drive at great speed in the discharge of his duties. The court properly instructed the jury, and the recovery was not excessive.

Henry L. Stone for appellant.

Augustus J. Bizot and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee for some years had been a driver of a patrol wagon in the city of Louisville; previous to August 23, 1899, he had driven an uncovered wagon; on that date he was driving a patrol wagon to which was attached two horses; it had been used at the Central Police Station, but had recently been sent to the station where appellee was located. While driving on Main street the top of the wagon collided with the limb of a shade tree, about six or eight inches in diameter, which projected over the street so low as to come in contact with the top of the wagon, which caused the horses to break the king bolt, thus detaching the fore-wheels from the bed of the wagon and precipitating him from his seat to the street, resulting in such serious injuries to his leg that after ten months of great suffering it became necessary to amputate it to save his life, and as a result of the fall his left arm was seriously injured.

He sought to and did recover judgment against the city upon the grounds that the shade tree, being within the corporate limits of the city of Louisville, was permitted to grow and branch over the street in such a manner as rendered it dangerous to persons driving along the street, and that the city knew of its condition and failed, after reasonable delay, to remove it. The evidence tended to show that Michels' duties required him to drive at a considerable rate of speed to and from different points of the city in obedience to demands of the police department, for the purpose of conveying prisoners to and from the police stations, and that while driving along the street and passing a wagon loaded with tobacco stems, drawn by four mules, the top of the patrol wagon, as above stated, was struck by the projecting limb.

The case was prepared and tried upon the idea that the appellee was entitled to recover as would have been any citizen driving over the street, and who had received an injury under the circumstances detailed. It is urged upon the part of the city that as Michels was a servant in its employ, he had an equal opportunity of knowing the condition of the street as did the master, and that he should have negatived contributory negligence in his petition by averring that he did not know the condition of the street, and did not have an equal opportunity with the master of knowing its condition. It was no part of the duty of a driver of a patrol wagon to examine the streets or report their condition. In the discharge of his duties it necessarily required him to drive hastily over the streets to such points as the demands of the police department required. It can not be said that, because his business required him to drive over the streets, his opportunities were as good as the master's for knowing their condition. It is the duty of the city to have the streets constructed, keep them in repair, and it is the business of the policemen of the city to discover and report any defects in them or dangerous obstructions over them.

If there had been a defect in the harness used upon the horses, or a defect in the wagon which he drove, of which he was aware, or could have been aware by the exercise of ordinary care, and from a failure to exercise it the injury resulted to him, then the principle invoked in behalf of the city, which is part of the law of master and servant, would apply. It was no more the duty of the driver of a patrol wagon to inspect the streets over which he drove than it is the duty of a brakeman to inspect the track of a railway, or know that it has been safely constructed.

It is the duty of a municipal corporation to maintain its streets in good condition and repair so as to keep them reasonably safe for the traveling public. This imposes the duty of keeping them clear of obstructions which are dangerous to persons using them, and for failure to do so it is liable in damages to one who may be injured in consequence of such obstructions. This limb was six or eight inches in diameter, and necessarily it had been an obstruction for some years. Besides, the testimony in this case showed the city's attention had been called to the danger of permitting it to remain in its condition, in fact it appeared that persons had been previously hurt or had come in contact with it while using the street, and the city's attention had been called to these facts.

The court below gave the following instructions:

"1st. It is the duty of the defendant, the city of Louisville, to exercise ordinary care to keep its highways in a reasonably safe condition for public use, and if you shall believe from the evidence that at the time mentioned in the petition, that is, August 23, 1899, at the point on Main street, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets, where this accident is said to have occurred, there was a limb protruding from a tree across into the street, or highway, in such manner or in such a way as to make it dangerous to persons using that highway with vehicles, and that the city knew of the presence of the limb there, or could have known of it by the exercise of ordinary care, and that the plaintiff was injured by reason of the vehicle in which he was riding coming in contact with the limb in question, then the law is for the plaintiff, and you should so find, unless you should further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, by negligence upon his part, contributed to cause or bring about the injury of which he complains, and that he would not have been injured but for his contributory negligence, if any there was.

"2d. But unless you shall believe from the evidence that the limb of the tree in question was a dangerous obstruction to the use of the street by persons in vehicles, or that the city did not know of the obstruction and could not have discovered it by the exercise of ordinary care, then the law is for the defendant, and you should so find, unless you shall believe that the limb had existed in its dangerous condition for such a length of time that the city or its officers knew, or could have ascertained the dangerous condition of the limb with reference to people using the highway, by the exercise of ordinary care."

We think these instructions embody the law of the case. The verdict is not excessive, because of the great suffering of the appellee and the permanent injury which he received. The injury practically deprives him of any means of making a living for himself and family.

Judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. MOUNCE'S ADM'R.

(Filed January 21, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Master and servant—Appellee's Intestate was a night switchman in appellant's yards at Livingston, whose duty it was to transfer cars from one track to another under orders from the yardmaster. One night while engaged in this duty he switched a car onto the wrong track, which collided with some cars standing on that track, causing the death of the switchman. This action was brought to recover damages for his death, it being alleged that the injury resulted from some stationary switch lights being out, causing the deceased to switch the car on the wrong track, it being the duty of appellant to keep said lights burning. Contributory negligence was relied on as a defense. On the trial the court instructed the jury that it was the duty of the company to have the lights in reasonably good order and condition to show the location of the switch, and if it failed to do so appellee was entitled to recover. Held—That said instruction was erroneous and prejudicial. It is the duty of the master to use ordinary care in providing for the use of the servant safe machinery and premises in safe condition. He is not, however, an insurer. It was the duty of the deceased to have looked and found that the points of the switch rail were in proper position before giving the signal to the engineer to move. This he could have easily done by the light of a lantern he carried. This contributory negligence prevents his recovery. Besides, the proof shows clearly that the switch-lights were all burning at the time of the collision.

J. W. Alcorn and Edward W. Hines for appellant.

Robt. Harding, John W. Rawlings and Williams & Williams for appellee.

Appeal from Rockcastle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

William M. Mounce was killed in a railroad collision while in the employment of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., as night switchman in their terminal yards at Livingston, Ky., in January, 1900, and this action was instituted by his administrator for the recovery of damages for the loss of his life. He alleges that the defendant had maintained in its switch yard at Livingston certain fixed switch lights for the purpose of locating the switches and tracks, upon which they moved its trains and cars from one track to another, and which served as guides to his intestate in discharging the duties assigned to him, and without which it was unsafe to do so; that on the night on which he was killed certain of these switch lights were not burning, and in consequence thereof, while transferring a number of cars from one track to another, he, by mistake, threw open the wrong switch, and the cars which he was transferring were run on the main track instead of onto a side track, and collided with the cars of a train standing thereon; that he was killed in the collision while in the discharge of his duty.

The answer of the defendant is a traverse of all the averments of the petition, and a plea of contributory negligence. It is conceded that the deceased was defendant's night switchman in its yards at Livingston; and that it was his duty, under orders from the yardmaster, to transfer cars from one to another of the tracks, in making up the trains at that point; and that in the discharge of these duties he had at his command the yard engine manned by the engineer and fireman. The yards ran north and south, and the engine always headed south. The switchman was required to carry a large lantern. For many years the company had maintained at each switch a stand about eighteen inches high on which was placed what was known as a target, composed of two cross pieces of sheet iron at right angles to each other, one painted red and the other painted white. If the white target stood at right angles to the track, it showed that the switch was closed, but if the red target was at right angles to the track it showed that the switch was open. At night lamps were used in place of those sheet iron targets, which showed lights from four sides: on the front and rear the lights were white and on the side they were red. The position of the target is always changed by throwing the switch; if its hows white before the switch is thrown, it becomes red thereafter and vice versa. The purpose of these targets was to enable the switchman approaching the switch to easily locate the switch, and know whether it was open or closed. And if it was closed, his duty required that he should descend from his train, go to the switch and turn it, and the testimony is uncontradicted that after throwing the switch, and before giving the signal to the engineer to move forward, that it was the duty of the switchman to examine the switch rails to see that they were in proper position and led to the track to which the cars were to be transferred. If the switch was a single one, a single light was maintained at the point, but at one point in the yard the company maintained what was known as a double switch light, which consisted of two lights about six feet apart, one of which marked the place where what was known as a cross over track led north to the main track from the passing track, and the other marked the place where the cross-over track led south to the main track from the passing track. At this point the yard is bounded on the east by Roundstone creek, and on the west by a series of coal bins twenty-five or thirty feet high. On the night of Mounce's death he was directed by the yardmaster to transfer "two cabooses and a carload of coal," which were standing coupled together on the passing track, and place them on what is known as the river track, or track number "four," which was the extreme eastern side-track in the yards, and which is to the left of the passing track looking south. The switch from the passing track to track number "four" was a single switch, but about one hundred feet north of it was the double switch spoken of above. The cabooses and car were standing about five hundred feet south of the switch which lead to number four track, and were ahead of the engine. To comply with the orders of the yardmaster the deceased has to take his train to the first switch south of the double switch, and in doing this his duty required that he should place himself on the caboose of car at the end of the train; when the train passed beyond the switch to signal the engineer to stop; to get down and throw the switch; see that it was in proper position to make the transfer to track number four, and get back upon the car and signal the engineer to back up. Instead of doing this, he had the train pass entirely beyond the signal switch, which lead to track number four, and beyond the double switch, and threw that switch to the right, which sent his train over the cross-over track to the main track on which there was standing a freight train, which consisted of some thirty freight cars.

It is shown on the map that the distance between the passing track at the double switch and the main track on which the train of cars stood is only eight feet; and that this distance was continually narrowed until the actual collision by a passage of the train under deceased's command over the cross-over track to the main track ninety-four feet south of the double switch. The only negligence charged to the appellant company is that they permitted the south double-switch light and the light which lead from the passing track to track number four to go out.

The trial in the lower court resulted in a verdict for the appellee, which we are asked to reverse, first, because the verdict is palpably and flagrantly against the weight of the evidence; second, that instruction number one, given by the court to the jury, was erroneous and prejudicial to the defendant.

It is insisted for the appellant that there is no testimony conducing to show that the lights at the double switch and the first switch south of it leading to track number four were not burning at the time the deceased backed the train under his command through them. On this point the company introduced Thomas Farley, the yardmaster, who testified that both these lights were burning when deceased backed his train through the switches, and that after the accident he moved the yard engine and cars from the place of the accident down onto another track into the south part of the yard; and that in doing so he passed through both the double switch and the single switch, which lead to track number four; and that all the lights were properly burning. Johnson, the engineer in charge of the yard engine, testifies that both lights were burning at the time, and that he also saw them burning after the accident. A. C. Martin, another engineer, testifies to the same state of fact. Frank Grass, the engineer in charge of a freight train which was standing on the track in the yards at the time, testified that he saw Mounce when he threw the switch, and both lights at the double switch were then burning, and that he also noticed them burning after the collision. McGee, a car inspector and witness of plaintiff, testified that he was inspecting train number "thirty-one" on the main track at the time of the accident, and was about five cars lengths from the point where decedent was injured; and that he immediately went to where he was lying between two cars, and said: "Bud, what on earth is the matter?" That he answered: "Harry, I am killed; I did it myself; I threw the wrong switch.

Send for my mother, I am dying." He also testified on cross-examination that these lights were often extinguished by winds and the jar of the cars running over the switch. The witness, Cook, testified that some hours before he had lighted the lamps both at the double switch and the single switch leading to number four track; and that both lamps were in good condition. Whilst, on the other hand, none of the witnesses who testified on behalf of the plaintiff on the subjects of the lights claim to have had their attention directed to them until after from ten to thirty minutes had elapsed from the accident. At which time they say that one of the double switch lights was out, and also one south of the double switch. This, in point of time, was after the yard engine had been backed off the cross-over track and taken to the south part of the yard, and in being so moved it passed through both the double and single switch number four. This testimony does not in effect contradict the testimony of the witnesses who testified for the defendant that the lights were actually burning, and in good order at the time of the accident. There is no conflict in the testimony that it was decedent's duty in switching cars from one track to another, when he turned the lever which changed the switch to look at the points of the switch rail to see that they were in proper position; and that if the train was to be switched to a track on the right the left hand rail hugs the rail, and if on the left vice versa; that the lantern carried by him easily enables him to make this examination. Nor is it controverted that the track to which Mounce was ordered to switch the cars lead off to the left, and that the track to which he did switch them lead off to the right. It is also admitted that at the time he stopped his train at the double switches the car on which he was riding was then in less than eight feet of the train standing on the main track, and that he was on the side of the car next to the main track with a good lantern in his hand; and that after his car started forward he rode upon the front car. It would seem that if he kept any sort of a lookout, either to the front or rear, he would have seen the train on the main track and realized that he was approaching it. In the light of these uncontroverted facts there is no escape from the conclusion that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to preclude recovery in this proceeding. The verdict is palpably against the weight of the evidence.

Besides, instruction number one, given to the jury, is erroneous and prejudicial to the defendant, as in it the court told the jury that it was defendant's duty to have the lights in reasonably good order and condition to show the location of the switch, and if he failed to do so, plaintiff was entitled to recover. Under this instruction, if the jury found that the lights were out, it was bound to find for the plaintiff, however great may have been the care exercised by the defendant. It was said by this court in Needham v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 85 Ky., 425: "It is the duty of the master to use ordinary care in providing for the use of the servant safe machinery, and premises in safe condition. He is not, however, an insurer."

In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 189 (4th edition), the principle is stated in these words: "The master is bound to use ordinary care, diligence and skill for the purpose of protecting his servants from encountering unnecessary risks in his service, but he is not bound to use any higher degree of care for that purpose."

These citations are in accord with the great weight of authority on this subject, in fact we know of none to the contrary.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JAMES v. WEBB.

(Filed January 22, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Judicial sales—Mortgages—Exceptions to report of sale—Appellee, as surety for appellant to a bank on a note, took a mortgage on a fourth interest in a tract of thirty-three acres of land. Appellee paid the note and instituted this action to enforce his mortgage lien, making L and E. defendants, alleging that they held prior liens on the land. A judgment of sale was ordered to satisfy the liens in the order of their priority, and a personal judgment against appellant was improperly rendered in favor of E., as they had filed no pleadings asking for same. This error was afterwards corrected by setting aside the personal judgment. The property was appraised at $400 and sold for $270, more than two-thirds of its appraised value. Divers exceptions were filed to the report of sale. On appeal. Held—That the lower court properly overruled the first exception, alleging that appellee did not, before the judgment of sale, file or exhibit any mortgage to show that he had a lien on the land. Appellant was too late in making this objection; besides, the petition states that he had a mortgage and referred to it as filed, and there is a mortgage in the record. The second and third exceptions are made on the ground that no pleadings or exhibits are filed by L. or E. setting up their claim or mortgage. Held—That this exception can not avail appellant, as he took no exception to the judgment, and the court made an order that L. and E. should not be allowed to receive any part of the proceeds until they had shown their right thereto, by answer and cross petition, as required by section 692 of the Civil Code of Practice. Appellant made no objection to this order, and the court had the right to make it under section 763, Civil Code of Practice. It was not necessary for the judgment to direct the master commissioner to make an appraisement as the statute gives full directions in this matter. A sale can not be set aside on the single ground of inadequacy of price.

H. Clay White for appellant.

R. L. Webb for appellee.

Appeal from Grant Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In July, 1900, appellee Webb became the surety for the appellant, James, to the bank for the sum of $26, and took a mortgage on an undivided one-fourth interest on thirty-three acres of land as indemnity to him. Afterwards appellee paid the note to the bank and brought suit on it to enforce his mortgage lien on said land. He made G. F. James and his wife, R. H. Elliston & Co. and J. L. Lee parties defendant, Elliston & Co. and Lee holding prior liens on the same interest in said land. All the defendants were duly served with process, and at the succeeding term of court judgment was rendered in favor of appellee against G. F. James for his debt, interest and costs, and also enforcing his mortgage lien on said interest for the amount of his said debt, interest and costs, adjudged Elliston & Co. and Lee priority, and erroneously gave a personal judgment in favor of Elliston & Co. and Lee for their debts, they never having entered their appearance nor filing any plea in the cause. The master commissioner made the sale, but before making it, however, he had the property appraised, as required by the statutes, and the appraisers valued said interest at $400. At the sale it brought $270, which is more than two-thirds of its appraised value. The appellant, James, filed exceptions to the report of sale, which exceptions are as follows:

"1st. Because the plaintiff did not, before the rendition of that judgment ordering a sale of defendant's land, file or exhibit any mortgage to show that he had a lien on the land sought to be sold herein.

"2d. Because the defendants, R. H. Elliston & Co., filed no answer in this action asserting any lien upon defendant's land sought to be sold, nor any mortgage to show that they had any lien upon defendant's land, nor exhibit or note, or other claim to show any indebtedness to them in any way, before the rendition of the judgment in this action, so as to authorize such judgment for the sale of his land.

"3d. Because the defendant, J. L. Lee, filed no answer in this action, asserting a lien upon this defendant's land sought to be sold, nor any note or other claim to show any indebtedness by this defendant to him, nor filed any mortgage to show any lien upon his land before the rendition of a judgment therein ordering a sale of his land, and said judgment was rendered without authority and law.

"4th. Because said judgment ordering a sale of his land, did not direct the master commissioner to have his land appraised, or how to have it appraised, as required by law. And this defendant now comes and moves the court to set aside the judgment rendered against him in this action, and grant him a trial of this action, because there were not pleadings or exhibits filed in this action sufficient upon which to base a judgment in this action."

As to the first exception appellee was too late in making it, as it should have been made before judgment. But, however, the petition alleges that he had a mortgage and refers to it as filed, and there is a mortgage in this record. As to the second and third exceptions, the error mentioned therein can not avail him, for he took no exceptions to the judgment, and afterwards the court corrected the error by setting aside the personal judgment in favor of Elliston & Co. and Lee, and made an order that they should not be allowed to withdraw or receive any of the proceeds of such sale until they had shown their right thereto by answer and cross petition, as required by section 692 of the Civil Code of Practice. The appellant made no objection to this order, and if he had the court had the right to make the order under section 763 of the Civil Code of Practice. As to the fourth exception, it was not necessary for the judgment ordering the sale to direct the master commissioner to have the land appraised, or how to appraise it. The statute gives full directions with reference to these matters, and this record shows that the commissioner complied with the statute.

Appellant, in his brief and in an affidavit filed by him, claims that the sale should be set aside on account of the inadequacy of price. He failed to except to the commissioner's report on this ground, and if he had, there is an unbroken line of decisions of this court to the effect that such a sale can not be set aside on such ground alone.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the rights of the appellant the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

CHARLES v. MATNEY, &c.

(Filed January 22, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Statute of frauds—Fraudulent sale of land—Land of A. was sold under execution and B. the creditor, purchased it. Afterwards C. the brother of A. claimed that he had previously purchased the land from his brother by giving him notes for it, and was placed in possession of it. Held—That the evidence shows that the sale from A. to his brother was fraudulent.

Bart Belcher and T. H. Harmon for appellant.

J. M. Robinson for appellee.

Appeal from Pike Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

James Charles owned a tract of land in Pike county. He had a tenant in possession of it. In 1896 appellee had begun an action for debt against him, and caused an attachment to be levied on the land. The attachment lien was not enforced, but appellee having obtained a personal judgment against his debtor, caused an execution to be levied on the land. At the execution sale the land was bought for appellee.

In this suit appellant, Green Charles, claims that in the fall of 1895 he bought this land from his brother, James Charles, by parol contract, and has since been in possession by his tenants. He claims to have paid for the land by surrendering to his brother certain notes he held against him for about $750. This transaction is attacked by Matney, the creditor, as fraudulent. The circuit court dismissed appellant's petition, and we think properly. Besides the very loose transaction just mentioned, there was evidence to the effect that appellant, after the alleged purchase by him, continued to hold a $500 note of those claimed to have been surrendered in consideration of the purchase; also that appellant, in conversations with his brother and others, treated the transaction as not closed, still claiming that James Charles owed him the $500 note. There was some evidence, too, that James Charles, after the alleged sale, continued to exercise acts of ownership over the property. If this and similar transactions could stand, it would be well nigh impossible to subject an unwilling and tricky debtor's lands by execution. It was for such cases that the statute of frauds and perjuries was enacted, requiring written contracts before they were enforceable.

The judgment should be affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

McHARGUE, SHERIFF v. REAMS, TREASURER, &c.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Premature filing of mandate—Clerical misprision—This action having been reversed on former appeal, with directions to dismiss appellant's petition, on the filing of the mandate the lower court made an order directing a dismissal of the petition, to which appellant objected and excepted and has prosecuted this appeal on the ground that ten days' notice of filing the mandate had not been given before the first day of the term, as required by section 671, Civil Code of Practice. Held—That the order was a clerical misprision under section 517, Civil Code of Practice, and can not be the ground of appeal until a motion to correct it has been made in the lower court; besides, there is nothing in the record to show that appellant gave any notice of the filing of his schedule, as required by section 737, Civil Code of Practice.

W. L. Brown, D. K. Rawlings and H. C. Hazelwood for appellant.

Appeal from Laurel Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action has heretofore been in this court on appeal. The court reversed the judgment and remanded it to the lower court, with directions to dismiss the appellant's petition. Mandate was issued and filed in the lower court, and that court made an order dismissing the petition, in accordance with the mandate. The appellant objected and excepted to said order, and appeals again to this court to have that order set aside, giving as his reasons therefor that the ten days' notice before the first day of the succeeding term for the filing of the mandate had not been complied with as is required by section 671 of the Civil Code of Practice.

We find nothing in the record before us showing that the appellant made any motion in the lower court to have said order set aside. Section 516 of the Civil Code of Practice says: "A misprision of the clerk shall not be a ground for an appeal until the same shall have been presented and acted upon by the circuit court." The next section says that "It is a clerical misprision to render judgment before the action stood for trial pursuant to the provisions of this Code." And according to the appellant's contention, this judgment was prematurely rendered, and in addition the record shows that the appellant filed his schedule, and there is nothing in the record showing that the appellee filed his schedule, or that the appellee had any notice of the filing of the appellant's schedule as required by section 787 of the Civil Code of Practice. The clerk of the lower court certifies that he only copied such parts of the record as was named in appellant's schedule.

For these reasons this appeal is dismissed.

HAYS v. GILBERT.

(Filed January 22, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Parties to actions—Mortgages—Res judicata—New trial—A. was a junior mortgagee for $400 on real property, and was, on his own motion, made a party to a proceeding instituted by B., the senior mortgagee, to enforce his mortgage. A. made no defense to the mortgage claim of B., but prayed that his mortgage lien be enforced. A judgment of sale was made directing that the claim of B. first be paid out of the purchase money and then the claim of A. A. became the purchaser of part of the property, and executed his bond for the purchase money. The sales realized only enough to pay the prior claim of B. and $3.25 on the claim of A. This action was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. Afterwards A. filed this action, seeking to enjoin the collection of the purchase-money bond executed by him, alleging that the debtor had paid to B. $150 for which no credit was given; also that the interest from 1891 instead of 1892 was included in the judgment by mistake; also that no interest should have been allowed on the claim of B. after the death of the debtor, as no demand was made of the personal representative within one year after his qualification. A new trial was asked to be granted under section 518, Civil Code of Practice. A temporary restraining order was granted by the clerk and the court finally adjudged that A. had the right to be made a party defendant to the suit of B., and set up defenses to his mortgage lien, but that having failed to do so, he can not now set up the defense of failure to credit the $150 on the debt of B.; but treating the action as a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence on the question as to the payment of usurious interest for the first year and the allowance of interest on the note notwithstanding the failure to verify same, and demand payment of the personal representative within one year after his qualification, decided that same would have been available had the action been filed within three years from the date of the judgment in favor of B., as required by section 844, Civil Code of Practice. It was also adjudged that the debt of B. should be credited by $90, the first year's interest. On appeal, Held—That the judgment was proper.

J. Smith Hays and J. M. Hays for appellant.

B. B. Golden and Jas. D. Black for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Knox Circuit Court dissolving an injunction and restraining order granted by the clerk and dismissing plaintiff's petition. The facts out of which the litigation grew are substantially as follows: In February 1896, William Gilbert instituted a suit in the Knox Circuit Court against E. Jane Mealer, administratrix of John Mealer and E. Jane Mealer individually, in which he sought to enforce a mortgage lien for $1,500, with interest from the 20th day of March, 1891, upon a house and lot owned jointly by the defendants, situated in Barbourville, Ky. His attorney in this suit was the appellant, John T. Hays. Shortly after the institution of this suit Hays was employed by the defendant, E. Jane Mealer, to represent her in a litigation then pending in the Bell Circuit Court, under an agreement that if he succeeded he was to be paid a fee of $350 and his expenses. As a result of this contract E. Jane Mealer, on the 25th day of January, 1897, executed her promissory note to the appellant, John T. Hays, for $400, due twelve months after date, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum until paid, and to secure the payment thereof executed a mortgage upon the same property which was covered by the original mortgage to William Gilbert; and on the second day of March, 1898, he was made a party on his own motion to the suit of Gilbert against Mealer's administrator, and set up his debt, and asked an enforcement of his mortgage lien. On the 12th day of April, 1898, a judgment was entered in that proceeding subjecting the mortgaged property, first, to the debt of William Gilbert, and then the overplus, if any, to the debt of John T. Hays. The property was appraised at $3,000, and the half interest of John Mealer and that of his wife, E. Jane Mealer, were sold separately. At this sale John T. Hays became the purchaser of the interest of John Mealer at $1,000, and William Gilbert of the interest of E. Jane Mealer at $1,200. The gross amount received from the entire sale only left $3.25 to be paid to John T. Hays after paying the debt, interest and cost of William Gilbert. An appeal was prosecuted to this court and affirmed December 20, 1900. (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1523.)

Upon the return of the case to the lower court John T. Hays instituted this suit in which he sought to enjoin William Gilbert from collecting the sale bond for $1,000, executed by him for the interest of John T. Mealer at the sale under the judgment in the suit of Gilbert v. Mealer's Adm'r, and to vacate and set aside that judgment under section 518 of the Civil Code, for the reason, as he alleges, that the judgment was erroneous and prejudicial to his rights as junior mortgagee in several particulars: First, he says that it adjudges Gilbert interest on his note from March 20, 1891, when in fact it did not bear interest until March 20, 1892; second, he alleged that on the 20th day of March, 1891, John and E. Jane Mealer paid Gilbert on his note $150 for which he gave no credit; third, he alleges that Gilbert did not verify and demand payment of his note of the administrator of John Mealer within one year after his appointment, and that for this reason the note bore no interest after the death of Mealer. The temporary injunction was granted in accordance with the prayer of the petition by the clerk of the Knox Circuit Court. The regular judge of the Knox Circuit Court being of counsel for the defendant was disqualified from sitting, and this fact being certified to the governor, Hon. J. M. Benton was appointed special judge and tried the case. His opinion is copied into the record, and succinctly states the facts and his conclusions of law. It is as follows: "It is the judgment and opinion of the undersigned special judge that the proper construction of the petition in this case is that it is one filed for the purpose of procuring a vacation or modification, according to section 518 of the Civil Code of Practice, of the judgment in favor of Wm. Gilbert in the action of said Wm. Gilbert, plaintiff, against E. J. Mealer, administratrix, which judgment was rendered on the 21st day of April, 1897. Upon the authority of Hart, &c. v. Hayden, &c., 79 Ky., 346, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff, Hays, could, by petition, have been made a party to the action of Wm. Gilbert v. E. J. Mealer, Adm'x, before the Gilbert judgment was rendered on the 21st day of April, 1897, and could have presented any defense then known to him against Gilbert's claim; and I am of the opinion that in this case, and for the purposes of this motion, the plaintiff, Hays, should be treated as having been a party to that suit from the beginning of the April term, 1897, of the Knox Circuit Court. I am of the opinion that it can not be held under the statements of the petition in this case that there was any fraud or collusion between Gilbert and E. J. Mealer, prior to the time Gilbert obtained his judgment, and it is that judgment which is sought to be vacated or modified in this action, therefore, the question of fraud need not be considered. The only ground which I consider is stated in the petition which might be considered sufficient to justify a court to vacate and modify the Gilbert judgment is what might be termed the newly-discovered evidence with reference to the payment of the usurious interest to Gilbert for the first year, and the fact that he was allowed interest on this note notwithstanding the fact that he failed to verify and make demand of his claim within a year from the time the first personal representative qualified, and as an action to vacate or modify the judgment upon such grounds must, according to section 344 of the Civil Code, be brought within three years after the final judgment is rendered, that ground can not now avail plaintiff for the three years. So far as Gilbert is concerned the judgment runs from the 1st day of April, 1897, while this action was not instituted until April 5, 1901. The clerical misprision mentioned in the petition, if any in fact exists, can be corrected by the motion which is now pending in the action of William Gilbert v. E. J. Mealer, Adm'x, and full relief to plaintiff on that account, can be obtained in that action. It being the opinion of the special judge that, according to the showing made in the petition, the only reduction in Gilbert's judgment that plaintiff is entitled to have made is the $90 on account of the first year's interest, and it appearing that with that reduction only made the judgments of Gilbert and Hays will more than consume the proceeds of the sale of the property, the attachment prosecuted by Burnside against Mrs. Mealer and the notice of garnishment served on Hays need not be considered, for his answer that that notice can truthfully state that he owed Mrs. Mealer nothing when the notice of garnishment was served. It is, therefore, ordered that the restraining order and injunction issued by the clerk of the Knox Circuit Court in the case of John T. Hays v. Wm. Gilbert be, and they are hereby, dissolved, and the clerk of said court is directed to enter this order on the records of the Knox Circuit Court."

After a full examination of the very able briefs filed for appellant, we have concluded that the judgment appealed from should not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

BARKER, &c. v. BOYD, &c.

BUTT v. KING.

QUERBACKER-GILMORE CO., &c. v. KING, &c.

SAME v. BYARS, &c.

(Filed January 22, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Partners—Attachment—Fraudulent conveyances—Mortgages—Subrogation—Guardian and ward—Sureties—Butt & Boyd were mercantile partners, and several creditors of the firm sued out attachments. K., a creditor of Butt, levied an attachment on a house and lot, the individual property of Butt. Prior to the attachments Butt & Boyd had sold and transferred their storehouse and stock of goods to Byars, and Boyd had assigned to Byars a mortgage lien note for $600 on Butt's property upon which K.'s attachment was levied. The creditors of Butt & Boyd attacked this transfer to Byars as fraudulent. The court decided that the transfer of the house and lot and stock of goods to Byars was not fraudulent on the part of Byars, as he paid a valuable consideration for same, and had no notice of any intent to defraud on the part of Butt & Boyd, and that the transfer of the $600 mortgage claim was fraudulent as to creditors. In a judgment subsequently rendered in the attachment suit of King, it was adjudged that the mortgage debt had been paid and the former judgment was set aside so far as it subjected this claim to the partnership debts. Held—That the judgment finding that the transfer of the storehouse and stock to Byars was not fraudulent is approved, but as the note of $600 secured by a mortgage on the house of Butt had been assigned to Boyd, and the amount of it paid out of his means, he was entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the original holder of the note, and the partnership creditors could subject same to their debts. The judgment for debt in favor of K. against Butt should be reversed as the evidence fails to show an indebtedness on the part of Butt to the extent claimed. Prior to the levy of any of the attachments herein Boyd, who owned the storehouse, had executed to O. a mortgage on same to indemnify him as surety on a bond as guardian for his children for the amount of $950, the estimated amount of funds in his hands belonging to them. Byars had retained this amount of money out of the purchase money and subsequently paid it into court, and the creditors of the partnership now seeks to subject this fund to their debts. Held—That the proof shows clearly the legal obligation of O. and his co-sureties for funds received by Boyd as guardian for his children. Said fund should be applied to the payment of that debt.

2. Release of sureties on guardian's bonds—A surety on a guardian's bond can be released from liability only by pursuing the method pointed out in sections 4659-4664, Kentucky Statutes. The bond required to be executed in the circuit court under section 493, Civil Code of Practice, and the guardian's bond executed in the county court are considered cumulative securities. A renewal bond of a guardian in the county court is regarded as cumulative surety for the ward, and the sureties on all of them are equally bound unless some of them have been released in the manner provided by statute.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Butt & Boyd were mercantile partners at Adairville, Ky. They failed in business. Some fourteen of their creditors filed that many attachment suits, respectively against the firm. J. M. King was a creditor of Butt. He filed suit and procured an attachment against Butt's individual property, a house and lot in Adairville. Prior to the attachments mentioned Butt & Boyd had sold and conveyed to G. H. Byars their business house, and had sold and delivered to him also their stock of merchandise; and Boyd had assigned and claims to have sold to Byars a mortgage-lien note for $600, and interest, which he claims he held against Butt's property, that attached by King. The creditors of the firm of Butt & Boyd attacked the transfers to Byars as fraudulent, and sought to subject this property to their debts, which aggregated something over $1,700, exclusive of interest and costs. As a matter of fact the real property conveyed to Byars was owned by Boyd, who indeed owned all the property of the firm, Butt's interest being alone in the profits, and there were no profits. Before the sale to Byars, and before the creation of any of the debts of the complaining creditors here, Boyd had mortgaged his real property (the storehouse and lot sold to Byars) to Orndorff, to indemnify him against loss as surety for Boyd as guardian of certain of Boyd's children. The facts bearing on this mortgage will be particularly noticed later on. This appeal involves the correctness of the circuit court's judgment fixing the liabilities and marshaling the liens and equities of the parties.

The first question to be disposed of is the correctness of the trial court's finding as to the transactions between Butt & Boyd and G. H. Byars. That court found that the transfer of the $600 mortgage note owing by Butt, transferred by Boyd to Byars, was fraudulent as to Boyd's (the firm's) creditors, and adjudged it a lien on the Adairville property owned by Butt, which was ordered to be sold, and to the extent of this note and interest applied in satisfaction of the attachment debts against the firm. The court held, however, that the transaction by which the storehouse and lot and stock of merchandise were sold to Byars was not fraudulent. Of this action the creditors complain. The facts were that Butt & Boyd were largely indebted. Their property was encumbered to a bank at Adairville for over $3,000. The business had not been profitable. They sought Byars and offered to sell to him their business house and lot at $2,700, and their stock of merchandise at 80 per cent. of its cost, adding carriage. It realized about $2,100. These sums were consumed almost entirely by the Adairville bank debts. Nine hundred and fifty dollars of the consideration was not then paid, because there was a mortgage to Orndorff for that sum, and it was agreed, so it was alleged, that it was to be paid to him, or so as to relieve the property of the lien created by his mortgage above mentioned. The evidence is that the prices paid by Byars were the fair and full value of the properties; that he did not then know of any purpose by Butt & Boyd to hinder or defraud their creditors; that he gave checks immediately for the cash (less the $950), which were subsequently presented to and paid by his banker. In fact, though, they were not presented apparently till more than twenty days later than their date, and not till one day after the attachments had been issued against Butt & Boyd. The cause of the delay is not explained, but so far as Byars is concerned he does not appear to have known of it, or in anywise to have been responsible for it. We fail to see anything in this transaction that would charge Byars with knowledge or notice of Butt & Boyd's fraudulent purpose.

The transaction about the Butt note did not occur at the same time, though it is assumed in argument that it did. The evidence upon which the court sustained the charge of fraud in that transaction is not attacked as being insufficient. There is no cross appeal from the judgment on that score. We, therefore, merely accept the fact as one settled, that the grounds of the attachment as to that transaction are sustained, and whatever property rights Boyd owned in that note and mortgage are to be subjected to his creditors' attachments.

The transaction of this note was as follows: Butt appears to have been without means in 1892; he had formed the co-partnership with Boyd, placing his services against Boyd's capital. He was to share equally in the profits. He proposed to Boyd that he could buy the house and lot in Adairville, and by borrowing the money from a building and loan association, could pay for it as easily as to pay rent; that he be allowed to anticipate from the firm his expected profits, and draw out enough monthly to meet the installments of premiums, interest and dues to the association; that in the event there were no profits finally, Boyd was to have the house and lot, or, rather, the debt against it evidenced by Butt's note to the building and loan association. This proposal was agreed to by Boyd, and $600 was borrowed from a Louisville building and loan association, secured by mortgage on the Adairville house and lot. The monthly installments were paid by Boyd's money, drawn from the firm by Butt under the foregoing arrangement, for several years, and until King attached, when there was some $190-odd balance owing the building and loan association. Thereupon Boyd paid off this balance, and took an assignment of the whole note from the building and loan association. In these actions, consolidated, by the fourteen creditor firms of Butt & Boyd, against Butt, Boyd, Byars and the building and loan association, the fact was decided by a decree of February 23, 1900, that Butt's liability to the building and loan association had been assigned to Boyd; that it was $600 and interest; that the alleged transfer of it by Boyd to Byars be set aside as fraudulent, and that Butt's property in mortgage to secure it be sold and, to the extent of the $600 and interest and costs, that it be subjected to the payment of Boyd's attaching creditors.

Prior to the institution of the attachment suits by the creditors of Boyd (i. e., the firm of Butt & Boyd) J. M. King had filed a suit in the Logan Circuit Court against Butt on a note for $923.77, credited by $18.50 as of September 1, 1891, and $492.50 as of November 24, 1891, and procured an attachment against Butt's property, which was levied on the house and lot encumbered by the building and loan association mortgage above named. To this suit in time Butt, Boyd, Byars and the building and loan association were made parties defendant. A number of issues were joined (which form the subjects of decisions further along in this opinion), among them being the claim by King that the mortgage debt to the building and loan association had been paid by Butt, and denying any title therein in either Boyd or Byars.

Subsequent to the decree of February 28, 1900, the suit of King v. Butt, &c., was consolidated with the various suits of the creditors of Butt & Boyd, styled then "Overbacker-Gilmore Co., &c. v. Butt & Boyd, &c." On final hearing the circuit court decided that the $600 Butt note and mortgage to the building and loan association had been paid by Butt before the attachment by King, and thereupon set aside so much of the previous judgment as subjected the property for that debt to Boyd's creditors.

On this branch of the appeal two questions are presented: First, was the judgment of February 8, 1900, conclusive upon King; and, second, was the debt in fact and in law paid by Butt, so that Boyd had not an equity superior to the attachment of King?

In view of the conclusion at which the court has arrived concerning the second proposition stated, it becomes unnecessary to determine the question of law involved in the first one.

The circuit court found that the debt to the building and loan association had been paid by Butt, and that, therefore, it had been discharged so that it was not susceptible of assignment by the association. It is true it had been paid, except about $190, as stated above. But those payments, while made in the name of Butt, and probably by him, were made by the means of Boyd under the arrangement detailed. It may, therefore, be said that Boyd in reality paid the whole of this debt to the building and loan association, and although not primarily liable, nor liable at all, to the association for its payment, as between Boyd and Butt there was a manifest equity entitled to recognition by the courts. That Butt, under such circumstances, was morally and legally bound to repay Boyd the money so advanced there can be no manner of doubt. Such an agreement by a debtor to a stranger to his debt, that the latter may be subrogated to the lien which he pays, is an enforceable one. (Treadway v. Pharis, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 788.) The attaching creditor could occupy no more favorable attitude to the debtor's property than the debtor could in relation to equities against it. The right of J. M. King to subject the property of Butt to his attachment is questioned by Butt, because he denies that he then owed King any sum. Butt originally owned a stock of merchandise at Adairville. He sold King a half interest and took his note for $400, dated February 1, 1888, in part payment. On a settlement had between these partners in August, 1891, the note for $923.77 sued on was executed by Butt to King.

One of Butt's defenses was a plea of set off, on account of the $400 note first mentioned. King claims to have paid that note to the bank, where Butt had placed it as collateral. The circuit court found in favor of King on this issue. King testified that he had paid the $400 note to Mr. Fugate, the banker, and filed a written settlement between him and Fugate to that effect. Butt was neither a party to nor present at this settlement. Fugate testified that in fact the $400 note was not paid by King, but that Butt had pledged it to Fugate's ——— as collateral to secure a debt owing the bank by Butt. In a general settlement of all liabilities to this bank King desired this note included. Fugate says, and Butt corroborates it, that Butt, at Fugate's instance, gave other security upon the note upon which the $400 note was collateral, and upon Butt's consent it was surrendered to King. Within a few days afterwards King placed a credit on the $923.77 note for $492.50, the amount of the principal and accrued interest on the $400 note. In his petition King concedes this credit, as he does in his first deposition in the case. Not till the case had been at issue for some time was it claimed that this credit was a mistake. We see no escape from the conclusion that King in fact did not pay the bank anything for this $400; but that Butt agreed for it to be surrendered, to be credited by King on his $923.77 note, and the credit was then accordingly made. The circuit court erred in adjudging otherwise.

In the partnership agreement between King and Butt it was stipulated that King was to pay $300 per year upon the salary of a clerk in lieu of his personal service to the firm. This clerk, who was the bookkeeper for the firm, served for over two years under this arrangement. The clerk was to receive $500 per year, $300 to be paid by King, the remaining $200 to be paid by the firm. The firm paid the clerk the $500, but in entering the transaction on the books King was charged with $200 only each year. By these mistakes he failed to repay the firm $204 on this matter. In the settlement in August, 1891, as the result of which the $923.77 note was executed, the error above named was not corrected, nor then known. It is clearly proven that it existed, therefore, the circuit court should have adjudged a credit for one-half of the sum omitted upon the note sued on as of its date. Failing to do so was error. There is no complaint of the judgment disposing of the other issues on the King and Butt branch of the case.

G. W. Boyd (of the firm of Butt & Boyd) was guardian for certain of his infant children. He was appointed by the Logan County Court December 9, 1889. He then executed bond with appellant, J. M. Pence, as his surety. The guardian received little or no personal property. At any rate, if any, it is not the subject of this litigation. The wards owned an undivided one-seventh interest in certain real estate in Logan county. The whole tract of the land contained about 238 acres. On December 21, 1889, Boyd, as guardian for his children, instituted an equitable action in the Logan Circuit Court against the other joint owners of this land, praying for its sale as an entirety, and for the division of the proceeds among the joint owners. In August, 1890, judgment was duly rendered in the action, directing the sale of the land as prayed for. On the same day Boyd, as guardian, with appellants, J. M. Pence and Seth Barker, as his sureties, executed in the Logan Circuit Court the bond required by section 493, Civil Code, in which the principal and his sureties undertook that the guardian would faithfully discharge all his duties as such; would comply with the judgments and orders of the court in the action, and would account for, pay and deliver to his said wards all money or property due or belonging to them when required. This bond was required to be executed before the judgment of sale could be rendered or enforced. The sale under these proceedings was reported to and confirmed by the court. As a result there was reported as going to Boyd as guardian for his said children $473.85, after paying his part of the costs. This sum was paid to him the 20th of January, 1891. Previous to this sale the seven joint owners, Boyd representing his wards, had agreed among themselves, without the knowledge of Barker and Pence, so far as the record shows, that the land should go at not less than $6,195, two of the joint owners having agreed to pay that sum for it, without reference to what they might have to bid at the decretal sale. As a matter of fact it only brought $3,399.97 at the commissioner's sale, being bid in for that sum by the two joint owners above referred to as agreeing to pay $6,195 for it. This last-named sum the purchasers did pay for the land, although the records of the suit failed to show anything of this agreement out of court. Boyd, as guardian, received his wards' part of the greater sum, viz., $873.14 in all. This includes the $473.85 reported, as shown by the circuit court records. This $873.14 and its interest is all that the guardian reports, or that is found, to have come to his hands for his wards.

In June, 1898, Boyd appeared in the Logan County Court, and renewed his bond to his said wards, with M. E. Orndorff as his surety. The order of the county court taking and approving this bond is as follows: "On motion of G. W. Boyd it is ordered by the court that he be, and he is hereby, permitted to execute a new bond as guardian for the children, to wit: Alma Boyd, E. N. Boyd, Pearl Boyd, Maude H. Boyd, G. E. Boyd and Hattie E. Boyd. Whereupon the said G. W. Boyd executed approved bond for each of his said wards, with M. E. Orndorff as his surety, and it is hereby further ordered by the court that J. M. Pence, the surety of said Boyd on a former bond executed by said Boyd as guardian of the above-named children, be, and the said Pence is hereby, released from further liability as surety on said bond."

The bond was as follows:

"The Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"Whereas, G. W. Boyd has been appointed by the county court of Logan county, and has qualified as guardian of Maude H. Boyd, as minor, now we, G. W. Boyd, as principal, M. E. Orndorff, his surety, do hereby covenant to and with the Commonwealth of Kentucky that the said G. W. Boyd will faithfully discharge the trust of guardian to the said minors in all respects as provided by law."

It thus appears that the county court evidently believed, as perhaps did Boyd, that this bond was in lieu of his first one on which J. M. Pence was surety, and that Pence was thereby released from his liability. Boyd claims, and so testifies, that he took this action "at the request" of J. M. Pence, the surety. It is not claimed that this "request" was other than oral, and was not made by Pence to the court, nor was Pence present at the giving of the new bond. At the same time Boyd, to indemnify Orndorff as such surety, executed to him a mortgage for $950 (that being supposedly the extent of his liability on the guardian's bonds) on the storehouse and lot above referred to as having been sold by Boyd to Byars. Byars has paid into court the $950. This sum is attached by the creditors of Boyd (Ouerbacker-Gilmore Co. and others), and is claimed by Orndorff, J. M. Pence and Seth Barker as belonging to Boyd's wards, and as having inured to their joint benefit under the mortgage to Orndorff. Whether this fund will belong to Boyd's wards in any event must depend upon whether Orndorff was ever bound by his bond, for if he was not, and if no liability had attached, or can attach, as against him by reason of the bond, it is manifest that the conveyance of indemnity to him is without consideration, and is not binding, and conveys nothing.

Under the first act of this Commonwealth (1797) it seems that the county courts had authority to release sureties on guardian's bonds, or to make such order for the relief of a guardian's surety "as to them shall seem just." (Wilborne v. Commonwealth, 5 J. J. Mar., 618.) In the various changes in this statute since made the policy has been steadfastly adhered to of giving to the county courts plenary power in exacting or taking new bonds or additional security so as to fully protect the interests of the wards. Now the county court appointing the guardian must at the time of the appointment exact a good and sufficient bond (section 2017, Kentucky Statutes), and may require him to renew his bond, if the court deems that it is no longer sufficient. (Section 2026, Kentucky Statutes.) If a surety becomes uneasy, and desires to be released from further liability on the bond, or indemnity for that already incurred, either or both, he must pursue the method pointed out by the Statute. (Sections 4659-4664, Kentucky Statutes.) In this way only may a surety now be released or indemnified by a bond in court. The order releasing Pence as surety on the first bond was, therefore, void. He remained bound as if that part of the order had not been made. When the county court permitted the guardian to execute the new bond with Orndorff as surety, it was equivalent to that court's requiring a new bond, or additional security to be given by the guardian. And it has been repeatedly held by this court that the effect of such renewal bonds is cumulative security for the ward, and that the sureties on all of them, so far as the ward is concerned, are equally and jointly bound for all the estate coming into the guardian's hands. (Abshire v. Rowe, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1854, and cases there cited.)

As Orndorff was bound by this bond, the validity of the mortgage to him is fixed. Under familiar principles indemnity taken by one surety inures to all jointly bound. Therefore, the mortgage to Orndorff was for the benefit of Pence and Barker, and ultimately for the wards. In these cases the wards of Boyd (by their present guardian, Boyd having been removed), litigated with Pence and Barker their liability; and same was adjudged. Pence and Barker have appealed. It, therefore, becomes necessary to consider their liability to the wards of Boyd.

It has heretofore been held by this court that the effect of executing the bond required by section 493, Civil Code, to procure the sale of an infant's land, is but cumulative security; and that the sureties upon the guardian's original bond made in the county court and those upon the one executed in the circuit court, as to the fund realized by the sale of the land, stand as co-sureties and joint obligors for the faithful application by the guardian of the proceeds of such sale. (Elbert v. Jacoby, 8 Bush, 545; Taylor v. Taylor, & Co., 6 B. Mon., 560; Withers v. Hickman, 6 B. Mon., 292.) The sureties on the guardian's bond executed in the county court bind themselves for every class and kind of the wards' estate that may come, or should have come, to the guardian's hands, including his misfeasanances and nonfeasance. But the sureties in the bond executed in the circuit court, while supplementary to the county court bond, should be considered as contracting alone with reference to the subject-matter of the suit in which it is executed. That record constitutes notice to the surety therein of the nature and extent of the estate for which he becomes bound. The very letter of his bond should be the limit of his liability. It is executed with reference to that certain described land, to enable its sale, and guarantees the faithful application of its proceeds only.

Whether the outside agreement of the guardian, Boyd, in that case, not reported to the court, should enlarge the liability of his surety in the court, any more than a similar agreement for giving some part of the reported consideration could diminish the surety's liability, is a question now unnecessary to decide, as it appears that the fund in court subject to the Orndorff mortgage is sufficient to pay the wards in full. The circuit court adjudged these two sureties liable for $921.25 each. It will be seen that the judgments against them are more favorable than either of them was entitled to. The court, therefore, considers that the personal judgments of the guardian of the Boyd heirs, and of Sarah A. Boyd, against Seth Barker and J. M. Pence should be affirmed; but that the judgment refusing to subject the $950 fund to the payment of the liability of Boyd as guardian to the wards should be reversed. The judgments in favor of J. M. King v. J. L. Butt should be reversed; the judgment denying the various appealing creditors of Butt & Boyd (Ouerbacker-Gilmore Co. and others) the right to subject the J. L. Butt house and lot for the $600 note and interest, should be reversed; that the judgment denying the same creditors the right to subject the $950 fund balance arising from a sale of the storehouse and lot to Byars should be affirmed on the creditors' cross appeal, if any surplus of that fund; after paying the Boyd heirs as herein indicated, it may be subjected to the creditors' attachments. The judgment in favor of G. H. Byars upholding the sale to him of the storehouse and lot and the stock of merchandise by Butt & Boyd should be affirmed.

In so far as the judgments are reversed these causes are remanded, with directions to enter judgments in conformity to this opinion and for proceedings therein not inconsistent herewith.

FOSTER, &c. v. FOSTER, &c.

FOSTER'S EX'OR v. SAME.

(Filed January 22, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Decedents' estates—Personal representative—Statute of limitation—Estoppel—Res judicata—F. died in 1875 testate, leaving three children, E., J. and M. In March, 1875, E. qualified as executor of his father's will, and took charge of the estate. The personal estate amounted to about $20,000, which was devised equally to the three children. The executor filed no inventory appraisement or sale bill or report of any kind until about a year after the first suit was brought. In 1896 the heirs brought suit against the executor, charging, in general terms, his failure to pay over the money. The action was referred to the commissioner to make a settlement with the executor. About a year after the action was filed the executor made a report to the commissioner of what he had received and paid out. The report was based on the recollection of the executor. He subsequently made an additional report. From these reports the commissioner made out a report showing a balance in the hands of the executor of $1,532.05. The report was filed in 1898. After this report was filed the executor offered to file an amended answer, pleading lapse of time and the statute of limitation in bar of the action. The court refused to permit this answer to be filed. In 1899, and before judgment, E. died, leaving three children, G., J. and H. G. administered on the estate of his father, and the action was revived against him, and he offered to file the plea of the lapse of time and the statute of limitation. The court refused to permit this plea to be filed and judgment was rendered on behalf of plaintiffs against the administrator. Before this judgment was rendered plaintiffs instituted this suit against G., as administrator and against him individually, and against the other two heirs of the executor, alleging that a few days before he died the executor had given his children all his personal estate, leaving nothing but a tract of land, containing about 200 acres, and worth $40 or $50 per acre, and asked the court to sell so much of the land descended to the children as would pay their claim. The case was referred to commissioner for report of claims against the estate. Afterwards the commissioner reported, and allowed this claim and one or two other small claims. The defendants filed exceptions to the claim of plaintiffs and pleaded lapse of time, the statute of limitation and the former action between the same parties then pending in the same court as a bar to the action. After the judgment in the former action against the administrator had been rendered and execution issued and returned no property found, plaintiffs filed an amended petition setting out said facts. On the trial of this last action the court adjudged that the plea of the statute of limitation by J. was a good defense and released the property which descended to him from his father, continued the case as to H., who was a nonresident, and adjudged that the plea of the statute of limitation did not protect G. from liability as he was a party to the former action as administrator, and adjudged that his interest in the land descended from his father be sold to satisfy said claim. Appeals have been prosecuted in both cases, and by consent are heard together. Held—That the plea of a former suit pending was in effect a special demurrer, and failure to have the lower court pass on it before trial was a waiver of it. Besides, the second action was instituted under section 428, Civil Code of Practice, which authorizes a personal representative, legatee, distributee or creditor to bring a suit for settlement of a decedent's estate, while the first was a suit against the personal representative alone, and he was the only party to the action. The lower court did not err in refusing to allow the executor to plead the statute of limitation in the first suit and his son his administrator. The action had been pending two years against the executor; the pleadings made up the proof heard and the commissioner's report filed, and after he was brought out in debt he for the first time offered the plea. The court erred in sustaining the plea of the statute of limitation by J., brother of appellant, for the reason that by the conduct of their ancestor he was estopped from entering the plea, and they, as his descendants, stood in no better attitude. They took the property by descent from him with the burdens he left upon it.

2. Negligence of personal representative—Compensation—The personal representative was properly held liable for a debt he failed to collect and permitted the statute of limitation to bar the recovery. The court properly refused to make the executor an allowance on account of his failure to perform his duties.

3. Pleading—The failure to have the lower court pass on a plea, which is in effect a special demurrer, before trial will be considered a waiver of it.

Appeals from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On February 28, 1875, Geo. R. Foster died testate, leaving three children, viz., E. D. Foster, Jerry Foster and Mildred Secrest. On March 8, 1875, E. D. Foster qualified in the Nicholas County Court as the executor of his father's will.

From what we can gather from the record in this case the personal estate of Geo. R. Foster consisted of about $20,000. By said will special bequests were made out of this personalty to his two sons and daughter to the amount of about $14,000, leaving the balance of his personal estate, after the payment of his debts, to be equally distributed among his three children.

The executor, E. D. Foster, never at any time filed an inventory, appraise bill or report of any kind, showing what estate he received as such executor until about a year after the first action herein was filed. He never made a settlement with the county court at any time, and such was the condition of affairs in 1896, when this first action was instituted by Hattie M. Foster, &c. against E. D. Foster as executor of his father. By reason of there not being any record evidence or report of any kind at their command the plaintiffs necessarily filed a petition containing no specific allegations as to the amount received by the executor or the amount paid out by him. He answered in general terms, denying the general allegations, and did not disclose in his answer what he had received or paid out. An order was made, referring the case to the master commissioner to take proof, make settlement and report to the court the condition of the estate in his hands. The commissioner did not make settlement with him until about a year after the action was filed, at which time, and the first time, the executor made a report to the commissioner of what he had received belonging to the estate and what he had paid out. The report was based on the recollection of the executor, as stated by him at the time. Afterwards he filed an additional statement, giving, as his best recollection, the amounts he had received belonging to the estate and the amounts he had paid out for it. The commissioner, from these statements, made out a report and filed it in said action, showing a balance in the hands of the executor belonging to the estate of $1,583.05. This report was filed in 1898. After this report was filed, and for the first time, the defendant, E. D. Foster, offered to file an amended answer pleading lapse of time and the statutes of limitation in bar of plaintiffs' right to recover. Objection was made to this, and the court sustained the objections.

Before judgment, and in 1899, E. D. Foster died intestate, leaving three children, viz., Geo. R. Foster, Jr., J. C. Foster and Hattie Washburn. Geo. R. Foster, Jr., administered upon the estate of his father, and the action was revived against the administrator, and he offered, as administrator, to file the plea of lapse of time and the statutes of limitation, which the court refused to allow him to do, and judgment was rendered on behalf of plaintiffs against Geo. R. Foster as administrator, to be levied upon the assets in his hands belonging to his father's estate. But before this judgment was rendered and after the death of E. D. Foster, and on October 18, 1899, these same plaintiffs brought an action in the same court, making Geo. R. Foster, Jr., as administrator, and Geo. R. Foster individually, J. C. Foster and Hattie Washburn and her husband defendants, setting up this claim which was being litigated in the former action, alleging that E. D. Foster had, a few days before his death, given to his children all of his personal estate, leaving nothing except a tract of land, which was set out in the last action by metes and bounds, consisting of about 200 acres, and valued at about $40 or $50 per acre. They asked the court to sell so much of the land descended to the children as would pay their claim, being two-thirds of the $1,532.05, and asked that the action be referred to the commissioner for report of claims against the estate. Afterwards the commissioner reported and allowed this claim and one or two small claims. The defendants filed exceptions to the claim of these plaintiffs and pleaded lapse of time, the statutes of limitation and the former action between the same parties, pending in the same court and for the same thing, as a bar to this one. After the judgment in the former action against Geo. R. Foster, as administrator of his father, for two-thirds of the $1,532.05, had been rendered and execution issued and returned no property found, these plaintiffs in this action filed an amended petition, setting up said judgment and executions returned no property found, and filing copies thereof. On the trial of this last action the court adjudged that the plea of the statute of limitation by J. C. Foster was available as a defense, so far as he was concerned, and released the property which descended to him from his father from the payment of it; continued the case so far as Hattie Washburn was concerned, as she was a nonresident and was before the court by constructive service only; adjudged that the plea of the statutes of limitation by Geo. R. Foster, Jr., did not avail him, because he was a party to the former action as administrator, and adjudged that his interest in the land descended to him from his father be sold to satisfy said claim, and he has appealed from said judgment to this court.

The two cases are here on appeal in this court, and by written consent of the parties filed in the record they are to be tried together.

Appellant contends that his plea in the second action, that the first suit was pending in the same county, between the same parties and for the same thing, should have been sustained. In our opinion the plea was in effect a special demurrer, and the appellant failing to have the court act upon it before trial, it is deemed to have been waived. Besides, this second action was brought by virtue of section 428 of the Civil Code of Practice, which authorizes a representative, legatee, distributee or creditor of a deceased person to bring an action in equity for the settlement of his estate. The first action was against the personal representative for the purpose of fixing the amount of the claim against the estate and he, in his fiducial capacity, was the only party to this action. The appellant also contends that the lower court erred in refusing the plea by E. D. Foster of the statutes of limitation, and also his son's plea to the same effect, as his personal representative, in the first action, and also that of Geo. R. Foster, Jr., to the same effect in the second action. The lower court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to allow E. D. Foster to file said plea of the statutes of limitation. The action had been pending against him for two years, the pleadings made up, proof heard, and the commissioner's report filed and after bringing him out in debt in the sum named, he then, for the first time, offered the plea. (14 Bush, 494.) Likewise the court properly refused to allow the plea by his administrator and also by him in his individual capacity in the last action; but the court erred in sustaining the plea of the statutes of limitation by J. C. Foster, brother of appellant, for the reason that by the conduct of their ancestor, E. D. Foster, he was estopped from entering the plea, and they, as his descendants, stood in no better attitude than he did. They took the property by descent from him with the burdens he left upon it.

Appellant contends that the court erred to his prejudice in failing to give credit for a $300 note and interest against A. J. Kennedy and W. J. Kennedy that his father received as executor, for the reason that he never collected it, and also for not giving him credit for an allowance as executor.

A. J. Kennedy was the principal and W. J. Kennedy the surety on said note. When the note was received by E. D. Foster, the executor, it was known by him that A. J. Kennedy was the principal and W. J. Kennedy the surety, and that the former was insolvent and the latter solvent. In his deposition he stated that he had a conversation with W. J. Kennedy; that it would be barred as to him in a few months and Kennedy begged him for further time; he granted it and after it was barred, he brought suit on it and lost. In the effort to collect that note he did not use any diligence, and, therefore, the court did right in charging him with it, and the court did right in refusing to make him an allowance as executor. From his own statement he never in any respect performed his duty as executor, and at the trial it was not known what estate he had received into his hands as executor or paid out on account thereof, except from his own recollection given twenty-one years after the estate went into his hands.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

CONN, &c. v. DESHA, &c.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Chas. J. Helm for appellants.

W. H. McKoy and Ramsey Washington for appellees.

Appeal from Campbell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This case seems to be on all fours with the case of Johnson v. Smith, 24 Ky Law Rep., 883. The appeal was filed November 1, 1899. It was continued from time to time until February 14, 1902, and then submitted. There is no brief for appellants, and the question sought to be raised is no longer of any practical importance. There is no real controversy between the parties so far as we can see, and for the reasons given in the case referred to the appeal is dismissed.

WAGNER v. CAST. &amp;c.

(Filed January 23, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Street improvement—Alley No. 1, which runs north and south from Harvey street to Gallagher street, passes through the western part of the square 67 feet from the center, and the lots of appellant which are sought to be charged with the improvement of alley No. 1 are situate in the northwest quarter of the square, and the correctness of this burden is involved on this appeal. Held—That said property is subject to said tax, and appellant can not complain because the burden is not imposed on property owners in the northeast and southwest sections.

Lane & Harrison for appellant.

Wm. Furlong for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Under separate ordinances and contracts two alleys in a square, bounded on the north by Harvey, on the east by Seventeenth, on the south by Gallagher and on the west by Eighteenth streets, were improved by original construction.

The following diagram will serve to show the location of the alleys:

The alley running north and south between Harvey and Gallagher streets is wholly within the northwest and southwest quarters of the square. It is situated about 67 feet west of the center of the square. The other alley runs from Seventeenth street west to the center of the square; thence to the point of intersection with the alley described, running north and south. The lots of the appellant, Wagner, which have been assessed for part of the cost of the construction of the alleys, are situated in the northwest quarter of the square. For convenience we will call the alley running north and south No. 1 and the one running east and west No. 2. The question here involved is the correctness of the judgment of the court below by which it was determined that the northwest quarter and the southwest quarter squares should pay the entire cost of alley No. 1, and that part of the cost of alley No. 2 running from the center of the square west to the point of intersection with alley No. 1.

Under the charter of cities of the first class, where the territory contiguous to the improved public way is defined into squares by principal streets, the tax district is made up of the quarter squares contiguous to the improved way and every square foot of the ground in the entire tax district is subjected to exactly the same charge. The rule is different where the improved public way is within the interior of the square. This court has held in Washle v. Neham, 97 Ky., 351, that where the alley improved lies wholly within one of the quarter squares, the other three-quarters can not be required to pay any part of the cost of the improvement. This, it will be observed, establishes an exception to the general rule stated. When an alley is improved running wholly through two quarter squares, then the expense must be borne by those quarter squares, if they alone are benefited by it.

That part of alley No. 2 running from the center line of the square west to alley No. 1 passes partly through the northwest and southwest quarter squares, and as they were benefited alone by it, the court properly held that they should pay the expense of it. The property owners in the northeast quarter and southeast quarter paid the entire cost of the construction of alley No. 2 from Seventeenth street to the center of the square. If any error was made in the assessment, it was prejudicial to the rights of the property owners in the northeast and southeast quarters of the square. In support of the conclusion we have reached we cite Dumesnil v. Gleason, 99 Ky., 652; Dumesnil v. Shanks, 97 Ky., 354; McHenry v. Selvage, 99 Ky., 232; Barrett v. Falls City Stone Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 670.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to the appellant the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. REYNOLDS.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Personal injuries—Pleading—Evidence—Appellee, with other gentlemen, arrived at Glasgow Junction for the train at night for the purpose of going to his home in Louisville. Upon arriving at the station the waiting room was closed, and they went to the hotel office near to wait. Soon afterwards they were informed that their train was coming, and they went to the station to take it. It proved to be a freight train, and while they were still on the platform waiting a southbound passenger train passed without stopping. Appellee was standing about three feet from the corner of the depot and about fifteen feet from the track on which the passenger train was running. A large lump of coal fell, or was thrown, from the tender and struck appellee, inflicting severe, painful and permanent injuries, for which he instituted this action and recovered a verdict for $9,166.66 damages, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The petition stated that said injuries caused great mental and physical suffering, and he was,

For a long time, rendered incapable of attending to his business. Appellant, after testifying that he was a practicing physician, making a specialty of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat for something like thirty years, was permitted to testify, against the objection of appellant, that from March until the end of June is the best time of the year for his business, and that for the first six months of the year he earned more than an average of $100 per day. There was evidence showing that appellee was not able to sit up for seventeen or eighteen days in April. Held—That appellant owed to appellee the duty of protection as a passenger. It was the duty of appellant to run its trains through this station without throwing coal from them upon the platform used by the passengers, and if a block of coal was thrown from the train, and thereby appellee was injured, the law presumes negligence on the part of appellant. Where special damages are not such as the defendant would naturally anticipate from the injury, they must be pleaded with sufficient particularity as fairly to apprise him of the charge which he is to meet. The petition in this case was not sufficient to admit the evidence in question under the above rule. The fact that this was the best season of the year for the plaintiff in the practice of his specialty, and that the time he lost was so valuable, was not to be inferred from his injury, or the bare allegation that he lost time, and to justify a recovery of items so unusual the fact should have been specially pleaded. Said evidence was prejudicial.

J. A. Mitchell, Edward W. Hines, H. W. Bruce, W. D. Hines and E. D. Warfield for appellant.

B. H. Young, L. R. Yeaman, Logan Porter and Luther James for appellee.

Appeal from Barren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, Dudley S. Reynolds, in company with a friend, drove to Glasgow Junction, a station on appellant's road, for the purpose of taking the train there and returning to his home in Louisville. They reached the station a little after 11 o'clock at night, and the waiting room not being open, were taken to the hotel office near by. Soon after this they were informed that the train was coming, and went out on the platform to take it. The train which was approaching turned out to be a freight, and while they were still on the platform a southbound passenger train, running very rapidly, passed the station without stopping. Appellee was standing by the side of the depot, and three or four feet further from the track than the corner of the building. A friend was standing near him. Just as the engine passed appellee was heard to groan, and his companion turned to him, finding him bending over, apparently suffering much, and asked him what was the matter. He answered that he had been struck by a missile from the train. They took him to the hotel. There were several physicians in the party on the platform. He insisted that his bladder was ruptured, but after examination the physicians found that this was not true, but he was bruised in the region of the pubic bone. It turned out that the spermatic cord was injured; also one of the testicles, which swelled up very large, and finally atrophied, shrinking until it was very small. He filed this suit against the railroad company to recover for the injury. His testimony on the trial was to the effect that the train ran through the station at the rate of sixty or seventy miles an hour; that just a little before the cab of the engine got directly opposite him he saw a large black object leave the tender, between the middle and rear end of the tender; that he had no thought of its coming to him, but in less time than one could think it struck him, crushing the whole front surface of the left side and rupturing the wall of the abdomen; that the bruised muscles and nerves of the left side relaxed and grew together on the top muscles; that he had lost complete knowledge of the movement of the left leg after standing a little while or walking a little bit, and that he can not walk more than two or three squares without stopping. He said that the thing which struck him was a lump of coal, which was crushed into small fragments. He suffered very greatly from his injury, and lost something like fifty pounds in weight. The proof for the defendant tended to show that the train was not running so fast, but only about forty miles an hour, and that appellee had been informed before he was struck that his train was an hour late, and that he was remaining on the platform for the reason that it was supposed that, perhaps, the southbound train would stop, and his companion in that event wished to take it. He, however, testified that he did not know that his train was late. The proof also shows that the point at which he was standing was fifteen feet from the track, and it is earnestly insisted for appellant that it was a physical impossibility for a lump of coal thrown from the train to have struck him at this distance from the track, and in support of this contention we are referred to the C. & St. L. Railroad v. Berry, 46 L. R. A., 83; but under the evidence we think this was a question for the jury.

Appellee was, in any view of the evidence, rightfully on the platform, and sustained the relation of passenger to the appellant, for he was there to take the train, and, the waiting room being closed, had a right to be on the platform. It was train time, and so he had a right to come to the station at this time to take the train, and if it be true that he was told that the train was late, being at the station, he had a right to remain there and wait for it. Being three feet further from the track than the corner of the depot, it can not be said that he was imprudent in standing where he was. It was the duty of the carrier to use the utmost care and skill which prudent men are accustomed to use under like circumstances for the protection of its passengers on its trains. (Louisville City Railway v. Weams, 80 Ky., 430; Louisville Railway Co. v. Park, 96 Ky., 580.) It was also its duty to take reasonable or ordinary care to keep its station and premises in such a state that those whom it invited there should not be unnecessarily exposed to danger.

"The reasonable care which the law imposes upon the carrier in this respect may not after all be essentially different from the duty of exercising the exact degree of care which the law puts upon him in protecting the passenger after entering his vehicle, because in either case the law demands no more than that the carrier shall do what is reasonable in view of the fact that human life is committed to his custody and protection." (3 Thompson on Negligence, section 2679, 2680.)

It was the duty of appellant to run its trains through this station without throwing coal from them upon the platform used by the passengers, and if a block of coal was thrown from the train, and thereby appellee was injured,

The law presumes negligence on the part of appellant. In Gulf, &c., Railroad v. Wood, 63 S. W., 164, a section hand standing near the track was struck by a block of coal thrown from a passing train. The company was held responsible under the rule that when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if proper care is exercised, the mere happening of the accident will be regarded as sufficient to warrant the submission of negligence to the jury. (21 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 513.) The court said: "The lump of coal which fell from appellant's tender or train was under the management of appellant's servants. In the ordinary course of things it would not have fallen or been thrown from the train if those servants had used proper care to keep it in place. That the tender was properly loaded with coal, and it was carefully handled by appellant's servants, afford no explanation of how the lump that injured appellee happened to fall or be thrown from the passing train. The thing itself speaks negligence." * * *

To same effect see Howser v. C. & P. Railroad, 27 L. R. A., 154; Gleeson v. V. N. Railroad, 140 U. S. 435; 3 Thompson on Negligence, section 2754-2761.

The allegation of the plaintiff's petition in regard to the damages is in these words: "By all of which plaintiff was badly bruised and injured in his person, and his health and vitality permanently impaired and his ability to walk with ease and comfort permanently and greatly decreased, and he was also caused great mental and physical suffering and for a long time rendered incapable of attending to his business, whereby he has been damaged in the sum of $10,000, for which amount he prays judgment and all proper relief."

The plaintiff stated that he was a practicing physician, making a specialty of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat for something like thirty years. Then, over the objection of the defendant, this evidence was admitted:

"Q. I will get you to state to the jury in April, when you received this injury at that time, what relation that bears to the best part of the year, and what would be your income for that period of days that you were sick?"

"A. Well, from March until the end of June is the best time of the year for me. I earn something more than on an average $100 per day during the first six months of the year."

The injury occurred on the 18th of April. Appellee was not able to sit up for seventeen or eighteen days, and at the end of three months was not able to ride in a street car. The jury returned a verdict for $9,166.66, under an instruction of the court allowing them to find, among other things, such an amount as would fairly and reasonably compensate appellee for the value of time lost. Where special damages are not such as the defendant would naturally anticipate from the injury, they must be pleaded with sufficient particularity as fairly to apprise him of the charge which he is to meet. In 3 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 254, after a statement of the rule as to general damages, it is said: "But where the damages, though the natural consequences of the act complained of, are not the necessary result of it, they are termed special damages, which the law does not imply; and, therefore, in order to prevent a surprise upon the defendant, they must be particularly specified in the declaration or the plaintiff will not be permitted to give evidence of them at the trial." (Donnell v. Jones, 48 Am. Dec., 59; 5 Ency. Pl. & Pr., 750.)

The petition in this case was not sufficient to admit the evidence in question under the above rule. The fact that this was the best season of the year for the plaintiff in the practice of his specialty, and that the time he lost was so valuable, was not to be inferred from his injury or the bare allegation that he lost time; and to justify a recovery of items so unusual the fact should have been specially pleaded. In view of the size of the verdict, the peculiar facts of the case, and the admission of this evidence, we are of opinion that a new trial should be granted.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

Whole court sitting.

CARDWELL, &c. v. HARGIS.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Sureties—Contracts—Sales of land by the county—County courts—Lands belonging to C., who was surety of a defaulting sheriff, were sold to satisfy the indebtedness due the State and Breathitt county, when the county purchased the land. A. was treasurer of the county. An order was subsequently entered by the fiscal court, directing A., as commissioner of the county, to sell and convey all lands which had been purchased by the county, under executions against the sheriff and others, and directing that no lands be sold for less than the amounts paid by the county, including interest. Pursuant to this order the commissioner sold the lands purchased from C. to appellee for the amount paid by the county, with interest, and gave him a title bond therefor. Appellee paid the amount of the purchase money to the county treasurer. Afterwards the fiscal court accepted the proposition from the wife of C. to purchase the land at the same price that appellee paid for it, and she paid the purchase money to the county, and the commissioner conveyed the title of the land to her. The county has never repaid to appellee the purchase money, but ratified the settlement of the treasurer, showing the acceptance of the purchase money from appellee. Appellee instituted this action for a specific performance of the contract of sale. Held—That he is entitled to a conveyance of the land purchased by him from the commissioner, and said commissioner had full authority to make the sale, besides, the fiscal court ratified the sale.

J. J. C. Bach for appellants.

Pollard & Redwine for appellee.

Appeal from Morgan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Breck Combs, sheriff of Breathitt county, defaulted in the payment of public dues, including the sums coming to Breathitt county. The appellant, T. P. Cardwell, was one of the sureties on one of his bonds. A. H. Hargis was county treasurer, and the fiscal court of the county directed him to collect the money due the county from the sheriff. Combs failed to pay it, and the fiscal court directed Hargis, treasurer of the county, to institute suit against him and sureties therefor. Accordingly, he instituted suit and obtained judgment, among others, one against the appellant, T. P. Cardwell, and others for the revenue due the county for 1895, which amounted to something over $4,000. An execution was issued in January, 1899, against Cardwell, placed in the hands of the sheriff, who levied it upon a certain tract of land in Breathitt county, located in what is known as the "Pan-bowl," and at the following March term of the county court it was sold, Breathitt county becoming the purchaser at the price of $1,700, $100 more than the value placed upon it by the appraisers. It having brought more than two-thirds of the appraised value, the sheriff, on March 21, 1899, conveyed it to Breathitt county; on the 25th of the same month A. H. Hargis, commissioner, claiming to act under an order of the fiscal court, sold it to the appellee, James Hargis, for $1,705.38, the $5.38 being the accrued interest upon it from the time of the sale by the sheriff to the date of the sale to the appellee. The appellee, James Hargis, paid A. H. Hargis the money, and received from him, as commissioner of Breathitt county, title bond for the land, in which it was covenanted that the county would make the purchaser a deed for the land. At the following April term of the fiscal court, to wit, on the 4th day of April, A. H. Hargis reported to the fiscal court that he had collected $1,705.38, proceeds of the T. P. Cardwell farm; the record shows that the report was examined, approved and confirmed; this report stated the balance in his hands due the county, which the court subsequently ordered paid to its treasurer, who succeeded Hargis.

On the same day this report was approved and confirmed, but afterwards the appellant, Ellen Cardwell, came into court and offered to purchase from Breathitt county the same tract of land which had been sold to the appellee. The court then, over the objection of appellee, decided that it would accept the offer, and on the following day directed Bach, as commissioner, to convey the land to her, which was accordingly done, she on that day paying into court exactly the same amount which the appellee had paid for the land, the court directed that the same go into the hands of the treasurer of the county, where it seems to now remain.

The appellee, James Hargis, instituted this action to enforce the specific performance of his contract; he claims that under an order of the Breathitt County Court A. H. Hargis was authorized to sell the land, and if it is not clear that the order conferred such authority upon him, the subsequent ratification of the action of A. H. Hargis vested him with the equitable title to the property and the right to have specific performance of the contract.

It may be stated that Ellen Cardwell is the wife of T. P. Cardwell; that A. H. Hargis is the brother of appellee, James Hargis. There is no claim in this record that the land was sold to the appellee for less than its value, and as evidence that the fiscal court did not think so, it attempted to convey it to Mrs. Cardwell for exactly the same amount of consideration which the appellee had paid for it; in fact the Cardwells sought to show, in the cross-examination of witnesses, that Hargis was anxious to acquire the land, and had paid for it perhaps more than it was worth. This case must be disposed of upon the law and not upon sentimentality. If the county had acquired title to the property from the sale under the execution, it had the right to sell it to whomsoever it pleased. If it exercised that right by disposing of the property, it parted with that right and the property, notwithstanding any desire the fiscal court may have had to let Mrs. Cardwell have the property.

The order under which A. H. Hargis was acting in the sale of the property reads as follows:

"CLAIM ORDER BOOK BREATHITT COUNTY COURT OF CLAIMS.

"April Term, April 8, 1897.

"Ordered, That A. H. Hargis be, and he is hereby, appointed this court's commissioner, to sell and dispose of all the lands purchased by Breathitt county, under executions in favor of Breathitt county, against Breck Combs and others, raised from the Breathitt Circuit Court. He shall not take less than the purchase price for said land than the same amount that was paid by the county for it, with accrued interest to the day of sale.

"He will use his sound discretion in taking in as payment for said land any outstanding indebtedness of Breathitt county."

The county was badly in need of money to meet its outstanding obligations, hence directed Hargis, as treasurer, to collect by suit the money due it from Combs and his sureties. To facilitate the getting of money and converting the property which it purchased under the execution on the judgment against Combs and his sureties, it appointed Hargis commissioner to sell the lands purchased in satisfaction of these judgments. The only restriction placed upon him was not to sell them for an amount less than the amount which the county had paid for them.

In construing contracts it is done in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties to them. The situation of the parties at the time, and of the property, which is the subject-matter and the object in view in making the contract, will aid materially in construing contracts. Courts endeavor to give to contracts a rational and just construction. The order directs him to sell and dispose of all of the lands purchased by Breathitt county under the executions in favor of Breathitt county against Breck Combs and others raised from the Breathitt Circuit Court. The order does not state that the commissioner should sell lands previously purchased or those to be subsequently purchased, but says that he should sell all of the lands purchased under such executions.

Under a fair interpretation of the order Hargis, as commissioner, was vested with power to sell and convey such lands as might be purchased in satisfaction of the executions issued against Combs and his sureties. If that is correct, then the sale which he made to the appellee is valid. If there was any doubt upon this question in our minds, then when the fiscal court of the county approved the report of its treasurer, A. H. Hargis, in which he reported in his hands the proceeds of the sale of the Cardwell land, it approved the disposition which he had made of it, that was a ratification of the contract; the contract being once ratified, it was not within the power of the court to withdraw its ratification or to alter the rights of the parties. The money has never been returned to the appellee and, so far as this record shows, no order has been made directing that it should be done. The county has received its money from appellee, still holds it and, over his objection and protest, conveyed the land to the appellant, Mrs. Cardwell. If there could be any doubt as to whether the order conferred upon the commissioner the power to sell the land, his principal accepted the proceeds, and has never tendered the return thereof, which amounts to a ratification. This would amount to a ratification of a contract between individuals, and the action of the county court is an effectual ratification of the act of its agent.

Had a stranger appeared in court under the circumstances under which Mrs. Cardwell appeared and sought to deprive Hargis of the purchase which he had made, neither this court nor any other court for one moment would have approved the action of the fiscal court in its attempt to do so. Mrs. Cardwell, so far as the law goes, had no greater right than a stranger to deprive the appellee of the benefit of his purchase, nor had the fiscal court the right to repudiate the authority which it had given to its agent, especially in view of the fact that it had approved his act.

It has been suggested in brief that as Hargis has not sustained any damages for which action would lie, he is not entitled to a specific performance. The county has attempted to deprive him of the land conveyed to him, and has the money which he paid for the land, and most certainly he is entitled to a specific performance of his contract.

Judgment is affirmed.

Judge Burnam dissenting.

COOK v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 23, 1903.)

1. Criminal law—Continuance—Absence of counsel and witnesses—Appellant was indicted for murder by the grand jury of Letcher county, and a change of venue granted to Bell county. One continuance was granted in Bell county, and on the calling of the case for trial a motion for a continuance was made on the ground of absence of counsel and of witnesses. The motion was overruled and the affidavit was read as the deposition of absent witnesses. A trial resulted in a conviction and sentence to life imprisonment, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the refusal to grant a continuance on account of absence of witnesses was not prejudicial, as defendant was given the benefit of their testimony. The counsel whose absence was urged as a ground for a continuance lived in Letcher county, and had never appeared in the case, and it was not stated in the affidavit that defendant expected him to be present at a subsequent term of court, and the affidavit discloses no peculiar reason why this attorney could represent him more efficiently than other lawyers who could be obtained. The court did not err in refusing a continuance on the ground of absence of counsel, as he had the services of a capable, honest and painstaking lawyer, who rendered him every service that could have been rendered, and produced all the evidence to support the defense of an alibi that could have been produced. This court has adopted the rule that cases should not ordinarily be continued on the sole ground of absence of counsel.

2. Evidence—It was not prejudicial to appellant, even if erroneous, to permit the detail to the jury of circumstances of a difficulty previous to the one in which appellant was engaged, between third parties, where appellant was in no way connected with it.

N. B. Hays for appellant.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant, George Cook, and a number of other persons were indicted by the grand jury of Letcher county, Kentucky, charging them with the murder of one Jemima Hall. Subsequently a change of venue was had, and the case transferred to Bell county, Kentucky, for trial.

Appellant's case was called for trial at the May term, 1902, of the Bell Circuit Court, and appellant was convicted of willful murder, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for the term of his natural life. The motion for a new trial having been overruled, and the defendant sentenced, he has appealed to this court for a reversal of the judgment against him. In support of his contention that this case should be reversed, appellant's counsel urges but two grounds: First, that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for a continuance of the case; and, second, that the court erred in admitting incompetent testimony during the trial. The second objection is based upon the fact that the court permitted Robert Johnson and Bury Toliver to detail to the jury the circumstances of a difficulty between Mack Yontz and Samuel Vanover some time before the killing of Jemima Hall, in which they stated to the jury that Yontz said to Vanover that "he would kill him."

We fail to see how the admission of this testimony prejudiced appellant, or in anywise affected him, conceding it to have been incompetent; it in nowise connected appellant with the quarrel<sup>o</sup> in question, and, therefore, could not prejudice the minds of the jury against him. The first ground, that the court erred in refusing to grant appellant a continuance because of the absence of his counsel, Judge S. E. Baker, is the one upon which appellant's counsel really rests his hopes of a reversal.

Upon the calling of the case for trial appellant announced that he was not ready for trial, and filed his affidavit in support thereof, in which he set out two grounds of continuance: One because of the absence of certain witnesses, and the second because of the absence of his counsel, Judge S. E. Baker. The first ground is immaterial, because the Commonwealth's attorney permitted the affidavit to be read as a deposition. The second ground in the affidavit, so far as it relates to the absence of appellant's attorney, is as follows: "That prior to this term of court he employed Judge S. E. Baker, who lives in Letcher county, Kentucky, as one of his counsel, and paid him part of his fee to defend him in the trial of this case; that said Baker is a good lawyer and a skillful practitioner, and is thoroughly acquainted with the evidence in this case, and he is the only lawyer he has employed, or to whom he has confided his defense, or relied upon to defend him; that there are two other counsel in the case, and they were feed by the other defendants to make their defense; that he can not safely go to trial without the services of said Baker; that he is absent without the procuring or consent of this affiant, and against his will, and he believed and relied upon him to be present, and expected him to be there; that said Baker is now more than 130 miles from this place, most of the distance to be traveled horseback or afoot; that he makes this affidavit not to delay the case, but to procure justice and a fair trial."

In support of the first ground for a reversal appellant relies upon the cases of Bates, &c. v. Commonwealth, 13 Ky. Law Rep., 135; Leslie v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1201, and Cornelius v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 771.

In the case of Bates v. Commonwealth the appellants were indicted, tried, convicted and sentenced within twenty-four days, and in that case the affidavit for a continuance showed that their attorney was necessarily detained by his duties as an officer of the United States, and that while he could not be present on the day fixed for the trial, he could be present by the second day thereafter. Under these circumstances the court properly held that the trial judge abused his judicial discretion in failing to afford appellants the opportunity of having their counsel present; and Judge Holt, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "We do not of course mean that the trial court has no discretion in the matter of continuances. It is, however, a legal one, and if it be so exercised as to deprive the accused, when not in fault, of a fair trial, justice requires that he should not be remediless. * * * While a speedy transaction of judicial business is to the interest of the public, yet it should never be had at the expense of justice, which must always be regarded as the paramount purpose of judicial investigation. It is true cases should not ordinarily be continued upon the sole ground of absence of counsel."

In the case of Leslie v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1203, Judge DuRelle, after showing in his opinion several sufficient reasons for reversal of the case, seems to have thrown as an additional weight in the scales this expression: "Moreover, the unexpected absence of appellant's local counsel on the morning of the trial, without any notice to him, would appear to afford ample reason why a continuance should have been granted." It does not appear that this case would have been reversed alone for the reason that appellant's local counsel was unexpectedly absent. And in the case of Cornelius v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 771, Judge White, after stating several good and sufficient reasons for the reversal of the case, adds the additional one that "appellant was entitled to a continuance on the ground of the unexpected and unavoidable absence of his principal counsel."

In no case that we have been able to find, or which has been cited to us by counsel, has this court ever reversed alone upon the ground that the trial judge refused a continuance because of the absence of counsel, and Judge Holt, in his well-considered opinion in the case of Bates v. Commonwealth, supra, states the rule to be that "cases should not ordinarily be continued upon the sole ground of absence of counsel."

In the case of Steven v. Commonwealth, 9 Ky. Law Rep., 742, it is said that the absence of one or two or more of the counsel employed by the defendant in a criminal prosecution can not be sufficient reason for continuing the trial until the next term, especially when it does not clearly appear that a fair trial can not be had without his presence. Such a practice would frequently result in an indefinite postponement of criminal trials.

In the case of Brown v. Commonwealth, 7 Ky. Law Rep., 751, it is said: "To authorize a continuance on the ground of the absence of one of several attorneys there should be some assurance that he will be present at the next term, and a continuance should never be granted on that account unless it appears that the ends of justice require the presence at the trial of that particular person selected by the defendant and his counsel, and a fair and impartial trial can not be had without him."

In the case at bar there had already been one continuance, as shown by the affidavit of appellant, and it nowhere appears that the absent counsel was on hand when the case was called for trial at that time; and it is a significant fact that the absent counsel so necessary, according to the language of the affidavit, has never appeared in this case, except in the affidavit for the continuance.

The record shows that the counsel who is representing appellant in this court also represented him on the trial in the court below, and it shows, moreover, that appellant's defense was conducted in a most thorough and masterly manner. We do not believe that the absent counsel could have done anything for appellant that was not done for him by the learned counsel who appears for him at this bar.

Appellant's defense was an alibi, and he introduced no evidence in support thereof but his own testimony. There is nothing in such a defense that the present counsel could not have understood as well as the absent counsel, and we are not willing to say that, under all the circumstances, appellant has not had an impartial trial. The learned judge who presided upon the trial is eminently distinguished for impartial fairness and a love of justice; he was in a position to understand, from all the surrounding circumstances, better than this court, the merit of the motion for a continuance, and we will not say that he has abused the large discretion intrusted to him by the law, unless it is apparent from the record that appellant has been deprived of a fair and impartial trial by the ruling upon this question.

The evidence in this case abundantly justifies the verdict of the jury, and fully warrants the assumption on our part that nothing additional could have been done for appellant by his absent counsel. It is not necessary to state the evidence in detail, but it convinces us that appellant was guilty of one of the most heinous, cruel and wanton murders that has ever disgraced the criminal calendar of this Commonwealth. The Commonwealth has been forced, at great expense, to bring the witnesses from a long distance. Appellant had already had one continuance, and we do not think that the lower court erred, under all the circumstances, in overruling the motion for a continuance.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

READ, &c. v. COCHRAN.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Executions—Fraudulent conveyances—A. obtained a money judgment against B. in the Metcalfe Circuit Court, and execution was issued thereon and levied on a tract of land belonging to B., and A. became the purchaser of the land at the sale and transferred his purchase to his son, who entered upon the record of the court a notice that he would enter a motion for possession of said land. On the same day appellants, as the widow and infant child of a son of the debtor, filed their petition, denying that B. owned the land at the time the execution was levied on same, as he had previously sold and conveyed it to his son. The plaintiff filed an answer to this petition, alleging that said transfer of land was voluntary and fraudulent. Issue was joined and proof taken thereon, and on the trial of the issue the lower court adjudged that the transfer was fraudulent and the land was in lien to satisfy the execution debt, and directed a sale to be made to satisfy it. On appeal, Held—That the judgment was more favorable to appellant than if the court had awarded the writ of possession, and the proof amply sustained the action of the court in declaring the deed from father to son as fraudulent.

W. L. Porter for appellants.

Basil Richardson for appellee.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

E. J. Cochran obtained a money judgment in the Metcalfe Circuit Court against Jonathan Read, upon which she caused to be issued an execution, which, coming into the hands of the sheriff of said county, was levied upon a tract of land, which is correctly described in the notice hereinafter mentioned, as the property of Jonathan Read. Thereafter the sheriff sold said land under said execution, and it was purchased by said E. J. Cochran for her debt. Afterwards E. J. Cochran, by writing, transferred her purchase of said land to appellee, George A. Cochran, her son, who, on the 5th day of July, 1900, entered upon the docket of the Metcalfe Circuit Court the following notice:

“Geo. A. Cochran, Plaintiff, }
“v. } Notice.
“Jonathan Read, Defendant. }

“Jonathan Read, Esq. :

“You are hereby notified that I will, on the 5th day of July, 1900, enter a motion on the docket of the Metcalfe Circuit Court for a judgment for the possession of a certain tract of land situated in said county, and State of Kentucky, near the village of Antioch, which land is described as follows, to wit (Here follows a description of the land in question); and being the same land bought by E. J. Cochran at a sale duly held under an execution which issued from the office of the clerk of the Metcalfe Circuit Court in favor of the said E. J. Cochran, plaintiff, against Jonathan Read, defendant, No. 2,689.

“The said E. J. Cochran having on the 24th day of November, 1899, sold, assigned and transferred her bid of the purchase to the said Geo. A. Cochran by a writing duly executed and delivered to him by the said E. J. Cochran.

(Signed) “GEO. A. COCHRAN,

“By Attorneys.”

On the same day the appellants, Mary L. Read and Erminie Read, an infant, suing by R. H. Barton, her next friend, filed their joint petition in said action, asserting an interest in the land in question, and praying to be made parties thereto, and that their petition be taken as their answer. In said petition appellants stated that Mary L. Read was the widow of Joe A. Read, and that Erminie Read was his only child and heir at law. They state, in substance, that Jonathan Read was not the owner of the property in question at the day of the pretended levy of the execution in favor of E. J. Cochran against him, but that he had theretofore, for the sum of $300, sold and transferred said property, by deed in writing, to Joe A. Read, and put him in possession of the same; that the said Joe A. Read was dead, and that at his death the land in question descended to appellants, his widow and child, as aforesaid, who were then the owners of same.

Upon the filing of this petition, which was made appellants' answer, Geo. A. Cochran filed a reply, alleging that the deed from Jonathan Read to Joe A. Read was a voluntary conveyance as to his debt, and was fraudulent and void. A rejoinder by appellants put in issue the allegations of the reply, and thus the issues were made up as between appellee and appellants. A good deal of testimony was taken on the question as to whether or not the deed from Jonathan Read, the execution defendant, to his son, Joe A. Read, the husband and father of appellants, was, or was not, voluntary and fraudulent as to appellee. It is a significant fact that while the deed from Jonathan Read to Joe A. Read was dated on the 15th day of April, 1898, and was acknowledged by the grantor and his wife on the 24th day of June, 1898, it was never lodged for record until the 5th day of July, 1900, the very day upon which appellee had given notice that he would enter his motion for a writ of possession.

Jonathan Read was Joe A. Read's father, and we think that the evidence in this case is abundantly sufficient to warrant the chancellor in concluding that as to the debt of appellee the conveyance was fraudulent and void; and it was manifestly to the interest of appellants that the court below should, instead of awarding a writ of possession for the land in question, have adjudged that the appellee had a lien upon the land, and ordered a sale to satisfy the same. In regard to appellants' contention, that the execution with the officer's sale thereunder was not filed with the notice or put in evidence, it may be said that the notice of the motion for the writ of possession was against the execution defendant, Jonathan Read, who allowed judgment, so far as he was concerned, to go by default, and he is not complaining here of the insufficiency of the notice, or the invalidity of the proceedings against him.

Appellants came into the case by petition, and set up what claim they had to the land in that petition and upon the issues thus formed upon their petition we think the evidence warrants the conclusion that the chancellor reached, and we can not see what interest appellants have in the regularity of the proceedings against Jonathan Read; they have had their day in the court, upon issues made by themselves, and upon which, as we have already said, the chancellor held adversely to them. The cases of McGee v. Sutherland, 84 Ky., 198; Phelps v. Jones, 91 Ky., 244, and Kennedy v. Weber, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 879, clearly establish that in a proceeding such as was instituted by appellee against Jonathan Read it is only necessary that the blank form of notice given in section 1689 of the Kentucky Statutes be followed. This appellee seems to have done, and we do not see that appellants have been injured in any of their substantial rights.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE &amp; NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. DAVIS.

(Filed January 27, 1903.)

Railroads — Negligence — Damages — Instructions—Appellee was a track walker on appellant's road in its employ, and while engaged in his duties saw a train approaching, and when over two hundred yards off heard a noise and saw it throwing out rocks from the roadbed, evidently done by an iron rod dragging, and before he could get out of the way was struck by rocks and seriously and permanently injured. This suit to recover for injuries resulted in a verdict for $3,000 damages. On this appeal it is insisted that the verdict was excessive, and that the court erred in not giving a peremptory instruction to find for defendant. Held—That the verdict is not excessive. It was the duty of the railroad company to exercise a reasonable care in providing appellee a safe place to work and to keep it safe. Appellee was in no way connected with the running of the train. He was in his proper place, and in the discharge of his duty. He is not chargeable with the negligence of those in charge of the train for they were in a separate and distinct service from him. The court did not err in refusing to give a peremptory instruction to find for appellant at the close of appellee's testimony. The acts complained of were prima facie negligent, and there was proof to show that the engine and tender were not inspected just before the accident.

J. A. Mitchell and E. W. Hines for appellant.

B. F. Proctor and G. H. Herdman for appellee.

Appeal from Edmonson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, W. E. Davis, on December 22, 1900, was a track walker in the service of appellant, on its section near Rocky Hill Station. As he was going along the track in the discharge of his duty he saw a train coming, and got to one side, as usual; when the train was something like two hundred yards from him he heard a rattling and saw rocks throwing out; he then aimed to get further away and as he turned around the rocks hit him in the side, on the leg and up in the back before he had time to get away. The train was going south, running something like fifty miles an hour; the rocks were thrown out by a rod or something of that sort under the bottom of the train, which was dragging against the ballast and ties. Appellee had been south to the end of his section and was returning. As he went down there were no dents upon the ties or ballast, but from the point where he was struck, for something over a mile back, there were dents in the ties and in the ballast, evidently made by the object which threw the rocks out. These dents continued for a mile or more beyond the point where he was hurt, and at the point where they stopped an iron rod was found six feet long or more and nearly an inch in diameter. In some places it struck the cross ties and at others it struck the ballast. It is shown by the proof that when anything gets down under a train it will throw out the ballast in this way. Appellee had seen it happen before, but not so bad as this. It is also shown by the proof that, although these dents upon the track continued for something over two miles, no one on the train, so far as the proof shows, knew anything of the trouble or took any steps to right it; the proof for the defendant shows that the cars of the train were inspected at Bowling Green, and were there found to be all right; also that they were inspected at Louisville before it left there and was then found to be all right. As to the extent of appellee's injury the proof is very conflicting, although there seems to be no doubt under all the evidence as to the fact of his being injured as above stated. The proof on his behalf shows that shortly afterwards he was taken very sick, and for two or three weeks was out of his head; that there was a hard place in his back, and he passed from his bladder a quantity of pus and blood; that after this his capacity to labor was substantially destroyed, and that his injury was probably permanent. The proof for the defendant shows that appellee did not regard his injury as serious at first, and that he had no trouble until he had a violent attack of colic. This, however, would not account for the pus and blood passed from his bladder, nor for other symptoms shown by the evidence. The extent of the injury was a question for the jury, and their verdict fixing the compensation for appellee therefor at $3,000 is not excessive or palpably against the evidence, if he was entitled to recover. It is earnestly maintained for appellant that no negligence on its part is shown, as all the facts established are as consistent with the hypothesis of unavoidable accident as that of negligence, and that the burden being upon the plaintiff to show negligence he has failed to make out his case.

While it is true that the train might have picked up a rod or beam and dragged it along the track, knocking out the rocks, without the knowledge of those in charge of the train, we are doubtful if they would be excusable for not finding this out in two miles and a quarter, as the proof shows that when anything gets loose, scattering the ballast under the car, some of the rocks will hit the bottom of the car, and a noise is made so that those running the train know of it when it occurs. Appellee was in no way connected with the running of the train. He was in his proper place, and in the discharge of his duty. He is not chargeable with the negligence of those in charge of the train, for they were in a separate and distinct service from him. It was the duty of appellant to exercise reasonable care in the operation of its trains for the protection of those in its service along its tracks, discharging the duties necessary in the maintenance of the track and the security of traffic. It could not, under this rule, allow its trains to run along, throwing out rocks from it, as this one did, endangering the life and limb to all within its reach. If a train is properly managed and properly run no such danger is to be apprehended by those near the track, and when anything so unusual occurs to such an extent as was shown here the thing itself is prima facie evidence of negligence. Thus in the case of Gulf, &c., R. R. Co. v. Wood, 63 S. W., 164, the plaintiff, a section hand, was struck by a block of coal thrown from a train which passed him, and it was held that he could recover. This case is stronger than that, for there only one lump of coal fell off, while here the rocks were flying for something like two miles. The court said: "There are instances in which the circumstances surrounding an occurrence and giving a character to it are held, if unexplained, to indicate the antecedent or coincident existence of negligence as the efficient cause of the injury complained of. This phrase, which, literally translated, means that 'the thing speaks for itself,' is merely a short way of saying that the circumstances attendant upon the accident are of themselves of such a character as to justify a jury in inferring negligence as the cause of that accident. There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or its servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of an explanation by defendant, that the accident arose from want of care."

In Barnowski v. Helson, 15 L. R. A., 83, a roof, which was being raised by jack screws, tipped and fell, and it was held that this created a presumption of negligence, and in the absence of explanatory proof was sufficient to sustain a recovery for the death therefrom of an employe. So in Howser v. The Cumberland, & Co., R. R. Co., 27 L. R. A., 154, the falling of a cross-tie from a railroad car, injuring a person walking over a footway, running beside the roadbed, was held to create a presumption of negligence, and in this case a number of authorities are collected.

It was the duty of the railroad company to exercise a reasonable care in providing appellee with a safe place to work, and to keep it safe. This obligation to him is not fairly to be distinguished from the case of a person walking on a way beside the roadbed, as in the case last cited, and seems to us to rest on the same principle. We, therefore, conclude that the court did not err in refusing the peremptory instruction asked by appellant at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence. While it might happen that, although proper care was exercised in the inspection of the train before it started, a rod might get down from some defect not discoverable by ordinary care, the evidence before us does not present this state of case. So far as appears there was no inspection of the engine or tender; at least, the proof shows no inspection of these, as we understand it, and there was proof that rods such as that referred to were in use under the engine and tender. There was no effort to show that the train picked up the rod as it ran along, and we do not well see that such a thing was at all probable. We think the proof fairly shows that this train made the marks on the cross-ties and ballast, and that it was throwing out the rocks as it went along. The evidence for the defendant failed to account for this, or to show the absence of negligence, and we, therefore, conclude that the verdict is not so palpably against the evidence as to justify us in disturbing it.

In the case of Brooks v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., ante, 1318, decided at this term, we held that a section hand who was injured by reason of the breaking of the short lever, which is underneath the body of a hand car connecting the lever with the axle, could not recover merely on proof that the lever broke; that decision rests on the ground that the master who furnishes tools to his servants for them to use in their work is not an insurer of the tools, and is not responsible for a defect, unless he might, by ordinary care, have discovered it. There was no proof in that case that there was any defect in the short lever, or that there was any neglect of the master in regard to it. The hand car was furnished to the section men to use in their work, and was run by them. The principle upon which that case rests has no application where the servant receives an injury from the premises of the master being unsafe by reason of matters beyond the sphere of his employment, and over which he has no control.

One of the grounds for new trial relates to a conversation had by some bystanders in the presence of two of the jury after the case was submitted to them while they were permitted to separate under the order of the court. But the proof shows that this occurred from the fact that the man who made the remark did not think at the time of any of the persons present being on the jury, and in view of the statements of the jurors, we do not think that this was sufficient to warrant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

BURGER v. ALLEN.

(Filed January 27, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Instructions—Agents—Appellee brought this action against appellant to recover for services due in running a farm for appellant; also for commissions in procuring a lease of said property to a gas and oil company. The answer sets up a counterclaim for a large amount of money and the suit involved a multiplicity of accounts, the decision of which was submitted to the jury, and a verdict resulted in favor of appellee, from which this judgment is prosecuted, and it is urged as error that the court improperly instructed the jury as to the claim for commissions in making the lease. Held—That the court erred to the prejudice of appellant in instructing the jury that they could find for appellee if they believed that he made a contract with an agent of appellant, whether the agency was for the purpose of making this lease or for any other purpose.

E. W. Hines and A. M. J. Cochran for appellant.

Kirk & Kirk and Hager & Stewart for appellee.

Appeal from Martin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This was an action by appellee against appellant in the Martin Circuit Court for the recovery of money alleged to be due appellee for services in caring for a large farm, known as the Warfield estate, belonging to appellant, and for money advanced by appellee in caring for said estate, and for commission for procuring the lease of said property to the Triple-State Natural Gas and Oil Co.

The petition contains three paragraphs, and sets forth with great particularity, the various items constituting the alleged indebtedness from appellant to appellee, and also the various sums alleged to be due appellant, and credits on same. The answer admits some part of the indebtedness claimed to be due appellee, but puts in issue a larger part of same, and sets up a counterclaim against appellee for a large sum of money alleged to be due appellant from appellee. Various amended and responsive pleadings were filed until the issues were finally made up. It is not necessary to notice further the pleadings herein, except to say that they plainly show that the action should have been transferred to equity and referred to a commissioner to state the account between appellant and appellee, as, in our opinion, the items in dispute between them were entirely too numerous and complicated to be submitted to a jury; but no motion seems to have been made to transfer the action to the equity side of the docket, and at the May term of the court, 1900, the case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of appellee for the sum of $1,012.50. The court overruled the instructions offered by appellant, and gave one instruction on its own motion, and of this instruction appellant is complaining here.

The largest single item constituting appellees' claim against appellant in the court below was for 10 per cent. commission alleged to be due him for effecting a lease of the property known as the Warfield estate to the Triple-State Natural Gas and Oil Co., which he alleges appellant had agreed and promised to pay him for effecting said lease. This employment of appellee appellant denies, and the evidence shows that the employment of appellee to make the lease in question was not made by appellant himself, but by one Brigle, whom appellee claimed was the agent of appellant for the purpose named. This appellant denied, and, therefore, the validity of appellee's claim for said commission turned upon the authority of Brigle to make the contract in question. Upon this subject the court said: "And if the jury believes from the evidence that the defendant (appellant) or his agent employed the plaintiff (appellee) to procure the Triple-State Natural Gas and Oil Co. to take a lease upon the property of defendant (appellant), and agreed to pay him a per cent. thereon for so doing, they will find for the plaintiff (appellee) the amount of commission thereon, with what time he is entitled to from the evidence in this case."

We think the instruction of the court upon this question was clearly erroneous and prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant. Appellant could only be held responsible under the contract of his agent, provided the agent was duly authorized to make the contract in question.

The instruction authorized the jury to hold plaintiff liable under the contract in question, if made by an agent of appellant, whether the agency was for the purpose of making this lease or for any other purpose. It was clearly misleading, and the case is, therefore, reversed, with instructions that, upon the return to the court below, it be transferred to equity and referred to a commissioner to state the account between the parties hereto, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BAILEY v. COMMONWEALTH

(Filed January 27, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Venue—Instructions in absence of defendant—The evidence failing to show that the offense of malicious cutting and wounding was done in Magoffin county, the conviction can not be sustained under section 124 of Criminal Code of Practice. The court erred in bringing the jury into the court room after submission of the case and explaining to them the meaning of the words "malice aforethought" in the absence of the accused.

James P. Adams for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Magoffin Circuit Court sentencing the appellant, Shimbo Bailey, to imprisonment in the penitentiary for one year for having maliciously cut and wounded Lee Arnett with the intent to kill him. The first ground relied on for reversal is that the venue of the offense charged in the indictment is not shown by the proof in the case.

Subsection 8 of section 124 of the Criminal Code provides that the indictment must be direct and certain as regards the county in which the offense was committed, and the evidence, equally with the allegation, must show the county in which the offense was committed. A very full and interesting discussion of these questions is found in chapter 24, volume 1 of Bishop's New Criminal Procedure. There is no evidence in the bill of exceptions in the case that the crime for which appellant was convicted was committed in the county of Magoffin, and as said in Wilkie v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 580: "It would be going too far to sanction a verdict based upon the existence of an indispensable fact, which the jury could not find from the evidence before them to exist."

And we think the trial court erred to appellant's prejudice in another step in the trial. After the jury had considered the case for some time, they returned into court and announced that they had not agreed upon a verdict, and requested the court to explain the meaning of the term "malice aforethought," which the court proceeded to do in the absence of the defendant. The jury then retired, and in a short time returned and announced their verdict. Section 188 of the Criminal Code requires that upon the trial of an indictment for a felony that the defendant must be present during the trial.

In Meece v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky., 586, it was held error to instruct the jury in the absence of the accused. The court said: "When instructions are given by the court, or when the jury, returning from their room, desire to be further instructed, the presence of the accused is of the greatest importance, as he may be able to suggest to the court or his counsel some information that would throw some additional light on his defense. He should also be present that he may except to the rulings of the court, and the record must show affirmatively that he could in nowise have been prejudiced by it, else this court will reverse the judgment."

The testimony as to the facts which must determine the guilt or innocence of the accused is very conflicting, and we are not prepared to say that either of the errors pointed out supra were not prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF ELIZABETHTOWN DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS v. MORRIS, &c.

(Filed January 27, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Schools—Taxation—Division of taxes between white and colored schools—A recovery of taxes from the railroad company was had by the trustees of the white public schools of Elizabethtown. This action was instituted by the trustees of the colored school, claiming a pro rata distribution of said fund between the two schools, under section 4101, Kentucky Statutes. The suit is resisted on the ground that the money was collected under a special act of 1878, and that under said act the property of colored persons were not subject to tax for the support of the school, and that this school is excepted out of the general law by section 4483, Kentucky Statutes, which provides that no local or special law shall be modified or repealed by the general law. Held—That the corporation created by the special act of 1878 remains, but its power to levy a tax on railroads is modified by the general law contained in section 4101, Kentucky Statutes, and said tax should be distributed pro rata between the schools. The finding of fact by the chancellor is approved.

Sprigg & Chelf for appellant.

R. L. Stith and J. D. Irwin for appellees.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellants, the board of trustees of the Elizabethtown Graded School, recovered a judgment against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. for $2,087.05 on account of school taxes levied by appellants in that school district. Appellees, who are the trustees for the Elizabethtown Colored School District, filed their petition, claiming a pro rata distribution of the fund between the white and colored school under section 4101, Kentucky Statutes. On final hearing the court adjudged the fund pro rated between the two districts, and of this appellants complain.

Section 4101, Kentucky Statutes, which is a part of the chapter on revenue and taxation, is in these words: "The provisions of this law shall not be construed to apply to any colored school district: Provided, That the same rate of taxation assessed against the real estate of any railroad company or corporation in any graded common school district, or common school district, in any year, shall be assessed against all of the taxable property in such district, and the railroad tax, when collected, shall be paid over to the county superintendent of the county in which the district schoolhouse wherein the tax assessed shall be situated, and shall constitute and be held by the county superintendent as a graded or common district school fund; and the said fund shall be apportioned and distributed by the county superintendent between the white graded common school or white common school district wherein said tax shall be collected, and any colored common school district which shall be located over the same boundary; the distribution shall be in the ratio that the whole number of white children of pupil age and the whole number of colored children of pupil age residing in the district shall bear to the whole number of children, white and colored, residing in the district wherein such tax shall be collected."

It is earnestly insisted for appellant that the money in controversy was collected under and by virtue of a special act of the legislature, approved March 29, 1878, by which, among other things, it is provided that the county superintendent shall have no control over the Elizabethtown Graded School, and that the fund arising from the taxes levied under the act shall be paid to the treasurer of the board of trustees by the sheriff. (Acts 1878, volume 1, page 214.) It is also urged that under that act the property of negroes can not be taxed, and that the school in Elizabethtown is maintained under this act, and has never been changed by taking the steps indicated in section 4488. Kentucky Statutes.

Section 4488, Kentucky Statutes, which is a part of the chapter on schools, provides that this law is not to affect, modify or repeal any local or special law theretofore passed relating to the public schools, such as the act of 1878, above referred to. In Hickman College v. Trustees Colored Common School, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1271, this court had under consideration the proper construction of these statutes. Hickman College was created by a special act similar to the act of 1878 for Elizabethtown, and much the same argument was there made as is made for appellants here. Similar controversies had several times before been before this court from other towns under similar special statutes, and the court uniformly held that the money collected must be divided between the white and colored districts. The previous cases are collected in that opinion which only reiterates what the court had before decided. Section 4488, Kentucky Statutes, being a part of the chapter on schools, its excepting out of the operation of that chapter such special acts as the one in question has no reference to section 4101, as that is a part of the act on revenue and taxation. While precisely the question made in this case was not made there, the reasoning of the court there is equally applicable to this case as to that. The decision is based upon the ground that the Constitution contemplated a system of general uniform laws throughout the State, and although a private or special act relating to a certain common school district remains in force until repealed, if the general assembly should attempt to exempt this district from the operation of the general law on taxation, although in conflict with the special act, this would be in effect to provide by special act for a railroad tax by the common school in question. The corporation created by the special act of 1878 remains, but its power to levy a tax on railroads is modified by the general law contained in section 4101, Kentucky Statutes. Were the rule held otherwise the constitutional mandate, that all taxes shall be levied and collected by general law, would be ignored (Constitution, section 171), and notwithstanding the constitutional provision, the railroad company would be taxed in some districts under the general law, and in others under special acts.

It is true no tax has been levied upon the property of the colored people, but of this appellants are in no condition to complain. In Harrodsburg Educational District v. Trustees of Colored School District, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1487, this court, in answer to this very objection, said: "A careful search of the statutes and acts will disclose the fact that no power is given to any school district to tax any property save that belonging to colored people, and this section under consideration by its express terms provides that no colored school district can levy and collect a tax from a railroad company. The right to tax a railroad company for school purposes is exclusive to the white school districts, and when this right is exercised by the white district it is provided that there shall be a pro rata distribution of the tax with the colored district. If the white district levies no tax, no tax is paid by the railroad, although the colored district may levy on the property of the colored people a tax; but if the white district does levy a tax the railroad tax collected is distributed ratably to the colored district regardless of whether it levies a tax or not. This is the plain and clear meaning of the statute. Its wisdom or policy is for the legislature, not the courts."

The law and facts having been submitted to the court, his special findings of fact must be treated as the verdict of a properly instructed jury, and can not be set aside unless clearly and palpably against the evidence. Under this rule the findings of fact made by the circuit court can not be disturbed. While the colored district embraced a larger territory than the white district, and the boundary is not clearly established by the evidence, still it is established that the colored district included all the white district and more besides. The circuit court made the apportionment upon the basis of the number of white and colored children within the school age living in the boundary covered by the white district, and his conclusions as to the number of each seem warranted by the testimony.

Judgment affirmed.

LARRABEE v. LARRABEE.

(Filed January 27, 1903—Not to be reported )

Judicial sales—Parties to actions—Guardian and ward—Infants—A. died intestate leaving B., his wife, and C. and D., two adult children, and E. and F., two infant grandchildren, as his only heirs at law. B. qualified as administratrix of decedent and guardian of his infant grandchildren. A part of the estate of decedent consisted of two lots in the city of Louisville. The personal representative and guardian united with E. and F., the infant grandchildren, in a suit to sell the two lots as indivisible on account of their being unimproved and yielding no income. Pending the action C. died, leaving G., his wife, and two infant children, surviving. C. had previously conveyed his estate to B., his mother. Answers were filed by the original parties joining in the prayer of the petition, the widow of C. was made a defendant, and it was alleged that she made no claim to the property lately owned by her husband. A decree of sale was rendered and the commissioner filed his report of sale. After this report was filed D. died unmarried and childless, having devised her estate to B., her mother. A supplemental petition was filed, to which E. and F., the grandchildren, were made defendants; also the widow and two infant children of C. were made defendants, and a guardian ad litem for all of said infant defendants was appointed, and reported that the children of C. had no interest in the property and filed exceptions to the report of sale for the infant defendants, E. and F. One of the exceptions was on the ground that no revivor of the judgment had been entered. Held—That no revivor of the judgment was necessary. It was urged as exceptions that the property could have been divided without materially impairing its value, and that the price was inadequate. Held—That the proof shows that the property was not susceptible of division, and that the sale will not be set aside on the sole ground of inadequacy of price. Another exception was that when the plaintiff became the purchaser he was the guardian of said infants. Held—That the court having given the guardian permission to bid there was no error in his bidding. Another exception was that the infants were plaintiffs by their guardian, and that said infants were not represented other than by plaintiff as their guardian. Held—That it was not necessary for the infant plaintiffs to have representation other than by their guardian.

Chas. H. Stuart for appellant.

Tyler Barnett for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

In 1898, Dr. John A. Larrabee died intestate at his residence in Louisville, Jefferson county, Kentucky, leaving a widow, Harriet B. Larrabee, and two children, Hattie Lee Larrabee and Joseph B. Larrabee, and two infant grandchildren, Marguerite B. Larrabee and John Henry Larrabee, whose father, John Henry Larrabee, had died in the year 1888, these four being his only heirs at law.

After the death of the said Dr. John A. Larrabee his widow, Harriet B. Larrabee, was duly and legally appointed by the Jefferson County Court, on the 1st day of July, 1898, administratrix of said John A. Larrabee, and she qualified as such by giving bond and taking the oath required by law; and on the same day she was duly and legally appointed, by order of the Jefferson County Court, statutory guardian of her infant grandchildren, Marguerite B. Larrabee and John Henry Larrabee, who were infants under the age of fourteen years.

Part of the estate left by Dr. John A. Larrabee consisted of two pieces of real property situated in Louisville, Ky., the first being 50x180 feet, on the northeast side of Baxter avenue, and the second being 100x150 feet, on Park avenue. This land was unimproved and nonproductive of income. Whereupon Harriet B. Larrabee, as statutory guardian of her two grandchildren aforesaid and in her own right, instituted this action in the Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery branch, first division, against Hattie Lee Larrabee and Joseph B. Larrabee and Fanny K. Larrabee, his wife.

The petition in this case describes the land herein involved by metes and bounds, and states that it is indivisible without material injury to the interest of the various persons owning the same; that Harriet B. Larrabee, the widow, is willing, and consents, that her dower interest in same should be paid to her out of the proceeds of the sale, and prays that said land be sold as provided by section 490 of the Civil Code of Practice. To this petition Hattie Lee Larrabee, Joseph B. Larrabee and Fanny K. Larrabee filed their joint answer, in which they confess the allegations of the petition, and admit all of its statements, and join in the prayer for the sale and division of the proceeds, and waive the setting at rules, and consent that the action might be submitted.

On the 27th day of October, 1900, the court entered a judgment in said action in accordance with the prayer of the petition, and ordered a sale of the property herein involved.

On the 1st day of October, 1901, the plaintiff, Harriet B. Larrabee, filed an amended and supplemental petition, stating that after the judgment, but before the order of sale therein provided could be executed, Joseph B. Larrabee, one of the defendants, had departed this life, a resident of, and domiciled in, the city of Louisville, Ky., leaving a last will and testament, wherein and whereby he devised all of his estate, real, personal and mixed, to his wife, the defendant, Fanny K. Larrabee, which will had been duly and legally probated by order of the county court of Jefferson; and further stating that, pending this litigation, said Joseph B. Larrabee had, by written contract, sold, assigned and conveyed to the plaintiff, Harriet B. Larrabee, all of his interest in his father's estate, whether real, personal or mixed, which said writing had been lost or misplaced, but alleging that the defendant, Fanny K. Larrabee, the widow and sole devisee of Joseph B. Larrabee, knew of and approved said conveyance by said Joseph B. Larrabee, and makes no claim to any part of said estate, and praying that the former order of sale herein made may be executed, and the lots described in the original petition sold on terms as directed in the former judgment of this court, and that said Harriet B. Larrabee be adjudged to own the interest which would have gone to Joseph B. Larrabee.

On the 14th day of January, 1902, the action was again submitted, and on the 8th day of February, 1903, the court entered a supplemental judgment, decreeing the sale of said property, and a distribution of the proceeds in accordance with the prayer of the supplemental petition.

On the 28th day of June, 1902, came the commissioner and filed his report of sale under the judgment and supplemental judgment aforesaid, by which it appears that said property had been sold by said commissioner, and purchased by appellee, Harriet B. Larrabee, in her own right; the lot 50x180 feet on the northeast side of Baxter avenue being purchased at the price of $1,500, and the property fronting 100x150 feet on Park avenue was purchased for the sum of $800.

On the 22d of September, 1903, the plaintiff again filed an amended and supplemental petition, in which is stated, among other things, that on the 3d day of May, 1902, Hattie Lee Larrabee had departed this life, testate, a resident of, and domiciled at the time of her death in, Louisville, Ky.; that she was unmarried and without issue, and by said will she devised all of her estate to her mother, the plaintiff, Harriet B. Larrabee, and that she therein nominates and appoints said Harriet B. Larrabee the executrix of her will, without security. The said will was duly and legally probated by order of the Jefferson County Court on the 31st day of May, 1902, on which said day said Harriet B. Larrabee was duly and legally appointed by said court as executrix of said will and duly and legally qualified as such.

Said last supplemental petition states that Joseph B. Larrabee, deceased, left surviving him his widow, Fanny K. Larrabee, and two infant children, John Allen Larrabee and Joseph B. Larrabee, both of whom were infants under the age of fourteen years, and without any statutory guardian in the State, but who are in the care and custody of their mother, Fanny K. Larrabee.

Said petition further states that, since said sale and purchase by her of said property she had an offer for one-half of the Baxter avenue lot the sum of $1,250

In this last supplemental petition, the infant plaintiffs, Marguerite B. Larrabee and John Henry Larrabee, are made defendants, and the court appointed Charles K. Stewart, a member of the Louisville bar, as guardian ad litem of all the infant defendants. On the 2d day of October, 1902, Charles K. Stewart, as guardian ad litem for John Allen Larrabee and Joseph B. Larrabee, infants under fourteen years of age, reported that the father of said infants, Joseph B. Larrabee, deceased, by his will, dated June 30, 1898, and probated June 4, 1901, devised all of his estate, except a few small items of personal property as mementos, to his wife, defendant, Fanny K. Larrabee, and that said Fanny K. Larrabee, by her deed, dated September 20, 1902, conveyed all of her rights, title and interest in, and to, the said two tracts of land, to Harriet B. Larrabee, and neither of said infants have any interest in or claim to said two tracts of land; that he has thoroughly examined the case and the records thereof, and, after such an examination, reports that he is unable to make a defense to this action of said John Allen Larrabee and Joseph B. Larrabee; and on the same day said Charles K. Stewart, as guardian ad litem of Marguerite B. Larrabee and John Henry Larrabee, filed his report, in which he makes exceptions to the commissioner's report of sale, and asks that the same be set aside and held for naught for the following reasons:

1st. Because Hattie Lee Larrabee died on May 3, 1902, at which time she was the only defendant except Fanny K. Larrabee, widow of Joseph B. Larrabee, and there has not been any revivor of the judgments herein.

2d. Because the lots herein involved could have been divided among the owners without materially impairing their value, or the value of the interest of the infants and the plaintiff herein.

3d. That the price bid by the plaintiff for said Baxter avenue lot, $1,500, was wholly inadequate, as evidenced by the fact that plaintiff had contracted to sell, and would have sold, one-half thereof for $1,250, but for the fact that the Kentucky Title Co. refused to insure the title for reasons herein stated.

4th. When the plaintiff became the purchaser of said two tracts of land she was the guardian of said two infants.

5th. The said infants were plaintiffs by their guardian.

6th. The said infants were not represented herein other than by plaintiff as their guardian.

All of the proceedings of the sale herein involved have been taken with great care, and all parties in interest have been properly brought before the court, and all of the title papers required by law to be filed have been filed and made a part of the record, and this record is free from any doubt or confusion arising from carelessness of preparation. There was no necessity for the order of revivor after the death of Hattie Lee Larrabee because her mother, Harriet B. Larrabee, was the sole devisee under her will. The object of an order of revivor is to bring before the court parties in interest who are not already before the court, and as the only person interested in the estate of Hattie Lee Larrabee was already before the court, in the vigorous prosecution of the case, the law does not require the doing of a vain and useless thing. The evidence sufficiently shows that the property could not have been divided without materially injuring the interest of the owners of same, and the court below having so adjudged upon the evidence before it, we will not interfere with that ruling.

The inadequacy of price is not a sufficient ground for the setting aside of the judicial sale, where the proceedings have been regular; and where there is no allegation, or evidence, of any fraud, overreaching or sharp practice, and while the court will look keenly into the acts of a guardian who becomes the purchaser of her ward's estate, yet when, as in this case, the guardian has first obtained the permission from the chancellor to become a bidder at the sale, we will not, alone upon the ground of inadequacy of price, set aside a sale to said guardian. A guardian who bids by permission of the chancellor stands with reference to the sale as any other purchaser. It was not necessary for the infant plaintiffs to have representation other than that of their guardian; they were co-plaintiffs with her, and it was not necessary for them to have any other representation in this proceeding.

Fanny K. Larrabee, the widow of Joseph B. Larrabee, has no dower in the lots in question; she being sui juris, has filed her answer herein, disclaiming all right to dower or other interest in the property in question.

We are not able to see any error in this record, and the judgment of the chancellor is affirmed.

McCARTY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 28, 1903.)

1. Criminal law—Insanity—Instructions—Appellant was convicted of the murder of his wife, and the death penalty fixed. The only defense was insanity, and appellant alone gave testimony on this point, stating that his wife had been unfaithful to him, and that seeing her in the company with a man produced such mental excitement that he was powerless to prevent killing her, which he did by following her and shooting her in the back. The court specifically charged the jury as to all of the evidence concerning previous assaults and threats by the accused that it was admitted solely for the purpose of showing the state of appellant's mind, if it did not show it, and of his motive; and that the jury should not allow same to influence their verdict in fixing the punishment if they should, from the other evidence in the case, find the defendant guilty of the crime for which he was then being tried. Held—That this instruction was more favorable to appellant than he was entitled to. The counsel for appellant contend that any impulse that at the time may be irresistible will excuse homicide. This is not the law. The court properly instructed the jury as to the law of insanity that would excuse the homicide. The proof sustains the conviction.

2. Misconduct of Commonwealth's attorney—The misconduct of the attorney for the Commonwealth in his closing argument to the jury can not be considered on appeal as his remarks are not part of the record and no exceptions were taken to same.

W. G. Dunlap for appellant.

W. P. Kimball for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was tried, indicted and convicted of the crime of willful murder, and sentenced to death. He was found guilty of having maliciously and feloniously killed his wife by shooting her in the back. His defense, and the only defense, was that of insanity.

There is no evidence in the record of any taint from this malady in appellant's family, or in him previous or subsequent to the killing. No witness testified that in his opinion appellant was, or ever had been, insane. Appellant claimed that he had reason to believe that his wife had been unfaithful to him, and that at numerous times during several weeks and months prior to the killing information to that effect had come to him; that he had frequently discussed the matter with his wife. On the fatal occasion he claimed that he saw her at the home of a Mrs. Swigert in the company of some unknown man, and that Mrs. Swigert's house had a bad reputation. As to these occurrences, including the killing, appellant testified as follows: "I thought I would go down and ask Mrs. Swigert where she was; and Bert Miller said, 'come on, I ain't going to wait here all night for you,' and I went on, and as I got to the corner of the kitchen there, I commenced coughing, and I heard a noise at the other end of the little passway, and I looked up and saw Lucy (appellant's wife) and a man standing inside the gate, between the houses; and they immediately commenced to run, the man first, and Lucy second, but as they opened the gate I saw the plain figure of a man; but Lucy got between us and I did not see where he went, but when I thought of the past and all that had been told me, these things all came up before me, and I felt, well, I do not know how I did feel, to think of all these things that had been told me, and to think that they were true, and I opened the gate, and I heard Mrs. Swigert say, 'run, my God, run,' and Lucy run in the front door into the front room, and was in the act of going through the middle door and I shot her twice, and run out right quick to see if I could find the man that was with her. I went around the house to see if I could catch him or not, but I could not see anything of Bert Miller or the man, or anybody else, but when I came to myself and thought about what I had done I thought I had better see my mother; I thought I had better see her first myself and tell her what had happened. and I thought I would then give myself up."

Instead of giving himself up, appellant hid himself under a house in the neighborhood, where he was found and arrested by the officers. That quoted above is the only evidence that in any way tends to establish appellant's claim of his being of unsound mind at the time of the killing, if it does. The only other witness to the transaction, except Mrs. Swigert, is Bert Miller. He testified that appellant was drinking and was somewhat under the influence of whisky; that the killing occurred at 7 o'clock in the evening, after dusk. The witness and appellant were together, hunting for Mrs. Lucy McCarty, the deceased. As to what occurred just before and at the time of the killing this witness said:

"We got about fifteen feet away from the gate, somewhere along about that distance, and saw his wife standing there talking to a woman.

"Where?"

"A. At a lattice gate."

"Q. Between the two houses?"

"A. Yes, sir." * * *

"Q. Who did you see?"

"A. This woman and his wife."

"Q. Which woman?"

"A. I do not know who she was."

"Q. Saw Mrs. Swigert and a woman?"

"A. Not Mrs. Swigert, Mrs. McCarty."

"Q. What took place then?"

"A. He broke and run towards her."

"Q. Run in what direction?"

"A. Toward Main street; when he run she slammed it too and he jerked it open, and followed her into the front door."

"Q. Did you follow them?"

"A. Yes, sir; I got as far as the front porch, and as she run he run right behind her and shot her twice, and as he shot her she halloed: 'Oh, Lord God, help,' and he had his arm around her and let her down and run out."

"Q. You say his wife and this woman were standing at the lattice gate?"

"A. Yes, sir."

Mrs. Swigert referred to did not testify in the case. It was shown that shortly after this tragedy she became violently insane from the fright and shock, and was, and has since been, confined, under verdict and judgment of the Fayette Circuit Court, in the Eastern Lunatic Asylum at Lexington.

Evidence was admitted that on the previous evening, and on numerous occasions before, running back for several months, appellant had abused and beat and otherwise mistreated his wife. The motive for this conduct was shown to be because she did not give him money, and some witnesses intimate because she did not give him money to buy whisky. Appellant was without means, idle and dissipated. He had done little or no work for a number of months, while his wife had been at work as a domestic. Numerous threats are proven in which appellant had said he would kill his wife. The court specifically charged the jury, as to all of the evidence concerning previous assaults and threats by the accused, that it was admitted solely for the purpose of showing the state of appellant's mind, if it did show it, and of his motive; and that the jury should not allow same to influence their verdict in fixing the punishment, if they should from the other evidence in the case find the defendant guilty of the crime for which he was then being tried. Certainly this action of the court was as favorable to appellant as could be expected, indeed more favorable, probably, than he was entitled to.

Whether appellant's wife had in fact been unfaithful to him, or had given him cause to believe or suspect it, is not at all clearly shown by the proof. And even if it had been, it was also shown conclusively, and by appellant's own testimony, that he continued for weeks to live with her after having been told of her alleged wrong. His subsequent act of killing her can not then be reasonably attributed to the supposed jealous frenzy aroused by a sudden and unexpected revelation of his wife's infidelity. Rather, though it be conceded that he had the suspicion claimed, and reasonable grounds therefor, it appears that he was executing a determination previously and coolly formed, and announced in numerous threats, to himself execute upon her a dire vengeance. Appellant complains of the instructions given by the court to the jury on the subject of insanity. They are in the identical language, excepting names, used by the same court on the trial of Portwood. Portwood's defense was insanity. He was convicted and sentenced to death. On appeal this court held that the instructions given fairly presented the law, and the judgment was affirmed. (Portwood v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky., 496.)

The instructions as to insanity are as follows:

"2d. If the defendant did shoot Lucy McCarty, but at the time he shot her the defendant did not have mental capacity sufficient to enable him to know and understand that it was wrong to shoot said Lucy McCarty, the defendant was of unsound mind; or if the defendant did shoot said Lucy McCarty, but at the time he shot her the defendant was prompted to do such shooting by an impulse, resulting from a diseased mind, of such violence that it overcame the will of the defendant and constrained him to shoot said Lucy McCarty when he did not wish to shoot her, the defendant was of unsound mind.

"3d If the defendant did shoot Lucy McCarty, but at the time he did so the defendant had mental capacity sufficient to enable him to know right from wrong, and if at the time he had will power sufficient to enable him to choose between shooting and refraining from shooting said Lucy McCarty, the defendant was of sound mind; and if the defendant did shoot Lucy McCarty, but at the time he did so the defendant had mental capacity sufficient to enable him to know right from wrong, and if his mind was free from disease, then no impulse to shoot said Lucy McCarty, no matter how violent, and no matter how completely it dominated the will of the defendant, was unsoundness of mind."

The argument is directed principally against the expression at the close of the third instruction: "If his mind was free from disease, then no impulse to shoot said Lucy McCarty, no matter how violent, and no matter how completely it dominated the will of the defendant, was unsoundness of mind." It must be the contention of appellant's counsel that any impulse that at the time may be irresistible will excuse homicide. Happily for society this is not the law. Otherwise an ungovernable temper, or violent, brutish passion, or frenzy caused by indignation, or anger or drunkenness or altercation would excuse such one. Only persons insane, or who have never reached years of discretion, are not accountable for the commission of crime. Even then the insanity that excuses is such as deprives the person committing the act of his reason or will in that particular transaction. The irresistible impulse recognized by the law is that only resulting from mental disease, from the derangement of the mind caused by a disease of the mind. It is not material how recently the derangement may have occurred. A person acts under an insane, irresistible impulse when by reason of the duress of mental disease he has lost the power to choose between right and wrong, to avoid doing the act in question, his free agency being at the time destroyed. (1 Bishop's Criminal Law, section 887; Parsons v. State, 81 Ala., 577; 60 Am. Rep., 193; Portwood v. Commonwealth, supra; Graham v. Commonwealth, 16 Ben Monroe, 557; Brown v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 398; Moore v. Commonwealth, 92 Ky., 637.)

Another and final complaint is that the attorney for the Commonwealth exceeded his authority, and abused his privilege in the closing argument to the jury. The remarks complained of are not shown in the bill of exceptions, nor does it appear from the record that there was objection or exception thereto. We can not, from the record, say that anything was said by the prosecuting attorney in his argument that is the subject of review by this court. Counsel for appellant files with his brief what purports to be a newspaper report of a portion of the Commonwealth attorney's argument. It must be plain that the court could not take notice of such an objection thus presented.

An unobjectionable jury of the community, selected fairly, under the duty alike of enforcing the criminal laws of the State in this case and of determining under proper instructions and guarded legal procedure the fact of the defendant's guilt, have found him guilty of the crime charged. We can not say that the evidence does not support their verdict. In their discretion they have infloted the severest penalty.

There appears to us to be no error in the record, wherefore, the judgment must be affirmed.

SCOTT, &c. v. PENDLEY, BY, &c.

(Filed January 28, 1903.)

Schools—Employment of teacher—A., B. and C. were trustees of a common school district, and on the 1st day of July, 1901, A., while in jail, signed a contract with B., employing appellee as teacher of said school, in the absence of C., the other trustee, who had no notice of the meeting. On the 3d day of July, 1901, A. resigned as trustee and D. was appointed his successor. On the 5th day of July, 1901, after notice had been served on B., a meeting was held, at which B. did not attend, C. and D. made a contract of employment of appellant as teacher. Appellee obtained a temporary restraining order against appellant and the trustees, C. and D., restraining appellant from teaching the school, and appellee taught the school, and this appeal involves the question as to whether appellee was legally elected as teacher. Held—That she was not legally elected teacher. No meeting of the trustees can be held unless all are present, or unless the absent member had notice, provided the absent member is in the county and with reasonable effort and diligence the notice could have been served on him.

N. T. Howard, W. B. Gardner and J. W. Harreld for appellants.

Guffy & Whalin and Taylor & Borah for appellees.

Appeal from Butler Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On the 1st day of July, 1901, Thomas Baxter, G. W. Doolin and W. T. Blanchett were the trustees of school district No. 71 in Butler county, Kentucky, and on that day, in the county jail where Blanchett was confined on a charge of felony, the said Blanchett and Doolin made and executed a written contract with appellee Pendley to teach the school for that district for that school year. It is agreed that no call was made for this meeting, held in the jail, nor did Baxter, the other trustee, have any notice of same. On the 3d day of July Blanchett resigned as trustee and one Galloway was appointed and qualified. On the 5th of said month, and after notice had been served on Doolin, the other trustee, a meeting was called for the purpose of employing a teacher, and at said meeting, Doolin not attending, Baxter and Galloway entered into a written contract with appellant Scott to teach the school. Both appellant and appellee had notice of the contract of each other. On the 25th of July thereafter appellant Scott commenced to teach the school and appellee filed this action, setting forth her contract, and obtained a temporary restraining order against appellant and trustees Baxter and Galloway, prohibiting Scott from teaching the school and the trustees from preventing her the use of the schoolhouse, and the appellee entered and taught the school. The only question necessary for the court to determine is, was the appellee entitled to teach the school under her contract?

The Kentucky Statutes, section 4445, in so far as applicable, reads as follows: The trustees, in their corporate capacity, at a meeting called for that purpose, shall employ a qualified teacher, agree with him as to compensation, etc.

We have not been cited to, nor have we been able to find, any decisions of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky construing this part of said statutes. We have been referred to an opinion of the Supreme Court of Arkansas, in which case the same question was involved. In that case this language is used: "It is necessary that a contract, to be binding on the district, should be executed at a board meeting at which all the directors are present, or at which the one absent had notice. We appreciate the practical importance of this question, but entertain no doubt as to its proper solution either on reason or authority. The different members of a board scattered in the pursuit of their several avocations are not the board. Duties are cast upon boards composed of a number of persons, in order that they may be discharged with efficiency and wisdom arising from a multitude of counsel. This purpose can not be realized without reference to the matters intrusted to them before they take action thereon. After conference the board will often escape unwise measures, to which each of the members acting separately would have committed themselves, either from haste, immature discretion, or an unwillingness to shorten the allotted span of life under the entreaties of an importunate agent or teacher. The public select each member of the board and is entitled to his services; this it can not enjoy if two members can bind it without receiving or even suffering the counsel of the other. Two could, if they differed with the third, overrule his judgment and act without regarding it; but he might by his knowledge and reason change the bent of their minds, and the opportunity must be given him. We conclude that two directors may bind the district by a contract made at a meeting at which the third was present or of which he had notice; but no contract can be made except at a meeting, and no meeting can be held unless all are present or unless the absent member had notice. We do not decide that the members of a board may not act separately and without meeting in a matter which involves no exercise of discretion."

This court is of opinion that this part of the above quotation, "no meeting can be held unless all are present or unless the absent member had notice," should be qualified by adding thereto these words: "Provided the absent member is in the county, and with reasonable effort and diligence the notice could have been served on him."

It is the opinion of this court that the contract of appellee with Doolin and Blanchett was made contrary to the statute, and that she had no right to teach the school thereunder. It is stated that Baxter had previously expressed himself in opposition to contracting with appellee and Doolin with appellant, and Blanchett had promised both, and appellee claims for this reason that notice to Baxter was unnecessary and useless. If these statements be true, it more clearly shows the necessity of bringing the board together, or at least giving all an opportunity of coming together, and exchanging reasons and arguments before entering into a contract with a teacher. Certainly Baxter should have had an opportunity, if he desired, in connection with Doolin, to reason with and try to convince Blanchett that the contract with appellee should not have been entered into.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss appellee's petition.

Judge Settle not sitting.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. HERNING.

(Filed January 28, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Telegraph companies—Delay in delivering message—Measure of damages—A telegram was sent from Clarksville, Tenn., directed to appellee at Clinton, Ky., announcing the death of his mother. Appellant delayed the delivery to appellee until it was too late for him to arrive in Clarksville before the burial. He went on the first train after receiving the message, but arrived too late. This action for damages for the delay resulted in a verdict for $700 for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Errors in instructions are relied on for a reversal. Held—That the court erred in giving the first instruction, which authorized the jury to find for plaintiff if they believed that appellant was guilty of negligence in the delivery of the telegram, but did not fix any measure of damages. The second instruction authorized them to find as directed by the first instruction, and that they might enhance this sum by considering appellee's mental suffering. The court should, in substance, have said to the jury that if they find for the plaintiff upon the evidence and instructions they should find a sum that will compensate him for the injury to his feelings and mental anguish, if any, shown by the evidence, as the result of his failure to be present at the burial of his mother.

Richards & Ronald and George H. Fearons for appellant.

Robertson & Thomas and Evans & Dear for appellee.

Appeal from Hickman Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This action was brought in the Hickman Circuit Court against the appellant by the appellee for damages for the failure to deliver to him a telegram sent from Clarksville, Tenn., May 8, 1900, announcing the death of his mother, and for negligence in not delivering said message in a reasonable time, thereby preventing him from attending the burial of his mother. The message read: "Come at once; your mother is dead," and was directed to appellee at Clinton, Ky., in charge of George Martin, who lived just across the street from the office of the appellant. Appellee lived one and one-half miles in the country. The message was received at the Clinton office at 12.51 p. m. and was not delivered to George Martin until about 4 p. m., and was at once sent out by him (Martin) to appellee. The appellant made no attempt to show any reason for the delay in the delivery of the message. As soon as he received the message he took the first train thereafter and started for Clarksville, but did not reach there until the afternoon of the next day, which was about two hours after the burial of his mother.

Evidence was heard, the jury instructed and they returned a verdict against the appellant for the sum of $700. Appellant filed reasons, and moved the court to set aside the verdict and judgment. The court overruled the motion for a new trial, and the case is here on appeal. The appellant cited many reasons why this case should be reversed, but we perceive no error prejudicial to appellant, except instructions one and two given by the court to the jury, which read as follows:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Co., by its officers, agents and servants failed to deliver to the plaintiff or to G. W. Martin, within a reasonable time after its reception, the telegram dated May 8, 1900, informing plaintiff of the death of his mother, then the law is for the plaintiff, and they will so find, and say how much the defendant shall pay not exceeding $1,000, the amount claimed in the petition. If they believe from the evidence that by reason of the failure by the defendant to deliver the message the plaintiff was prevented from attending the burial of his mother, and to look upon her face before she was buried.

"No. 2. The court further says to the jury that if they find for the plaintiff, they have the right to take into consideration, in making their verdict, mental suffering of the plaintiff in failing to attend the burial of his mother, or to look upon her face before her interment."

We are of the opinion that the court erred in the instructions in not fixing the criterion upon which the appellee was entitled to recover. The jury were told that they might find for the plaintiff and say how much the defendant shall pay, not exceeding the amount claimed in the petition; and in the second instruction that they had a right to take into consideration the mental suffering of the plaintiff in failing to attend the burial of his mother. The jury were authorized in the first instruction to fix their own criterion of recovery, and say how much the defendant should pay; by the second instruction the court, in effect, said that, in addition to what they thought the defendant ought to pay, they might, to enhance the sum, consider appellee's mental suffering.

In the case of L. & N. R. R. C. v. Sanders, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1944, this court reversed the case mainly for the reason that the following language was used: "The jury will find for the plaintiff such damages as they may deem proper from all the evidence and circumstances in the case."

The court, in that case, said that this instruction left the jury at liberty to find punitive damages. The court should, in substance, have said to the jury that if they find for the plaintiff upon the evidence and instructions, they should find a sum that will compensate him for the injury to his feelings and mental anguish, if any, shown by the evidence, as the result of his failure to be present at the burial of his mother, etc.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JONES v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 28, 1903.)

Criminal law—Filing away indictments against objection of defendant—Appellant was indicted for the crime of murder, and he came into court and his case was set for trial for a day during the term and was he admitted to bail in the sum of $2,000, but the case was, on motion of appellant, continued until the following term, and set for trial on a fixed day. On the calling of the case for trial appellant was in court with his attorneys and witnesses and ready for trial, when the attorney for the Commonwealth moved to discharge the witnesses and appellant from his bond, and to file away the indictment with leave to reinstate on motion of attorney for the Commonwealth. Appellant objected to said motion and demanded a trial. The court overruled the objection and sustained the motion, to which appellant objected and has prosecuted this appeal. Held—That the practice of filing away indictments with leave to reinstate is approved, but section 11 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right, to be by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him and to meet the witnesses, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, * * * and in prosecutions by indictment or information he shall have a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage." These guaranties are for the protection of the citizen, and no rule of practice, however ancient or sacred, should deprive him of them. The lower court abused this rule of practice, and the court declares that an indictment should never be so disposed of when the accused, being present, objects thereto and in good faith demands a trial.

Smith & Ingram and Wm. Low for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, Hiram Jones, was indicted by the grand jury of Bell county for the murder of one James Shumate, resulting, as alleged, from the willful, wanton and malicious act of the appellant in placing obstructions on the railroad track, whereby an engine and cars of which Shumate had charge, as engineer, were derailed and wrecked, and he crushed and wounded to such an extent that he at once died. The indictment was returned and filed in the Bell Circuit Court October 18, 1901. On the same day appellant appeared in court and the case was, by order of the court, set for trial on the 17th day of the term in progress. Thereafter (and presumably on the 17th day) a continuance of the case was granted the appellant, and by consent of parties it was set for trial on the 13th day of the succeeding May term. The appellant was thereupon allowed bail in the sum of $2,000.

On the 16th day of the May term, 1902, the cause was called for trial and appellant being again in court, answered that he was ready for trial, but the Commonwealth's attorney announced that the prosecution was not ready for trial, and moved the court to discharge the witnesses, and the appellant from his bond, and to file the indictment away, with the right to reinstate it on motion of the Commonwealth, to which motion appellant objected, and insisted that the case be dismissed, or that he be granted a trial, but notwithstanding his objection the motion of the Commonwealth's attorney was sustained, and the indictment by order of the court was filed away, with leave to redocket upon motion of the Commonwealth's attorney. To the order thus disposing of the indictment, and to the refusal of the court to grant him a trial, appellant excepted at the time and prayed an appeal to this court, which was granted.

The practice of filing away indictments, though never authorized by legislative enactment, has long obtained in this State. It either came to us as a part of the common law, or was devised by some one or more of the pioneer jurists of our Commonwealth to whose wisdom we are indebted for much that is good in our present system of jurisprudence. At any rate the long continuance of the practice, and its convenience as well, admonish us that it would be unwise to abrogate it altogether. We think it the better policy, therefore, in determining whether this practice should have been followed in the case before us to lay down some general rules which will indicate to the circuit courts the limitations that should be observed in the future attempts to follow it.

This court has, in two instances, decided that the filing away of an indictment, with leave to reinstate, did not operate as a dismissal thereof, but only as a discontinuance of the case for the time being. The first case in which the court so held was that of Ashlock v. Commonwealth, 7 B. M., 44. Ashlock was indicted in the Fayette Circuit Court for maintaining a faro bank. At the next term of the court, no process having been served on the defendant, the following order was entered in the case: "On motion of the Commonwealth's attorney it is ordered that this case be stricken from the docket with leave to reinstate it hereafter by motion."

Subsequently process issued upon the indictment and was served upon the defendant, and at the succeeding term of the court, the case, on motion of the attorney for the Commonwealth, was reinstated upon the docket, after which there was a trial, resulting in the conviction of the defendant. In considering the exception taken to the orders of the circuit court filing away and redocketing the case this court said: "An order striking a suit from the docket made on motion of the plaintiff, and without reservation or qualification, we should be inclined to regard as a voluntary dismissal, or discontinuance, and as placing the case, after the term when the order was made, beyond the power of the court. But here the right to reinstate the case on the docket being expressly reserved, the order, we think, should not be construed as a dismissal or discontinuance, but as a mere removal, or omission, of the case upon the docket. If right in this construction of the order, the case was still in court, and the issuing and service of process before it was replaced on the docket was not unauthorized or invalid. The order is, however, in our opinion, unusual, and we would not be understood as approving such a rule of practice, perceiving no necessity nor sufficient reason for it, and it may have the effect to delude and entrap litigants."

The second case that came before this court, in which the practice of filing away indictment, was called in question, was that of Commonwealth v. Bottoms, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1159, and involved a construction of an order entered in the Adair Circuit Court, whereby eight several indictments pending in that court against one Joe Bottoms for the unlawful selling of spirituous liquors were filed away, with leave to reinstate without notice, with the consent, and upon the promise, of Bottoms that he would not again sell such liquors. But later Bottoms was again indicted, tried and convicted for a similar offense, and thereafter the eight indictments were, by direction of the Commonwealth's attorney, redocketed by the clerk of the court and process issued thereon against Bottoms, who appeared in court and filed a written motion to strike the indictments from the docket, which motion was sustained by the court. In reversing the judgment of the lower court in thus disposing of the indictments this court said: "Where the defendant is before the court and the case stands for trial we are not aware of any rule of practice that would authorize the attorney for the Commonwealth on his own motion to file the indictment away on conditions and hold the prosecution in terrorem over the defendant, and we do not approve of such practice. However, such was done in this case, and with the consent of the appellee, and upon terms, and it being shown that the terms had been violated by the appellee, he should not complain if the attorney for the Commonwealth prosecutes the indictments to trial as the agreed order recites he may do, nor is there anything in the order itself or its effect that forbids such action by the Commonwealth. The legal effect of such an order was simply a continuance indefinitely and an exoneration of any bail for appearance unless the contrary should appear in the order, and upon reasonable notice being given to the accused the case might stand for trial at any term of court. We think this might be done without showing a violation of the promise to abstain from further violations."

The facts of the case before us are in many respects unlike those of the two cases mentioned. In the first case the accused, Ashlock, had not been served with process, and was not in court when the order taking the indictments from the docket with leave to reinstate was entered. In the second, Bottoms was in court in obedience to its process when the order was taken and gave his consent thereto, but in this case the appellant, Jones, was under bond for his appearance, and upon the calling of the case for trial he was present with his witnesses, and demanded a trial, which was refused, and the indictment, over his objection and protest, was stricken from the docket, with leave to the Commonwealth's attorney to have it reinstated at his will. We regard this action of the lower court as an abuse of the rule of practice in question, and we do not hesitate to declare that an indictment should never be so disposed of, when the accused, being present, objects thereto, and in good faith demands a trial.

The Constitution of our State provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right to be heard by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to meet the witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. * * * And in prosecutions by indictment, or information, he shall have a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage." (Constitution, section 11, Bill of Rights.) These guaranties are for the protection of the citizen, and no rule of practice, however ancient or sacred, should deprive him of them. We do not hold that in no case should the "filing away" of an indictment be allowed, for it is permissible when done before the arrest of the defendant, or before service of process upon him, and it should certainly be allowed where the defendant is present in court, and consents, or fails to object thereto. It is contended for the Commonwealth that the order appealed from is not final, and if so that the appeal should be dismissed.

In a sense the order does not appear to be final, for it does not prevent the Commonwealth's attorney from redocketing the case and renewing the prosecution at any time, but in a much more important sense, and as it affects the appellant, the order must, we think, be treated as final for the purposes of an appeal, for while it stands he is powerless to secure a trial, however innocent he may be, yet all the while resting under a grave charge, affecting his reputation and endangering his life or liberty. What remedy has he if refused the right of appeal? If he were to move the lower court to redocket the case and dismiss the indictment, the order of that court overruling the motion would be no more final than the one appealed from. Neither mandamus nor injunction will lie to control a court in the exercise of its judicial discretion, and the writ of prohibition can only be employed to prevent an inferior court of limited jurisdiction from proceeding in a matter out of its jurisdiction.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court has the jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and that to hold otherwise would amount to a denial of justice. The judgment or order appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to set it aside and to redocket the case that the appellant may have as speedy a trial as will be consistent with the ends of justice.

BONE v. BLANKENBAKER.

(Filed January 28, 1903—Not to be reported.)

New trial—Unavoidable casualty or misfortune—Appellant was sued by appellee, and immediately employed A. and B., partners in the practice of law, to make defense for her. The arrangement was made with A., and she had no communication with B. about the matter. A. immediately went to the clerk's office and found that no return had been made on the summons. He then went to the sheriff's office and made diligent inquiries, and failed to find that the summons had been served. On the calling of the case at the July rules, no defense having been made, judgment by default was given, as the process had been served in time. This suit was then brought for a new trial, as provided in section 518, Civil Code of Practice. The court overruled the motion, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The petition set up the facts above stated, besides, that A., the attorney, was, under the advice of his physician, compelled to leave the city for his health, and did not return for several months; that owing to the facts he learned concerning the service of the process and the fact that the court was about to adjourn, and that he reasonably concluded that the case would not be called for trial before September; that neither he nor appellant knew of the judgment having been entered until more than sixty days afterward. Held—That under the circumstances a new trial should have been granted, as there was no lack of diligence on the part of either the appellant or her attorney. While the neglect of the attorney furnishes no grounds for a new trial, the facts alleged show that the attorney exercised due diligence.

Pryor & Sapinski for appellant.

Fairleigh, Straus & Eagles for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant was sued by appellee in the Jefferson Circuit Court (Law and Equity division) upon a note. Judgment was rendered by default. This suit was brought by appellant against appellee for a new trial of the first-named action, under section 518 of the Civil Code, on the ground of "unavoidable casualty or misfortune, preventing the party from appearing or defending."

Appellant employed a firm of attorneys to prepare and present her defense. The duty of looking up the status of the case and preparing and filing the answer within the time required by the statute and the rules of the court was devolved upon and undertaken by Mr. Pryor of the firm so retained. The firm was spoken to by appellant about the middle of June, she having informed them that she had just been sued by appellee, and informed them of the nature of her defense to the action. Mr. Pryor directly, and with due diligence, went to the court, examined the files of the case, and found that the summons had not been returned. He then went to the sheriff's office, and failed to find there, after diligent inquiry, when it had been executed, or that it had been executed. But from the time in the month when the collent came to him, and from the absence of the return upon the summons, he assumed, and not unreasonably, under the facts shown, that the case would not stand for answer at the rules about the first of July, as the court was preparing to adjourn for the summer vacation immediately after the calling of the docket at the July rules mentioned. Mr. Pryor assumed that the cause would not, and could not then be called for answer until the reconvening of the court in the fall. However, he was prevented by a severe illness from looking further into the matter at that time, and under the direction of his physician was required to leave the city for a period. In the meantime the case was called at the rule day of 1st of July, and it then appearing that the summons had been served a sufficient length of time to entitle the plaintiff to judgment by default, and no one answering for the defendant (Mr. Pryor having been called out of the city by his illness), judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against appellant for the full amount of the note sued upon. Neither appellant nor counsel knew of this proceeding until more than sixty days after the judgment was entered. Thereupon this suit was brought to vacate that judgment upon the grounds stated. It is proper to say that it does not appear, nor is it suggested, that appellee's counsel knew, or had notice, of the fact that appellant contemplated a defense to the note, or that she had retained counsel for that purpose.

The question is whether, under this state of case, appellant has made such a showing as entitled her to the relief of a new trial under the section of the Code quoted. It is a familiar rule of law that a new trial will not be granted on account of neglect of parties or their attorneys. (Patterson v. Mathews, 3 Bibb, 80; Payton v. McQuown, 97 Ky., 763.) It has always been held that a mistake by counsel as to the day a case is set for trial is not ground for a new trial. The court is of opinion, however, that this case does not present a state of negligence either on the part of appellant or her counsel, nor is it the result of a mistake on their part.

From the facts shown we are satisfied that appellant's counsel took every step to present her defense that an ordinarily prudent and careful practitioner under similar circumstances would have taken. And we are equally satisfied that but for the misfortune of the serious illness of appellant's attorney having this matter in charge, he would have presented the defense in due time, and would have been present so as to have prevented the default judgment when it was taken. The question then is, whether the illness of one of a firm of attorneys, who is specially charged with, and who has undertaken the defense of a suit in court, is such a misfortune and unavoidable casualty as is contemplated by subsection 7, section 518 of the Code. If it had been shown that the other members of the firm of attorneys had known of the circumstances, or had been put upon inquiry with reference thereto, it would, of course, follow that the sickness of one of them would not excuse the nonaction of the others. But the court is of opinion that under the facts stated above, and shown in the record, the case is brought within the fair meaning of the section of the Code quoted. The appellant, without fault upon her part, and by the casualty of the sickness of her counsel, who alone had the matter of her defense in hand, and upon whom she was relying, was prevented from presenting the defense now set forth in this case, and which is conceded to be a valid one.

The new trial should have been granted, and to that end the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proper proceedings consistent herewith.

ARNETT v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Criminal law—Indictment—Appellant was convicted of voluntary manslaughter under an indictment for murder, and on appeal complains that the indictment is defective in failing to state that the offense was committed feloniously. Held—That as appellant failed to urge this objection on the trial it is too late to raise it the first time in the Court of Appeals.

2. Continuance—The court did not err in refusing a continuance on account of the absence of witnesses as the affidavit for a continuance was defective, in failing to state that the witnesses were not absent by his consent or procurement, or where they were at that time, or what grounds existed for the expectation that their testimony might be procured if the case was continued, besides, the facts proposed to be proven would not have been competent.

3. Evidence—Dying declarations—It is urged that the court erred in permitting the wife of the deceased to testify as to a dying declaration of her husband, because the wife was incompetent to testify to said declaration of her husband, and said declaration was incompetent because it was not made under a consciousness of impending death. Held—That the facts and surrounding circumstances show that the statement of the dying man was competent as a dying declaration, and it was competent for the wife of the deceased to prove the dying declaration.

J. A. Scott, A. H. Stamper, D. D. Sublett and B. G. Williams for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Magoffin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Elliott Arnett, was convicted of voluntary manslaughter

In the Magoffin Circuit Court under an indictment charging him with the murder of S. B. Salyer, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of five years. He complains upon this appeal that a number of errors prejudicial to his substantial rights occurred upon the trial, and for which he asks a reversal: First, it is insisted that the indictment under which he was tried and convicted is fatally defective, in that it fails to allege that the killing of Salyer was feloniously committed, and in support of this contention refers us to Kalin v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky., 354. It was held in that case that the lower court erred in overruling the demurrer filed by the defendant to the indictment. But in this case the sufficiency of the indictment was not called in question in the lower court by the defendant in any way. But, on the contrary, the jury were instructed on the theory that the offense was feloniously committed. We think it is too late after the case has been tried out in the lower court for a defendant to raise this question for the first time in this court.

Appellant next complains that the trial court erred in overruling his motion for a continuance. The affidavit filed in support of this motion fails to state that the witnesses whose testimony defendant desired to avail himself of were not absent by his consent or procurement, or where they were at that time, or what grounds existed for the expectation that their testimony might be procured if the case was continued. Besides, the alleged facts which he recites he would prove by these absent witnesses would not have been competent, if they had been present.

The next, and most important, ground relied on is that the court erred in permitting Mrs. Jane Salyer, the widow of the deceased, to prove an alleged dying declaration which was made to her a short time previous to his death by her husband. It is insisted that this testimony was incompetent, both because it did not sufficiently appear that the dying declarations were made under a sense of impending death, and for the additional reason that under section 606 of the Civil Code "the wife was incompetent to testify even after the cessation of the marriage relation to any communication made to her by her husband during marriage." The facts relied on to show the admissibility of the dying declaration as testified to by the witness are that her husband said to her several times after he was wounded that he could not get well; did not expect to live; and that he made the declaration offered in evidence on the day he died; that he said in the same conversation that his time was short; that perhaps it was best; that previous to making the declaration he had been gradually sinking for several days. To render the statements of a person admissible as dying declarations, such person need not in express words declare that he is about to die, or make use of equivalent language. The essential preliminary fact to be proven to render it competent is that they were made under a consciousness of impending death. And this may be determined not only by what he declares on the subject, but also by his evident danger and surrounding circumstances. The testimony on this point leaves no room to doubt that the deceased realized that he was about to die, and, in our opinion, there was sufficient foundation for the dying declaration. (People v. Commonwealth, 87 Ky., 487; Commonwealth v. Mathews, 89 Ky., 287.) In the case of the Commonwealth v. Minox, 89 Ky., 555, this court had before it a question which involved subsection 8 of section 606 of the Civil Code, which provides: "No prisoner in the penitentiary of this State, or of any other country, shall testify, nor shall any person testify for himself against such prisoner."

And it was held that a convict in the penitentiary was competent to testify as a witness in a criminal proceeding unless he had been convicted of some one of the offenses referred to in section 8 of chapter 29 of the General Statutes. The court said: "It seems to us that the section can not be made applicable to criminal procedure, for the two Codes are wholly and necessarily distinct, and in every instance where it seems to have intended a section in one of them should be treated as a part of both, it has been so expressly provided. Moreover, the language of and reason for that section shows it was intended to apply to the testimony of, nor of others, against convicts in criminal cases."

And this case was referred to and approved in Hilbert, Jr. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 538, where the court said: "On grounds of public policy the wife can not testify against the husband as to what came to her from him confidentially or by reason of the marriage relation, but this rule does not apply to a dying communication made by the husband to the wife on the trial of the one who killed him. The declaration of the deceased made in extremis in such cases is a thing to be proven, and this proof may be made by any competent witness who heard the statement. The wife may testify for the State in cases of this character as to any other fact known to her."

Greenleaf on Evidence, section 337, in stating the reason for the rule at common law, says: "The great object of the rule is to secure domestic happiness by placing the protecting seal of the law upon all confidential communications between husband and wife, and whatever has come to the knowledge of either by means of the hallowed confidence which that relation inspires can not be afterwards divulged in testimony, even though the other be no longer living."

But in section 342 the same author says: "But though the husband and wife are not admissible as witnesses against each other where either is directly interested in the event of the proceeding, whether civil or criminal, yet in collateral proceeding not immediately affecting their mutual interest, either evidence is receivable." The same rule is announced in Wharton on Criminal Evidence, section 427 (3d edition).

It can not be contended that the dying declaration testified to by the witness was a confidential communication made to her; on the contrary, it was evidently made in the furtherance of justice, for the express purpose that it should be testified to in the prosecution of the defendant. The rule announced in Scott v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky., 511, is not in conflict with this view of the law. In that case the husband was on trial for murder, and the court held a letter written by him to his wife, while he was confined in jail, to be a confidential communication, and, therefore, not competent evidence against him. We are, therefore, of the opinion that it was competent for the wife of the deceased to prove the dying declaration.

The instructions fairly submit the law, and upon the whole we see no error in the record. The judgments must, therefore, be affirmed.

LEXINGTON RAILWAY CO. v. FAIN'S ADM'R.

(Filed January 28, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Electricity—Negligence—Instructions—This action was brought to recover damages for the death of a boy fourteen years of age who touched a pulley wire which extended down a pole, and which, by coming in contact with the main wire, became charged with electricity. There was no insulation of the wire at the point that the boy touched it to prevent the injury. The instructions given to the jury on the degree of care required of appellant were more favorable to appellant than the law and evidence authorized, for they in substance told the jury that appellant was only required to use such means as would prevent the escape of the current, instead of which they should have been instructed that it was appellant's duty to know the condition of the wire, and to use the utmost care to keep it safely protected by proper insulation, in order that those exposed to likelihood of contact with it might escape injury. The law is well settled in this State that those who manufacture or use electricity for private advantage must do so at their peril, and the only way to prevent accidents where a deadly current is used is to have perfect protection at those points where people are likely to come in contact with it. It is doubtful whether there was any proof of contributory negligence on the part of the boy, but that question was properly submitted to the jury. The verdict allows only reasonable damages for the loss of life, and the instructions as to the measure of damages, although objectionable, were not prejudicial.

R. C. Stoll, Morton & Darnall and Breckinridge & Shelby for appellant.

Allen & Duncan for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

One Eastin Fain, a boy fourteen years of age, was killed in the city of Lexington, December 18, 1899, by an electric shock received from one of the wires of appellant. His father, the appellee, A. J. Fain, having qualified as administrator of his estate, brought suit against appellant in the Fayette Circuit Court, and upon the trial recovered a verdict and judgment for $4,500. A new trial was refused by the lower court, and appellant asks a reversal of that judgment by this court. It appears from the record that appellant at the date mentioned was operating an electric light plant in Lexington and furnishing electric light to the city, by means of arc lamps located at various places therein. One of the arc lamps was suspended over the center of the intersection of Chestnut and Sixth streets, and was attached to a wire rope strung between two poles, one erected on the southwest corner of Sixth and Chestnut streets, and the other on the corner diagonally opposite. To this wire, called the "span wire," was fastened a pulley wire which ran from the top of the arc lamp; then passed through a pulley fastened to the suspension wire at the center of the street; thence to a pole situated on the southwest corner of Chestnut and Sixth streets; there through another pulley at the side of the pole; thence down the street side of the pole to a reel which was located on the side of the pole about four feet six inches from the ground. To this reel the pulley wire was attached, and by means of the reel the pulley wire was wound and unwound and the arc lamp raised and lowered. The pole to which the reel and pulley wire were thus attached was in the pavement or sidewalk, about thirty inches inside of the curb intersection of the sidewalk of the streets.

The main wire connected with the power house, and over which the electric current is conveyed, runs along the east side of Chestnut street. Two wires make connection with the main wire at the pole located on the northeast corner of Sixth and Chestnut streets and these two wires, passing diagonally across Chestnut street in manner as the span wire, were attached to the pole on the southwest corner of said streets, and thence taken back and connected with the lamp. These wires, called feed wires, conduct the electric current through the lamp and produce illumination at the carbon points. The span and pulley wires are between the feed wires and a few inches apart from the feed wires at a point where attached to the pole, and even closer at other points.

It is alleged in the petition, and we think conclusively established by the evidence, that on the date named, and for some time prior thereto, the appellant negligently permitted the pulley wire mentioned to be and remain without any or proper insulation, and to become at frequent intervals, if not continuously, heavily and dangerously charged with electricity.

While passing along Chestnut street about 7 o'clock in the evening, and evidently without knowing that the pulley wire was charged, or likely to become charged, with electricity, appellee's intestate touched or took hold of it with his hand, whereby he received the charge of electricity which caused his death. The intestate was in company with his brother Elmore at the time of the catastrophe, who was a year or more his junior in point of age. The brothers were on their way to a temperance lodge not far from their home.

In his testimony given on the trial Elmore said in reference to what happened to his brother: "We got to Chestnut street and the light wasn't burning, and my brother said it was mighty dark along here; that light wasn't burning; we went on down the street, I went on the right side and he went on the left side (of the pole), and as he got to the pole he caught hold of the wire, and as soon as he touched it, it got to dangling and throwing him around, and directly threw him out in the street about six or eight feet."

The question was then asked the witness: "Did he shake the wire himself?" To which he replied: "No, sir."

The contention of appellant's counsel seems to be that Eastin Fain deliberately pulled and jerked the pulley wire, and that his death was caused by the pulley wire being thus forced into contact with one of the feed wires at a point where the insulation was defective. In support of this contention the testimony of Robert Clardy is cited, who testified to having seen two or three flashes at the lamp, appearing before the flame came out on the wire between the lamp and the pulley. Clardy's wife, and the negro, Reuben Edwards, testified in some sort to the same effect, but the reliability of this testimony is by no means conclusive. On the other hand, Elmore Fain, who is an intelligent boy, and the only eye witness in position to know and speak as to the conduct of Eastin Fain, testifies that the instant his brother took hold of the wire his body began to dangle, and was jerked from side to side of the pole, and finally cast into the street. No other witness claims to have seen Eastin Fain at the time except the negro Edwards, and ac-

According to his admission, upon cross-examination, the pole was between him and the boy. So what he says, and what was said by Clardy and wife, in regard to the disturbance of the wires, and flashes at the lamp, is explained by what was said by Elmore Fain, and is consistent with the theory that Eastin Fain was being jerked by the wire, rather than that he was jerking it.

In the light of the evidence there were but two ways by which the current could be communicated to the pulley wire, either by coming in contact with one of the feed wires, or by receiving it directly from the lamp. The insulation of the feed wire, according to the evidence, was manifestly imperfect; the night was dark, the weather wet and blustering; the jury doubtless believed, and were warranted by the evidence in finding, that the pulley wire met the pole within a few inches of the feed wire; that such nearness was a faulty and dangerous construction; that the insulation of the feed wire was imperfect and defective, and that these wires contained so much slack that in stormy or windy weather they were blown against the pulley wire, thereby permitting the escape of the electricity when the wire came in contact with anything furnishing a ground connection, which connection was provided when Eastin Fain took hold of the pulley wire.

It is not unusual for persons of mature age and judgment, when standing near a tree or post, to lean against it, nor is it unnatural for a boy to touch any object that he may pass in walking along a street or sidewalk. The pulley wire when it was attached to the reel was within four and one-half feet of the ground, and, therefore, convenient to the touch of man or boy, and there being nothing in its appearance to excite alarm or suspicion, it is hardly probable that a boy would know its dangerous character, or appreciate the necessity of avoiding contact with it in passing.

We think it a self-evident proposition that it was the duty of appellant in using the streets of the city of Lexington, by permission of the municipal authorities, for purposes of private gain, to so conduct its business as not to injure persons passing along such streets, and to keep the highways occupied by their apparatus in substantially the same condition as to convenience and safety as they were in before such occupancy. The law applicable to this case has been well settled in Kentucky in the several cases that have been brought to this court for final adjudication. It is that those who manufacture or use electricity for private advantage must do so at their peril, and the only way to prevent accidents, where a deadly current is used, is to have perfect protection at those points where people are likely to come in contact with it. (McLoughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co., 18 Ky. Law Rep., 759; Schweitzer, Adm'r v. Citizens General Electric Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 608; Thomas' Adm'r v. Maysville Gas Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1879; Macon, By, & Co. v. Paducah Street Railway Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 46.)

It is not deemed necessary to discuss in detail the instructions given in this case by the lower court. In so far as they attempt to set forth the degree of care required of appellant, they were more favorable to it than the law and evidence authorized, for they in substance told the jury that appellant was only required to use such means as would prevent the escape of the current; instead of which they should have been instructed that it was appellant's duty to know the condition of the wire, and to use the utmost care to keep it safely protected by proper insulation in order that those exposed to likelihood of contact with it might escape injury.

The instruction as to contributory negligence complained of by appellant was certainly as favorable to it as the law allowed, as by it the jury were told that "if said Fain purposely took hold of said pulley wire, and by so doing caused it, or any wire, to come in contact with another wire charged with an electric current, this was negligence on the part of said Fain."

The Supreme Court of North Carolina, in Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. Y., 208, which was an action to recover damages for the death of a ten-year-old boy by coming in contact with a live electric wire on the ground, said: "A child is held to such care and prudence as is usual among children of his age and capacity. The defendant contends that the deceased was ten years of age, a very healthy, intelligent, moral and industrious boy. Let us assume this to be true. As he returned to his home the morning of his death, passing along the streets of the city, he was trespassing on no one's property. He was walking where he had a right to walk, not by mere permission or invitation, but because he as one of the public had an absolute right so to do. The wire was on the sidewalk; only one witness saw him when 'he took hold of the wire, and the wire threw him in the ditch.' That witness testified that 'he did not have to reach for it; he just reached out his hand and took it; he did not have to stoop.' No witness testified that there was anything from which even an adult could have inferred that this wire was carrying a deadly current of electricity, or, indeed, any current at all. * * *

"We should be very loath to declare an adult guilty of negligence for grasping a wire such as this one under circumstances such as the defendant contends surrounded the deceased. We certainly can not declare that this boy, whose conduct must be judged with due regard for his boyish nature and habits, negligently caused his own death. The instruction that 'upon the evidence the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence' should have been given."

It is rare, indeed, that two cases can be found, the facts of which are so nearly alike as in the case before us and the North Carolina case supra.

The boy Fain was, when killed, traveling on the sidewalk, where he had a right to be. The deadly wire was in easy reach; he, boy like, inadvertently, or purposely, touched or took hold of it, without knowing of the danger of so doing, as there was nothing in its appearance to give him warning of the presence of the mysterious and deadly current with which it was charged. Under such circumstances it may be doubted whether there was any proof of contributory negligence to go to the jury, but the question of whether he was guilty of negligence in thus taking hold of the wire was properly submitted to the jury by the instructions of the lower court, and we think the conclusion of the jury, that he was not guilty of such negligence, is fully sustained by the evidence.

We do not approve of some of the phraseology of the instruction as to compensatory damages given by the lower court, but as the verdict allows only reasonable compensation to the decedent's estate for the loss of his life, and it is manifestly evident that the jury were uninfluenced by passion or prejudice in fixing the amount thereof, we are convinced that appellant was not prejudiced, nor its substantial rights injured, by the giving of the instruction.

Being of the further opinion that the lower court did not err to the appellant's prejudice in the giving or refusing of instructions, nor in refusing it a new trial, the judgment is affirmed, with damages.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. GLOVER.

(Filed January 29, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Railroads—Negligence—Appellee took an accommodation train from Central City to Leitchfield, and paid his fare. There was a passenger train following the accommodation and running faster, and the conductor promised to transfer appellee to the passenger train if it approached. At the station where appellee expected to make the transfer appellee got off the train and requested the conductor to give him his transportation, but he failed to do this, and just then the train started and the conductor told him to get on, but as he attempted to do so the train gave a sudden jerk, which threw him down, inflicting painful and severe injuries to his knee. This action was brought to recover damages, and a verdict was rendered giving appellee $500 damages. Held—That the instructions given the jury were fair, and the jury having decided in favor of appellee as against the statements of the conductor, it will not be disturbed.

2. Jurisdiction—After entering a demurrer to the petition which the court passed on it was too late to interpose objection to the jurisdiction.

J. D. Atchison, C. S. Walker, J. M. Dickinson and Pirtle & Trabue for appellant.

Lawrence P. Tanner for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee Glover took appellant's accommodation train at 6.30 on the morning of May 6, 1901, at Central City, to go to Leitchfield, and paid the conductor the fare. It was a slow train; there was a passenger train behind it which made better time, and finding that his train would not get into Leitchfield as soon as he wanted to get there, he asked the conductor if he would give him a ticket or the money back he had paid in order that he might get on the passenger train. The conductor told him to ride on with him, and if that train overtook them he would give him the money that he might get on the other train, but he believed the accommodation would beat the passenger to Leitchfield. When they got to Goff appellee, learning that the passenger train was coming close behind, got out of the car and went to where the conductor was to see him about getting his transportation on the other train. Just as he got to the conductor and named the matter to him he signalled the engineer to go ahead, and said to appellee he did not have time to give him his transportation. As the train started appellee asked him what he must do, and the conductor told him to get on the train. As he went to get on at the front end of the caboose, where the conductor had gotten on, the brakeman told him to get on the rear end. He did this, and just as he went to get on the train it gave a sort of lunge, and he was jerked down and rolled over on the ground, by reason of which his left knee was severely hurt. The conductor was standing on the back end and halloed to him to catch the next train, which he did, and at the next station the conductor gave him his grip, and also arranged with the conductor of that train for his transportation to Leitchfield. He was confined to bed eight or ten days; was on crutches five or six weeks, and was lame for about four months. On the trial the knee was exhibited to the jury, and they found a verdict for appellee in the sum of $500. The testimony is conflicting as to what took place between him and the conductor, and also as to the speed of the train. The conductor says he told him not to get on the train, and that it was running at a rapid rate; while appellee says that the train was running about three miles an hour, and that he would have had no trouble in getting on but for the sudden lunge of the train. The proof for appellant showed there was no sudden jerk of the train, but only that it was running fast. Under instructions that seem to us substantially to have submitted the issue to the jury, the jury followed or took as true appellee's version of the transaction, and, therefore, the question in the case is, was he entitled to recover on the facts stated by him? The court told the jury that if the speed of the train was such that persons of ordinary judgment should have perceived the danger of attempting to board it, they should find for the defendant, although they believed from the evidence that the conductor told him to get on. He also told the jury that although appellee did not perceive the danger himself, still if he was told by the conductor, or warned by others, and persisted in the attempt, and so received his hurt, when but for his own negligence he would not have been hurt, they should find for the defendant. Under the instructions of the court, taken as a whole, the jury could not have found for the plaintiff unless they believed from the evidence that the train was running at such a slow speed as that a person of ordinary judgment and discretion might have deemed it safe to get upon the train, and the conductor told him to get on, and he made the attempt, believing it safe to do so; for he and the conductor agree that there was a conversation between them as to his getting on the train, the conductor saying he told him not to get on, and appellee saying he told him to get on. The jury were, therefore, bound to believe either that the conductor told him not to get on, or that he told him to get on. Their verdict was thus a finding that the conductor told him to get on the train. While numerically the preponderance of the testimony is against the plaintiff, there are circumstances sustaining his version of the transaction, and the verdict is not so palpably against the evidence or so excessive as to warrant us in disturbing it.

While there is some conflict in the authorities, the later cases sustain the rule that where a passenger gets off his train at an intermediate station and then undertakes to board it while moving slowly, by the direction of the conductor, or servant in charge, he is not per se guilty of negligence, but it is a question for the jury whether, considering the speed of the train, the direction he received, and other circumstances, he exercised proper care. (3 Thompson on Negligence, section 2995-2998; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Eakin's Adm'r, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 736; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 896; Carr v. Eel River, &c., R. R. Co., 21 L. R. A., 364.) The case of Hunter v. Cooper's Town, & Co., R. R. Co., 12 L. R. A., 431, and others like it, differ from this case, in that here appellee had paid his fare on this train: his baggage was on the train; the conductor had agreed to transfer him to the other train; so appellee had a right to be carried on this train.

The fact that it was a freight train did not change the rule of law applicable in such cases, although appellee was required to use such care as was proper in view of its being a freight train. The fact that it was a freight train was simply a circumstance to be considered in connection with the other facts in the case on the question of negligence. (3 Thompson on Negligence, sections 2901-2903; Ohio Valley R. R. Co. v. Watson, 93 Ky., 654.)

The objection to the jurisdiction of the Daviess Circuit Court was waived by the filing of a general demurrer to the petition and obtaining the judgment of the court as to its sufficiency, for the defendant could not, without objection to the jurisdiction of the court, submit the case for a judgment on a general demurrer, and then after failing thus to defeat the action, plead to the jurisdiction of the court to which it had submitted. (McDowell v. C., O. & S. W. R. R. Co., 90 Ky., 384; Georgetown Water Co. v. Central Thompson-Houston Co., 16 Ky. Law Rep., 125.)

On the whole case we see no error to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & NASHVILLE RY. v. SPEAKMAN.

(Filed January 29, 1903.)

Railroads—Negligence—Statute of limitation—Estoppel—Appellee was a brakeman on appellant's road, and was injured by the car falling through a trestle on account of rotten timbers. In this action he recovered $1,500 damages for his injuries, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The statute of limitation of one year was relied on as a defense. The reply alleged as a matter of avoidance that appellee's failure to bring the action until after the expiration of one year from the injury was caused by the fraudulent conduct and misrepresentation of the officers of appellant company, who promised appellee if he would not bring suit that it would pay him full wages while he was sick and continue him in its employment, besides, would compensate him for his injuries as soon as time should develop the extent of them; and that, relying on these promises of appellant, he delayed bringing the suit until after one year, when appellant discharged him and refused to compensate him for his injuries. It had paid him full wages until he was discharged. Held—That the plea avoiding the statute of limitation was valid as an estoppel against appellant to prevent it from pleading the statute, and it was properly presented in the reply.

W. C. Goad, Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey and Dismuke & Baskerville for appellant.

L. McQuown for appellee.

Appeal from Allen Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, Charles Speakman, was a brakeman in the service of appellant, and while thus engaged was injured on July 22, 1899, by reason of a trestle giving away, precipitating the train some thirty feet to the ground below. The giving away of the trestle was due to the fact that the timbers had become rotten. While there is some conflict in the evidence as to the extent of his injuries, the verdict of the jury for $1,500 is not excessive, or palpably against the evidence. The instructions fairly submitted the questions of fact to the jury, and there is but one matter that we deem it necessary to notice at length. The action was not filed until January 5, 1901; the defendant pleaded limitation of one year; the plaintiff replied in substance that he had been prevented from bringing the action by the fraud of the defendant, and that it was estopped to plead limitation. We see no objection to the form in which the issue was raised. The matter set up in the reply was in avoidance of the plea of limitation made in the answer, and was properly pleaded in the reply. The court by an instruction aptly submitted to the jury the truth of these facts, and they having found for the plaintiff, the question is, were the facts sufficient to stop the running of the statute? For while the evidence was conflicting, the verdict in favor of the plaintiff is not palpably against the evidence. The facts referred to are as follows, the plaintiff's testimony being taken as true: Shortly after he was hurt, and while he was sick, appellant's superintendent represented to him that if he would not sue appellant his time should be allowed to run on and his wages paid until he recovered; also that he would be paid by appellant for his injuries when time showed what their extent was, and he should have in its service a permanent position as long as he lived, or as long as the superintendent remained on the road. These promises were renewed from time to time until after the end of the year from the time he was hurt, and then he was told that they would pay him nothing, and that his claim was barred by limitation. It is shown by the proof that the company did keep him on its pay roll from the time he was injured until he left its service shortly before the bringing of the suit, and paid him full wages for the time he was sick. It was charged in the pleading that these representations and promises were falsely and fraudulently made for the purpose of inducing him to bring no action within the year, and that he was induced by them not to bring the action, believing that the promises were made in good faith, and would be kept. Appellee testified that shortly before the year ran out the promises were renewed, and he was requested to get up proofs for the payment of his claim, which he did, and submitted to the superintendent. These proofs are produced, but the superintendent says they were gotten up for a different purpose.
vol. 24—92

It is earnestly insisted for appellant that a promise to pay can only revive a contract debt, and that an acknowledgment of liability for a tort that is barred by limitation can not revive it. This is true, but the promises and representations here relied on were made before the claim was barred by limitation, and the question is, may the defendant be estopped by conduct like this from relying on the lapse of time during which, by such means, it prevented the bringing of the action? Section 2532, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "When a cause of action mentioned in the third article of this chapter accrues against a resident of this State, and he, by departing therefrom, or by absconding or concealing himself, or by any other indirect means, obstructs the prosecution of the action, the time of the continuance of such absence from the State or obstruction shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action may be commenced."

In Newton v. Carson, 80 Ky., 309, about the time the petition was filed the surety in a note went to the plaintiff and told him that if he would not sue on the note and save the defendant any further cost he would, during the next term of court, confess judgment. He thus procured the plaintiff not to issue summons on the petition, and by some feigned excuse or other protracted the matter until the last day of the term, when, the statute having run, he pleaded limitation. The court held the plea bad, and said that to countenance such chicanery was to make the court a secure means for perpetrating frauds. This rule was followed in Reed v. Hamilton, 92 Ky., 619. In Wood on Limitation, section 66, the rule as relied on by appellant is fully stated, but in note A. to this section, 3d edition, it is said: "While an action of tort can not be based upon or revived by a promise, yet if the defendant's conduct induces the plaintiff to refrain from bringing an action of tort within the period fixed by the statute, the defendant may be thereby estopped to rely upon the statute."

In Armstrong v. Levan, 109 Pa., 177, which was an action of tort like this, where there was a plea of limitation, and a similar matter in avoidance relied on, the court said: "The plaintiff in error has given us an elaborate argument to show that a promise to pay after the statute has run will not revive a tort, and has cited numerous authorities in support of this proposition. We concede his law to be sound; his authorities fully sustain his point. The difficulty in his way is that they do not meet his case. It was not the question of the revival of a tort by a promise to pay made after six years. The conversation referred to occurred before the statute had run, and it was a distinct promise to pay in consideration that the plaintiff below would not sue. If, therefore, she relied upon this promise; if she was thereby lulled into security, and thus allowed the six years to go by before she commenced her suit, with what grace can the defendant now set up the statute? The promise operated not to revive a dead tort, but as by way of estoppel. It has all the elements of an estoppel. The plaintiff relied and acted upon it; she has been misled to her injury; but for the defendant's promise she would have commenced her action before the six years had expired."

This case was followed and approved in Renackowsky v. Board of Commissioners, 122 Mich., 618. Hofferton v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 17 Ky. Law Rep., 1322, is rested on the ground that the reply there was insufficient, as the plaintiff had no right to consult his adversary as to when the statute would run, and could not be allowed to plead ignorance of the law, even if wrongfully advised by counsel; but the court added: "This averment, however, as coupled with the promise to keep the plaintiff in its employ if he would not sue, might be held sufficient if there had been an averment that he had been retained in accordance with the promise and then discharged from the service, it being the inducement for him to forbear bringing his action."

What follows in the opinion in regard to the propriety of an amended petition has reference to the case of the plaintiff's recovering damages for a breach of the contract, and not on his original cause of action. In the case before us appellee was retained in the service, in accordance with the promise; this was the inducement for him to forbear from bringing his action; and after the end of the year he was discharged from service. The suit here was brought on the original cause of action. The defense of limitation could not be presented by demurrer, and it was, therefore, unnecessary for the plaintiff to anticipate this defense in his petition, for the defendant might have chosen not to plead the statute. When it did plead it, it was proper for the plaintiff to reply and set up the matter in avoidance of the plea, showing that the statute had not run. No matter need be set up in an amended petition, which might not properly be put in the petition in the first place, and it was improper for the plaintiff in this case to have set up the matter relied on in the reply in his petition unless he sought damages for the breach of the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

WALLS v. HOME INSURANCE CO. OF NEW YORK.

1. Insurance—Waiver of forfeiture of policy—Appellee issued a policy of fire insurance on appellant's house for a term of years, the premium to be paid in annual installments of $7.50 each, and a note for the entire premium was given, and it was provided in said note that in the event of failure to pay any installment of premium to the agent at the office in Chicago should authorize a cancellation of the policy and a termination of the liability of the company until it should be reinstated by order from the home office. The premium due June, 1900, was not paid. Appellee retained the note and appellant retained the policy. In July following the note was sent to its agent in Springfield for collection, and he sent three notices to appellant to pay the past due premium. He retained the note until the following January and returned it to the home office. The company took no further steps in the matter until after the fire occurred. Appellant, a few days before the fire, sent a check for $7.50 to the Chicago office, but it was not received or paid. In this action to recover the loss under the policy appellee claims that its liability under the policy ceased by reason of the failure of appellant to pay the premium due. A waiver of the forfeiture of the policy is relied on by appellant. Held—That the parties had the right to make any contract it chose, and impose such conditions as they saw proper, and that appellee had the right to waive any conditions made in its favor, and that, under the circumstances shown in this case, the jury were authorized to find that appellee had waived its right to deny the liability for the loss.

2. Evidence—Payment—While the check sent in March was not sufficient to establish payment of the premium, it was relevant as tending to show that appellant had not abandoned his contract, and that he considered himself bound thereon.

John W. Lewis for appellant.

W. C. McChord for appellee.

Appeal from Washington Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant Walls effected a contract of insurance upon his dwelling house and contents with appellee insurance company for a term of years upon the plan of paying the premiums in annual installments. The first premium was paid in advance for the first year's insurance. Appellant, when taking the insurance, executed to appellee a note for $30, for the aggregate of the four remaining years of the term. An equal part, to wit, $7.50, was to be paid the 1st day of June of each year, and in advance for the insurance for that year. The note contained this additional stipulation: "And it is hereby agreed that in case any one of the installments herein named shall not be paid at maturity, or if any single payment promissory note (acknowledged as cash or otherwise), given for the whole or any portion of the premium for said policy, shall not be paid promptly when due, this company shall not be liable for loss during such default, and the said policy shall lapse until payment is made to this company at the Western Farm Department at Chicago, and in the event of nonsettlement for time expired, as per terms on short rates, the whole amount of installments or notes remaining unpaid on said policy may be declared earned, due and payable, and may be collected by law."

The policy contained an expression of the same idea, and other conditions relating thereto, in this language: "But it is expressly agreed that this company shall not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur to the property herein mentioned while any installment of the installment note given for the premium upon this policy remains past due and unpaid; or while any single payment promissory note (acknowledged as cash or otherwise), given for the whole or any portion of the premium, remains past due and unpaid. Payments of notes and installments thereof must be made to the said Home Insurance Co. at its Western Farm Department office in Chicago, Ill., or to a person or persons especially authorized to collect the same for said company. * * * The company may collect, by suit or otherwise, any past due notes or installments thereof, and a receipt from the said Chicago office of the company for the payment of the past due notes or installments must be received by the assured before there can be a revival of the policy, such revival to begin from the time of such payment. * * * This company reserves the right to cancel this policy, or any part thereof, by tendering to the assured the unearned pro rata premium, after due notice to that effect, either by mail addressed to the assured at his, her or their postoffice address as named in this policy, or otherwise; the assured may also cancel when the premium or note or obligation given for such premium has been actually and fully paid in cash, in which case the company shall retain the expenses of writing, procuring and taking the risk, and the usual short rates from the date of the policy up to the time it is received for such cancellation."

There is contained in the policy this further expression: "This contract being based upon the mutual good faith of the parties hereto, it is agreed," etc.

The installment due June, 1900, was not paid. Appellee retained the note. Appellant retained the policy. Appellee wrote appellant to pay the installment after it was due and default had been made. In the following July appellee had sent the note to its agent at Springfield, near appellant's post-office address, with instructions to collect the note. The agent sent appellant three notices. The agent's evidence on this point is as follows:

"Q. Did you notify Mr. Walls?"

"A. I sent him three notices."

"Q. What was the substance of them?"

"A. That his installment due on the 1st of June, 1900, was in arrears, and that if he would send me the money I would have the company send him a receipt. That is about the way I sent the first two notices usually. I always used about the same form. I don't remember the words exactly. In the last notice I sent him in January, I reckon, I notice that I turned the note back into the company about the latter part of January (I have the receipt for the note, I wrote them that I could not collect it), I told him that he would have to pay it or I would send it in to the company, and let them put it out for collection."

Appellant failed to respond to these notices until March 19, 1901, when he mailed to appellee's agent at Springfield a check on the Peoples Deposit Bank of Springfield for $7.50. It seems to be pretty clearly established that this check was mailed at appellant's postoffice, but that it was not received by the agent. Certain it is that it was not presented to the bank nor paid.

On the 28d of March, 1901, the insured house was destroyed by fire, and the contents destroyed or badly damaged. Upon this state of facts the court, at the conclusion of the evidence, ordered a verdict for appellee. The correctness of these instructions depends upon whether appellee had waived the conditions of its policy and of the note, that the policy should lapse, and the company not be liable for loss during default in the payment of the premium. It will be observed that the insurance company not only retained the note executed by appellant for the premium after it was due, but that it unconditionally requested the payment in full of that part of the note which represented the whole premium for the year beginning June 1, 1900. Nothing was said at the time concerning the company's claim that the policy was lapsed, or that the company's liability thereon was suspended during such time as the premium was unpaid. Nor was there coupled with the demand any statement by the company limiting its liability to future insurance, and denying its liability for the time intervening since the default in the payment of premium.

In Moreland v. Union Central Life Insurance Co., 104 Ky., 129, there had been default in the payment of the insurance premium past due, evidenced by the note of the assured, the policy containing a provision that the failure to pay any of the first three installments, or notes or interest upon the notes given for any of said premiums, on or before the days on which they became due should avoid and nullify the policy without action on the part of the company. The company in that case retained the premium note after its maturity, and made an unconditional demand for its payment, and indeed placed it in the hands of its attorney for collection. The court formulated these two questions in that case as the propositions between which the law must make choice in giving construction and effect to such act on the part of the insurance company, namely: "The question is, can the company insist on payment of the note, and at the same time consistently say that the policy, having been forfeited by its nonpayment, remains forfeited? Or, will not the real intention of the parties be effected by holding that, although the policy was forfeited by this nonpayment, yet as the retention of the note and demand for its payment after maturity are acts inconsistent with an intention to insist on a continued forfeiture, therefore, the forfeiture is to be deemed waived."

The court chose the latter, not being able to find satisfactory legal principle upon which the company might "insist on the one hand on the insured complying with his part of the contract, and on the other insist that the contract is a dead one." The court held, too, that all the insured was required to do after the default in premium under such condition, if it did not wish to continue its liability under the policy, was to so act that its conduct would not be inconsistent with the claim of nonliability.

Counsel for appellee here puts the question: Can not these parties make such contract as is suitable to themselves, and may it not be enforced according to its terms? Their right to contract is not limited in respect to the terms of the insurance. While parties may contract with reference to insurance, they may also waive conditions of their contract. The question here presented is, has the insurer waived that condition of its contract of insurance providing for lapsing of the policy upon default in payment of the premium? That the insurer could not be compelled to carry this liability under the contract without payment in advance is not to be doubted. On the other hand, if it saw proper to carry the liability without the payment of the premium in advance, it could do so. Here the premium had been in default from June until January following, when the company was insisting upon the payment of the whole of the premium for the current year. Nothing would be owing the company for the time from June 1, 1900, until the dates of the respective demands for the payment of the premium thereafter if, as a matter of fact, the policy had lapsed, and the company was not bound thereon, because manifestly, if the company was not bound for the loss in case of fire the insured was not bound for the payment of the premium during such time. On the other hand, if the insured was bound for the payment of the premium, and was so treated by the company and acceded to by the insured, then it must follow that the company was bound upon its policy, for that, and that alone, could uphold as a consideration the promise and obligation of the insured to pay the premium.

As said in the Moreland case supra, the action of the company in demanding unconditionally the payment of the note was an act inconsistent with the idea that the policy had lapsed, and that it was not bound thereon. The same principle was approved and applied by this court in Moore v. Continental Insurance Co., 21 Ky. Law Rep., 977.

We are of opinion that the conduct of appellee amounted to a waiver of the conditions of the policy providing for the suspension of its liability after default in the payment of the premium until the premium should be paid. It is claimed by appellant that the mailing of the $7 50 check heretofore referred to was in law a payment of the premium due June 1, 1900. It was shown by the testimony of appellant, and by the postmaster at whose office the letter was mailed, that the check was filled out and signed and placed in an envelope, properly addressed, and that it was placed in the mail pouch. It is claimed that after the necessary time had elapsed for it to have reached the addressee in due course, its receipt and acceptance will be presumed, and it will be adjudged that the facts stated constituted a payment. This contention can not be sustained in this case for the following reasons: First, it was not pleaded that the premium had been paid; second, it was not shown that appellee's agent received or accepted the check in payment; third, the check was not in fact paid, nor presented to the bank upon which it was drawn, nor, fourth, did appellant have at the time, or any time thereafter, before the fire, enough funds in the bank to his credit to have paid the check. However, the fact that appellant sent the check under the circumstances stated by him was relevant as tending to show that he had not abandoned his contract, and that he considered himself bound thereon.

But for the reasons indicated the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

WILSON v. DUPREE, &c.

(Filed January 28, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Practice—Dismissal of action without prejudice—At the conclusion of the evidence for plaintiff the court announced that it would have to give a peremptory instruction for defendant. Plaintiff then moved to dismiss the action without prejudice, claiming said right under section 371, Civil Code of Practice, but his motion was overruled and the peremptory instruction given for defendant. Held—That the court erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to dismiss without prejudice.

Shelbourne & Kane for appellant.

J. M. Nichols & Son for appellees.

Appeal from Carlisle Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

In this suit, involving the title to a strip of land, consisting of a part of an island in the Mississippi river, the plaintiff failed to so connect his title with the Commonwealth as to authorize a submission of the case to the jury, the answer having put in issue plaintiff's title to any part of the boundary in controversy. The court announced at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence that a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant would have to be given. Thereupon the plaintiff (appellant) moved to dismiss his action without prejudice, as permitted by section 371 of the Civil Code. This motion was overruled, and the court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant, which was accordingly done. This action of the court is one of the complaints made of the judgment on appeal.

This very question was presented and considered by this court in Vertrees' Adm'r v. Newport News, &c., Co., 95 Ky., 314. There it was held that the plaintiff had the right to dismiss his action without prejudice at the time he made the motion, and the court erred in overruling it. The other questions made on this appeal are not so presented by the record that we feel safe in passing upon them. Upon a return of the case plaintiff should be allowed to dismiss his petition without prejudice.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

POTTER, &amp;c. v. SKILES, &amp;c.

(Filed January 28, 1903.)

Dower—Where property is assigned for the benefit of creditors and lands are sold in which the assignor's wife had united with him in executing a mortgage, the wife is entitled to be compensated for her inchoate right of dower out of any surplus beyond the mortgage debt arising from said lands; also the value of such right in all other lands belonging to the assignor, and where the purchaser of the land agreed to pay the wife a fixed sum in satisfaction of her claim of dower she is entitled to same as against the claims of her husband's creditors.

John M. Galloway for appellant Potter.

Lewis McQuown and John B. Rodes for appellant Mrs. Smith.

Sims & Grider for appellee Skiles.

Wright & McElroy for appellee bank.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Judge O'Rear delivered the following modification of opinion:

The opinion delivered herein November 13, 1902, in so far as it treats of the rights of Mrs. Mamie Smith, the wife of the debtor whose property was involved in this litigation, is withdrawn. A rehearing is granted to her. It will be borne in mind that the land of her husband had been sold under execution. Failing to bring two-thirds of its appraised value at such sale his equity of redemption was also sold under execution. This sale is expressly authorized by statute. The same statute also gives to such debtor the right to redeem from both sales within a year from the date of the first sale. (Sections 1684-1686, Kentucky Statutes.)

The executions under which this land was sold were against the husband alone. Any sale and conveyance of the land passed the title of the husband necessarily subject to the inchoate right of dower of the wife therein. Although a part of the land was taken to satisfy a mortgage in which she had joined, relinquishing her dower so far as the mortgage debt was concerned, yet as to the residue of the land, and as to the proceeds of the sale of such residue, where the whole tract was sold under these proceedings, she continued to have her inchoate right of dower.

Section 2135, Kentucky Statutes, is: "The wife shall not be endowed of land sold, but not conveyed by the husband before marriage, nor of land sold in good faith after marriage, to satisfy a lien or encumbrance created before marriage, or created by deed in which she had joined, or to satisfy a lien for the purchase money; but if there is a surplus of the land or proceeds of sale after satisfying the lien she may have dower out of such surplus of the land or compensation out of such surplus of the proceeds, unless they were received or disposed of by the husband in his lifetime."

The wife's claim, therefore, was a valid one, and valuable, although it was dependent necessarily upon her outliving her husband. The purchaser, Skiles, desired a title free of the encumbrance of her claim. He contracted with her to pay her $799 for it. She refused to join in the deed conveying her potential dower unless she was first satisfied. The purchaser and she agreed that he should pay her $799 for her interest. Whether this was excessive is not material in this case. Skiles, the purchaser, is not complaining that he has paid too much. He is not seeking to avoid his contract for any reason. Mrs. Mamie Smith is insisting upon it. We can not see why these persons, competent under the law to make a contract, may not make such one as this. Nor can we see wherein the creditors of the debtor, Smith, are affected by it.

The original opinion holds that Smith's right of redemption of the last sale, the one to the bank, was not subject to sale under the execution of his creditors; that his right of redemption of his interest sold was a personal one, which he could exercise or not, and that his failure to exercise it was not a subject of complaint at law by his creditors. If he had failed to exercise it the interest of his wife, by reason of her inchoate dower, would not have been less than it was after he had exercised it. His action or nonaction could not affect its value. Therefore, the mere fact that the purchaser of the land, who redeemed it under Smith's assignment of his right, paid Mrs. Smith more for her dower than the court might believe the dower was worth, can not affect her right to receive and retain the agreed price. Of course, if it had been made to appear that Smith had conveyed his property, which otherwise would have been subject to his creditors, to a vendee who paid the consideration to the debtor's wife, nominally as dower, but as a matter of fact for the debtor's interest, the arrangement would be a fraud, and the subterfuge would not be allowed to stay the court's remedial process. But we can not find that such was the case here.

The judgment, in so far as it subjects any sum agreed to be paid to Mrs. Mamie Smith for her dower by Skiles to the creditors of C. C. Smith, is reversed and the cause is remanded, with direction to adjudge the whole of that sum to Mrs. Smith.

Whole court sitting, except Judge Settle.

JONES V. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 28, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Smith & Ingram and Wm. Low for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Bell Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

In this case appellant was indicted in the Bell Circuit Court for placing an obstruction on the tracks and switches of a railroad in operation, and thereby causing the engine and cars of a train to be upset and thrown from the track. The record presents a state of facts and questions of law identical, except as to the offense charged, with those presented by the record in Jones v. Commonwealth (the same parties), ante, 1434, this day decided, and this case is reversed for the reasons given in the opinion in that case, with direction to the lower court to proceed upon the return of the case as in that opinion ordered.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. DOTSON.

(Filed January 29, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Appellee, with three others, were in the employ of appellant as section hands, and one day when the weather was too inclement to work they borrowed the hand car from the foreman and went to a distant town on pleasure. Just as they were starting the foreman requested them to bring his mail and fifteen cents' worth of nails. As they were returning the hand car jumped the track and appellee was thrown from it, falling on the track, sustaining injuries for which he instituted this action to recover damages. At the close of appellee's evidence, and at the close of the entire evidence, the court refused a peremptory instruction to find for appellant. A judgment for $500 in favor of appellee having been rendered, appellant prosecutes this appeal. Held—That the court should have given a peremptory instruction for appellant as the proof shows that he was injured while he was not engaged in performing duties for the company, but while on a pleasure trip, in nowise connected with his employment for the company.

Quigley & Quigley and Pirtle & Trabue for appellant.

John G. Miller for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This action was instituted by appellee in the McCracken Circuit Court to recover from appellant damage for injury received by him from being thrown from a hand car while in appellant's service.

Appellee, in October, 1899, belonged to what was known as bridge gang No. 9, of which A. Bernard was foreman. At said time these employes of appellant were stationed at a point on appellant's line of railroad called Hunsacker, where they were engaged in repairing a bridge belonging to appellant. It appears that one morning about 7 o'clock, the weather being too inclement to work, appellee, in company with five or six other employes of appellant, who belonged to said bridge gang No. 9, took a hand car, which belonged to appellant, and used by its employes in connection with their work of repairing the bridges along its line, and went off from Hunsacker to a small town called Dyersburg, about four miles distant. When within a short distance of the town of Dyersburg the hand car jumped the track, and appellee was thrown violently forward, falling upon one of the rails of the track, which injured him in such manner as to cause him considerable pain.

Neither appellee nor any of the men with him believed that he was seriously or permanently injured, but after the expiration of a few days he left appellant's services and returned home, and, as said before, instituted this action for the purpose of recovering damages for his injury. He alleges in his petition that he was injured while in the employ of appellant, and that the injury was caused by defects in the hand car furnished by appellant for the use of its employes, constituting bridge gang No. 9, which defects were unknown to him, but which were known to appellant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary watchfulness and diligence. The petition further sets forth, seemingly in aggravation of damages, the fact that ap-pellee was entitled to go in the hospital kept by appellant for the benefit of its injured employes, but which appellant, upon application of appellee, refused him admission.

All the material allegations of the petition are put in issue by the answer, and especially the fact that appellee was injured while in the service of appellant, it being affirmatively alleged that his injuries occurred while he and some of his companions of bridge gang No. 9 were on a leisure jaunt to Dyersburg, they having borrowed appellant's hand car for making the said trip. A trial of the cause by jury resulted in a verdict for appellee, who was the plaintiff below, in the sum of $500, upon which verdict judgment was duly entered. A motion for a new trial having been made by appellant, and overruled by the court, the case is here for review. At the close of appellee's testimony, appellant moved the court to instruct the jury peremptorily to find for appellant (defendant), which motion was overruled. At the close of all of the testimony in the case appellant renewed its motion for peremptory instruction, which was also overruled.

Having reached the conclusion that the court erred in overruling these motions of appellant for peremptory instruction, it will not be necessary to notice the other instructions given by the court, or any of the other instructions asked for by appellant. Appellee states that upon the morning he was hurt Noah Morris came to him and others of the bridge gang, who were in one of the boarding cars used by appellant's employes, and proposed that they should take the hand car and go down to Dyersburg. Appellee tried to state that Noah Morris said, in this conversation, that the boss, A. Bernard, had ordered this to be done; but the court very properly excluded this testimony as hearsay; so the sum total of appellee's testimony upon this question was that Noah Morris and appellee, and four or five others of the bridge gang, took the hand car and started to Dyersburg. He does state that after they had started the foreman, A. Bernard, told Morris while down at Dyersburg to get his mail, and also bring back 15 cents' worth of nails. To the same effect is the testimony of Jacob Edwards, one of the bridge gang, who went with appellee on the hand car to Dyersburg. Appellee was unable to show that the foreman made any orders for him or his companions to take the hand car and go to Dyersburg; and the most that he could show was that, after the trip was made up and the men started, the foreman called to Noah Morris and told him to bring back the mail and 15 cents' worth of nails.

The fact that appellee was hurt while engaged in the business of appellant lies at the very base of his right of recovery for the injury in question, and it was necessary, in order to recover damages, that he should show this to be true. We do not think that the mere request, or order, of the foreman after the party had been arranged for and started to get his mail and 15 cents' worth of nails, turned what would otherwise have been a mere pleasure jaunt into business of the company. Appellee and his companions were not, primarily, going on the business of appellant. There was nothing in Dyersburg for them to do for appellant, and the evidence shows that when they got to Dyersburg, except getting the mail and nails in question, appellee and his companions merely wandered around the town for an hour or so, and then returned to camp at Hunsacker.

It seems to us a proposition utterly incredible, that six or seven men, who were on appellant's pay roll at $1.40 to $2 per day, each, should have been sent with a hand car four miles for the mail and 15 cents' worth of nails, when two men would have been amply sufficient, according to the evidence, to have made the trip with the hand car. The defendant's evidence upon this point put the matter beyond question. Noah Morris, who was also introduced by appellee, testified that he received no orders from the foreman to go to Dyersburg, and that he and his companions went down on the hand car simply because they desired to go for their own pleasure, and that, for this purpose, he had borrowed the hand car from the foreman. The foreman, A. Bernard, testified that, after some hesitation, he consented to lend the hand car in question to Noah Morris and his companions to make the trip to Dyersburg; that the parties were not on the company's business, but were going of their own volition and their own pleasure, and that during the time they were not on the company's pay roll. And this is all the evidence there is in the record upon this point. It follows then, that there was no evidence whatever to sustain appellee's allegation that he was hurt while in the employ, or while doing service for, the appellant; and this being true, there was nothing to submit to the jury, and the motion of appellant for peremptory instruction should have been sustained. Appellee's claim for the right of admission to appellant's hospital must follow the merits of his case.

Wherefore, the case is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

FICTET SPRING WATER ICE CO., &c. v. CITIZENS INSURANCE CO. OF PITTSBURG, PA.

SAME v. SCOTTISH UNION AND NATIONAL INSURANCE CO.

(Filed January 23, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Insurance—Description of location of personal property—Agents—These two actions were instituted on two policies of fire insurance to recover for loss of wagons which were insured as the property of the ice company, and were issued to the company, but were afterwards transferred to its assignee for the benefit of creditors. The only defense made was that the property was not situate in the buildings stated in the policies. Plaintiff alleged that the policies, by mistake, stated that the wagons were stored in plaintiff's frame stable building and sheds adjoining, instead of in the frame wagon shed building in which they were stored at the time they were insured; that the mistake was made by the agent who wrote the policies, who had knowledge, from personal inspection of the premises, of the wagons and location of the wagon shed buildings and stables on the grounds, and asked that the policies be corrected and the loss recovered. Held—That as the proof shows clearly that the agent who wrote the policies had personal knowledge of the property insured and its location, and made the mistake in the description in the policies, and plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to a correction of the mistake and to recover on the policies.

2. Evidence—Parol evidence is admissible to correct the mistake in policy of insurance as to the location of personal property insured.

Shackelford Miller and Barnett & Barnett for appellants.

1462    PICTET S. W. CO., &C. V. CITIZENS INS. CO., &C.

John G. Strother and Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for appellees.

Appeals from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

These two appeals are prosecuted upon one record from a judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court rendered in the two actions which, by consent, were heard together. The petitions in both cases alleged in substance that on the 18th of May, 1895, the defendant companies issued and delivered to the plaintiff their respective policies of insurance on certain personal property owned by the plaintiff, including, among other things, twelve ice wagons stored in the frame wagon shed building of the ice company, situated on its premises between Brook, Floyd, Caldwell and Kentucky streets in Louisville; that each policy was for $1,800, or at the rate of $150 per wagon; that on October 7, 1895, the aggregate insurance upon the twelve ice wagons was reduced to $1,800, of which $650 was in the Scottish Union and National Ins. Co., and $1,150 in the Citizens Ins. Co.; that on the 1st day of October, 1895, the ice company made a general deed of assignment of all of its property for the benefit of its creditors to S. S. Eastwood; and that the defendant companies, by written endorsement upon the policy, agreed to transfer the insurance to the assignee; and that on the 25th day of February, 1896, the ice wagons were burned up whilst in the frame wagon shed buildings in which they were stored at the time the insurance policies were issued by the defendants, who were represented by the same agent, and who went over the premises and examined the wagon shed buildings and saw the wagons stored therein, and issued the policy, well knowing that they were kept in the building in which they were finally burned up; but that in writing out the policies by mistake or inadvertance the policies erroneously recited that they were stored in plaintiff's frame stable building and sheds adjoining, and situated on their premises between Brook, Floyd, Caldwell and Kentucky streets in Louisville, Ky.; that the policies were intended to insure the twelve wagons while stored in plaintiff's wagon shed building; that both the wagon shed building and stable building were upon the ice companies premises, situated about 160 feet apart, and asked that the error in the policies describing the building in which they were stored be corrected in accordance with the facts and the contract of the parties, and for a judgment.

The defendants, in their answers, deny that the wagons covered by their policies were stored in the plaintiff's frame wagon shed building at the time the policies of insurance were taken out, or that their agent, who caused them to be insured, went upon the premises and examined the wagon shed building and saw the wagons stored therein, and knew that they were kept in this building in which they were finally destroyed; denies that there was any mistake in the description of the building in which the wagons were stored, or that they were to be insured in any other than plaintiff's frame stable building and shed adjoining, and which was not burned. No issue was raised by the proof as to the amount of plaintiff's loss. The chancellor refused the relief sought and dismissed plaintiff's petition, and it has appealed.

It is very clearly shown by the evidence that the frame stable building and the frame wagon building were both located upon the premises of the plaintiff between Brook, Floyd, Caldwell and Kentucky streets; and that the stable was an enclosed building, with twenty stalls for horses and mules, and was used for this purpose by the ice company when the plant was in operation: that the adjoining sheds were comparatively small places, which were used by the ice company as a place for storing one or two wagons used to haul sawdust, and a buggy; that it was impossible to get a wagon of any kind into the stable, and not more than two or three at most of the large two-horse wagons could have been put under the adjacent sheds; that the place for keeping these wagons, when not in use, was the "frame wagon shed building" where they were burned, and which was expressly appropriated for this purpose. When the plant was running the wagons in actual use were left standing in the open yard, but as soon as they ceased to use them they were always stored in that building. Mr. Griswold, the president of the ice company, says that the wagon shed had been formerly used as an ice house; that it was a large building, twenty-five feet wide and seventy-five feet long, which was converted into a wagon shed for the express purpose of providing a place for storing these wagons; and that four wagons which were not in actual use were stored therein at the time the policies were taken out, and that the remaining eight, which were in daily use, were left in the open yard at night, but that as soon as the plant closed down, or they ceased to be used, they were put in this shed. "Potts," the night watchman, testifies that none of the large ice wagons which were burned were ever kept in the stable or the adjacent shed, but in the wagon shed. Hayden, the day watchman, testifies that the wagons were stored in the wagon shed when they were first purchased in 1893; that three of them were never used or taken out of the shed; that the other nine were stored therein on the 5th day of October, 1895, at the time the plant was closed down; that one sawdust wagon and some old small wagons were put in the shed. It is conceded that the description of the building in which the wagons were stored was written by the agent of the company, and the younger McPherson testifies that he knew that the building burned was used as a wagon shed. His testimony on this point is as follows:

"Q. Was there any other wagon shed on these premises at all?"

"A. There was a wagon shed across the alley that was used to be called ice house No. 6."

"Q. That was a wagon shed?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. You knew that?"

"A. I knew that."

"Q. You all knew that it was a wagon shed?"

"A. Yes, sir."

"Q. You knew it all the time?"

"A. I knew it from the date of the policy there about in March."

"Q. Before the fire?"

"A. Yes, sir, before the fire."

There seems no escape from the conclusion that the agents of the insurance company knew all about this building, and that it was used as a wagon shed. Nor can there be any doubt that both parties thought that the wagons which were burned were covered by these policies. And there is no rule of law more universal and more inflexible than that contracts are to be effectuated according to the lawful intention of the parties. In Ætna Ins. Co. v. Jackson, Owsley & Co., 55 Ky., 192, where there was an ambiguity in the descriptive words of the insurance policy, this court, through Judge Marshall, said: "Common justice required that the consequence of the failure should fall upon the party who, under the circumstances, might and should have removed the ambiguity. An applicant for insurance having indicated with reasonable certainty the extent of the insurance desired, should not, after a loss has occurred, be disappointed in his just expectation of indemnity by an objection, of which the insurer was apprised when the policy was issued, while its existence and effect may have been unknown to the party insured."

And the decision in Richardson v. German Ins. Co., 89 Ky., 575, was to the same effect. Innumerable authorities might be cited to support this doctrine. We do not understand the defendants to controvert the proposition that an insurance policy, like any other contract, can be corrected on the ground of mistake, and that parol evidence is admissible to show the mistake, and in what it consisted. In our opinion the testimony in this case is sufficient to justify the exercise of this power by the chancellor and to have authorized a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the policies sued on.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instruction to enter a judgment in each case in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. WATKINS.

(Filed January 29, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—Appellee, a young man, aged about twenty years, while driving a team over a crossing of appellant's road, was struck by a train and thrown from his wagon, his shoulder broken and his wagon broken, and instituted this action to recover damages at the sum of $5,000. He afterwards amended his petition, claiming $150 additional damage for loss of time. On the trial, which resulted in a verdict in his favor, the court in its instruction did not limit the finding of the jury on the question of loss of time to $150, the amount claimed in the petition on this item, but limited the whole recovery to $5,000. Held—That this instruction was erroneous and prejudicial.

W. H. Marriott and E. W. Hines for appellant.

McCandless & James for appellee.

Appeal from Hardin Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellee, Jerome Watkins, who is a young man about twenty years of age, while driving a wagon across appellant's railway tracks, at a public crossing near Sonora, in Hardin county, Kentucky, was run into by one of appellant's trains, his wagon broken and himself thrown violently against the ground, bruising and injuring one of his shoulders. For the injury thus received he instituted this action in the Hardin Circuit Court to recover damages from appellant, setting up in his petition that his injuries were caused by the reckless and wanton negligence of appellant's employees in charge of said train in failing to give proper warning at the crossing in question, so as to enable plaintiff to avoid the danger of the collision. The amount of his damage is fixed in the petition at the round sum of $5,000. Afterwards he filed an amended petition, by permission of the court, in which he states, among other things, that he lost from work or labor, by reason of the injury set out in the original petition, five months, lacking five days, of the value of $150. The answer put in issue all of the material allegations of the petition, and contains also a plea of contributory negligence.

The issues having been made up by reply, the case came on for trial on the 19th day of November, 1901. After the evidence was all in, and the jury instructed, in writing, the arguments of counsel heard, and the jury had retired to their room for deliberation, the court, of its own motion, in the absence of appellant's counsel, recalled the jury and added to instruction No. 3, which contains the measure of damages, the following words: "For his loss of time, if any, on account of his injury." So that the instruction, as amended, reads as follows: "If the jury find for the plaintiff they will fix the amount of his recovery at such sum in money as will compensate him for his loss of time, if any, on account of his injuries and for the mental and physical suffering he has undergone, if any, as the direct and proximate result of his injuries, and for such mental and physical suffering as it may be reasonably certain he will undergo in the future, if any, as the direct and proximate result of his injuries and for any permanent impairment of his power to earn money, if they shall believe there is any permanent impairment, and in estimating this they may consider his expectations of life and capacity to earn money, and if the jury shall believe the negligence on the part of the defendant was gross they may, in their discretion, provide in their verdict such further sum as punitive damages as they may, under all the circumstances of the case, deem proper, not, however, exceeding in all the amount claimed in the petition, which is $5,000."

Of this action of the court appellant excepts, and is complaining on appeal. It is not necessary to decide whether or not, under the doctrine upon this question in the case of Sears' Adm'r v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 152, we could reverse this case alone upon the ground that instruction No. 3 was amended upon a material point, in the absence of the appellant's counsel, and without giving him the opportunity to discuss it with the jury. But a reference to the petition, as amended, shows that plaintiff fixes the value of his loss of time by reason of the injuries complained of at $150, and in any instruction which the court gave on this particular item of damage it should have limited the jury to the sum fixed by appellee himself.

We think it was clearly erroneous to instruct the jury that if they find for the plaintiff they will fix the amount of recovery in such a sum of money as will compensate him for his loss of time, if any, on account of his injuries, without limiting them to the sum stated in the petition as constituting plaintiff's damage for this item. The jury did not know, perhaps, or appreciate, their duty on this point, and as they were only limited by the whole instruction to the amount of $5,000, they may have estimated plaintiff's damages for loss of time at far beyond the sum of $150, although, by the pleadings, plaintiff's recovery was limited, for that item, to that sum. Having reached this conclusion it is not necessary to discuss any of the other questions raised by appellant.

Wherefore, the case is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BENGE, &c. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed January 30, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instruction—A. and B. were convicted of manslaughter for the killing of C. The killing took place at the house of D., and it is claimed for appellants on this appeal that it was done in defense of D from an assault made on him by the deceased. Errors in instructions are relied on for a reversal. Held—That the court gave for appellants an instruction authorizing the jury to acquit if they believed that the killing was done in the necessary defense of their home and those assembled there, which was favorable to them, as they did not live at the house. The instructions were not objectionable on the ground that the first instruction did not properly submit the question as to "apparent necessity," as it is not usual or necessary to embody in the first instruction generally presenting the law of murder and manslaughter the complete law of self-defense. It is customary and sufficient if the law of self-defense is correctly submitted in a separate instruction. A. was charged as an aider and abettor only, and the jury were properly instructed that before he could be convicted they should find that B., the principal, had shot and killed deceased.

C. B. Lyttle, B. B. Golden and D. K. Rawlings for appellants.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Clay Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellants, Howard Benge and Thomas Bowling, were convicted of manslaughter for the killing of Morgan Bowling. Thomas Bowling is the grandson, and Howard Benge is the son of J. C. Benge. The killing occurred at the home of the last named. It was the theory of the defense that the deceased came to the dwelling house of J. C. Benge, and without provocation began an assault upon him, and shot at him, and that appellant shot the deceased to protect J. C. Benge from death or great bodily harm, then imminent at the hands of the deceased. It is scarcely claimed, and there were but meagre circumstances tending to show, that the alleged assault was directed against appellants, or any one else but J. C. Benge. However, the court properly submitted to the jury the question also of the danger, or apparent danger, of appellants from the alleged assault.

It is argued on this appeal that there was a "feud" existing between the families of J. C. Benge and of deceased. In fact, though, Benge and appellants when testifying in this case, deny that there was, or ever had been, any ill feeling among the parties. Nor does any witness so state, except one, another son of J. C. Benge, who said that he "had heard" of some difficulty between them. There is no complaint of any ruling of the court at the trial save as to giving instructions.

It is argued that the instructions given did not properly or sufficiently submit to the jury the right of appellants to defend their home and its inmates from assault. In fact neither of appellants was living at J. C. Benge's. They were each mere visitors there. But the court did give as ample instructions on this point as if it had been their home. The self-defense instruction embodying this idea, and complained of, is as follows: "If you shall believe from the evidence that at the time the defendant, Howard Benge, fired the shot that took the life of Morgan Bowling (if you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so do) he believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that Morgan Bowling was then and there about to kill defendant or Thomas Bowling or Jim Crow Benge (J. C. Benge), or any one assembled at his house, or was about to do him or them, or either of them, some great bodily harm, and that it was necessary, or was believed by the defendant in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to shoot and wound deceased in order to avert said danger, real or to the defendant apparent, then you ought to find the defendant, Howard Benge, not guilty on the grounds of self-defense and apparent necessity."

The same was given, with proper changing of names, as to the other appellant. It is next complained that the idea of "apparent necessity" was not properly submitted, because under the first instruction the jury were not told that the apparent necessity was sufficient if it appeared to be so to the defendant in the exercise of a reasonable judgment. That part of the criticised instruction is: "If you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Howard Benge, in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, willfully and feloniously, and not in his necessary, or reasonably apparent necessary, self-defense, and not in the necessary, or reasonably apparent necessary, defense of Thomas Bowling, Jim Crow Benge, or of them assembled at his house, shot at and wounded Morgan Bowling so that he died thereby, then you ought to find the defendant, Howard Benge, guilty," etc.

It is neither usual nor necessary to embody in the first instruction, generally presenting the law of murder and manslaughter, the complete law of self-defense. It is customary and sufficient if the law of self-defense is correctly submitted in a separate instruction. In the second instruction, the one first quoted above, the jury are most explicitly told that if the defendant shot and killed the deceased in the defense either of the defendant, his co-defendant, his father or "of any of the others at his house assembled," and that such shooting was necessary, or that it appeared to the defendant in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to save him or the others named from death or great bodily harm then and there about to be inflicted or any of them by the deceased, the jury could not convict.

It is also complained that the court did not properly instruct the jury on the subject of reasonable doubt. That instruction is as follows: "If from all the evidence in the case the jury have a reasonable doubt of the defendant, Howard Benge, having been proven guilty, they ought to find him not guilty."

There is also an instruction, not objected to, as to their duty in event the jury should find the defendant guilty, but have a reasonable doubt as to the degree of his guilt. The criticism of the instruction just quoted is because it fails to say to the jury if they have a reasonable doubt, under the evidence, of any material fact necessary to establish the defendant's guilt they will acquit him. This expression is frequently, and not at all improperly, incorporated in this instruction, although it is, we think, necessarily included in the language quoted, for if the jury have a reasonable doubt under the evidence, or from the lack of evidence, that any material fact has been proven, which is necessary to establish the defendant's guilt, they can not believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he has been shown to be guilty. This court, however earnestly invited to do so, must refuse to lay down the forms of instruction to be applied to all cases of a class. Ideality of expression, however much it may be admired, can not be exacted at the expense of practical justice.

Appellant Bowling was charged as an aider and abettor only. Before he could be convicted the jury were required to find that the principal, appellant Benge, had shot and killed deceased under the instruction just discussed. In the self-defense instruction given to the jury applicable to this appellant they were limited to believing from the evidence that appellant Bowling, in aiding and abetting Howard Benge, if he did so, believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that either he or his co-defendant, or J. C. Benge, "or some of them assembled at J. C. Benge's house," were in danger of death or great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased then and there about to be inflicted on them, or some of them, and that "the defendant, Bowling, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, believed it to be necessary to aid, assist, abet, advise and counsel the said Howard Benge to shoot the said Morgan Bowling in order to avert said danger, real or to the defendant, Thomas Bowling, apparent."

It is claimed for this appellant that the jury should have been told in addition that if the principal, Howard Benge, had reasonable grounds to believe, and in the exercise of a reasonable judgment did believe, himself or the others named in such danger, appellant, Thomas Bowling, had the right to aid or abet him in taking the life of deceased. Counsel overlook in this argument that the court had already required the jury to find the principal guilty before they could convict the aider and abettor in any event. At any rate, the two were tried together; the jury have found them both guilty; the instructions applicable to the principal are unobjectionable, and fully cover the point now being discussed. To have restated the same thing in that part of the instructions applicable to appellant Bowling would have been merely a multiplication of words without material enlightenment.

There is no error prejudicial to appellants and the judgment is affirmed.

WATKINS v. MOONEY.

Municipal government—Authority of president of board of aldermen of second class city in absence of mayor—Vacancies in police and fire commission—Under section 8137, Kentucky Statutes, the mayor of a city of the second class may, with the approval of the board of aldermen, appoint four members of the police and fire commission, and may fill all vacancies that may occur in the board. Under section 8204, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that in the event of the absence or disability of the mayor, the president of the board of aldermen shall act as mayor. Appellant had been appointed by the mayor to fill a vacancy in the board of police and fire commissioners, but had not been confirmed by the board of aldermen. The mayor after this left the city of Lexington and went to Frankfort on business one day and returned the next. During the day that the mayor left the president of the board of aldermen had notice of the convening of the board at an early hour the next morning served on the members. At the meeting he submitted the name of appellant as a member of the police and fire commissioners to the board, and he was rejected. The president then nominated appellee to fill said vacancy, and he was confirmed. Appellant brought this action to establish his claim to the office. Held—That the absence contemplated by the legislature in the employment of that word in said section is not merely a physical absence of the mayor from the city, but is such an absence as renders him incapable for the time being of performing the act that may be in question, which act must present such a necessity for immediate attention as to require it to be then executed. There was no such urgency, and no emergency apparent for the president of the board of aldermen to assume the duties of mayor. The law did not require that a member of said board appointed to fill a vacancy should be confirmed by the board of aldermen, and appellant is, therefore, entitled to said office.

Breckinridge & Shelby and Allen & Duncan for appellant.

Morton, Darnall & Wilson, Webb & Farrell and J. D. & G. R. Hunt for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit involves the title to the office of member of the board of police and fire commissioners of the city of Lexington, appellant and appellee each claiming to be the rightful incumbent.

Lexington is a city of the second class. The statute providing a system of government for these cities creates a board called the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners, which is composed of the mayor of the city, ex-officio the chairman of the board, and four other members appointed by the mayor. This board is created by section 8137, Kentucky Statutes, which section is as follows: "The mayor, subject to the approval of the board of aldermen, shall appoint four citizens and freeholders of the city, who shall have been electors of the city for five years preceding their appointment, and who shall not be less than thirty years of age and not related to the mayor by blood or marriage, who, together with the mayor, shall compose a board of police and fire commissioners. The mayor shall be ex-officio chairman of said board. Said commissioners shall be appointed for a term of one, two, three and four years, respectively, upon the taking effect of this act; and every year thereafter, as the terms of office of the said commissioners shall expire, respectively, there shall be one commissioner appointed for a term of four years, and the mayor shall fill all vacancies that may occur in said board. The salaries of the commissioners may be fixed by the general council. The city clerk shall act as clerk of said board."

The four members provided for by the section were originally appointed by the mayor and confirmed by the board of aldermen. One of these members was J. Soule Smith. Before this controversy arose he resigned, thus creating a vacancy in the board. Henry T. Duncan was then, and is yet, the mayor of Lexington. After the vacancy above named occurred the mayor appointed appellant, J. L. Watkins, to fill it, and he accepted it. Whether this appointment was communicated by the mayor to the board of aldermen, and by that body confirmed and approved, does not appear from the record, though it is assumed in argument that it was not so reported nor confirmed.

Shortly thereafter, and on the 21st day of January, 1902, the mayor had occasion to come to Frankfort, where the State legislature was in session, for the purpose of attending to business before that body, or some committee, affecting the interest of cities of the second class. He left Lexington in the afternoon of the 21st, and did not return until the following afternoon. Lexington is about twenty-five miles distant from Frankfort, connected by railroad, and between these two cities several passenger trains are run each way each day. The cities are also connected by telegraph and telephone service, affording opportunities for constant communication by these means.

Section 3204, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "In the event of the absence or disability of the mayor, the president of the board of aldermen shall act as mayor, and in event of the absence or disability of both the mayor and the president of the board of aldermen the president of the board of councilmen shall act as mayor."

W. H. McCorkle was the president of the board of aldermen. After the mayor's departure for Frankfort McCorkle issued notices convening the board of aldermen in extraordinary session at an early hour on the morning of the 22d, "to receive a communication from the mayor." A quorum of the board met as called. Whereupon McCorkle, affecting to act as mayor pro tempore, communicated to that body the appointment of appellant Watkins previously made by Mayor Duncan, and submitted this appointment to the board as a nomination for their approval and confirmation. The board of aldermen rejected the appointment, whereupon President McCorkle immediately transmitted to the board the nomination of appellee Mooney to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Smith, which nomination was confirmed and approved by the board.

It is charged that this action by McCorkle and his associate members of the board of aldermen was the result of a conspiracy upon their part, and of others acting with them, to defeat the mayor's right of appointment, and to install such members of the board of police and fire commissioners as would be unacceptable to him, and to deprive him of his legal power pertaining to his office.

The facts above stated are gathered from the petition of appellant Watkins, filed against appellee Mooney in the Fayette Circuit Court to prevent the exercise by Mooney of the duties and privileges of the office which they were each claiming. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to this petition, and dismissed the action. Wherefore this appeal, which presents two questions of law:

1st. Was the mayor absent within the meaning and contemplation of the statute?

2d. Does the statute require appointments made by the mayor to fill vacancies in the board of police and fire commissioners of cities of the second class to be confirmed by the board of aldermen before they become effective?

The court does not regard the allegation of the alleged conspiracy as one at all material in this case. In our opinion the question is purely one of power. One department of government will not undertake to inquire and can not ordinarily investigate the motives prompting members of a distinctly different department in the exercise of power conferred upon them by law.

It is the contention of appellee that the word "absence" as employed in this statute has a well-defined and understood meaning; that it should be given its strict literal meaning, to be away from or to be withdrawn from a place, and that it has reference solely to a physical absence of the subject. Many words of common use in our language have two or more meanings. It is not infrequent that a word having one meaning in its ordinary employment has a materially different or modified meaning in its legal use. This word "absence" is a fair example. It has been held that one may be absent though actually present, as where a judge, though on the bench, does not sit in the case. He is there taken as absent in contemplation of law. (Bingham v. Cabbot, 3 Dall., 1936; Byrne v. Arnold, 24 N. Brunsw., 161.) It has also been held to mean "not present." (Paine v. Drew, 44 N. H., 306.) It has been held, too, as not meaning "out of the State only." (James v. Townsend, 104 Mass., 367.)

"Absence" and "disability" are words which from their use in statutes may have two different meanings. They are quite frequently found in some form in the statutes of this and other States, as well as in the Constitutions of many of the States. The legislature has not defined the sense in which either of the words is to be construed, leaving their construction and application to be gathered from the intent of the act or section in which they may be found, by the light of its subject-matter and evident purpose. President Arthur, in his first message to congress, clearly and ably set forth the ambiguity of the term "disability" as used in the Constitution of the United States, providing that "in case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation or disability to discharge the powers and duties of said office, the same shall devolve upon the vice-president," etc. Yet "disability" is a word of scarcely less ambiguity as generally used in common parlance than "absence." In some States their statutes provide that the chairman of the board of aldermen, or other officer holding the position of vice-mayor, shall act in case of the absence of the mayor from the city. Such, for example, are the cases of O'Malley v. McGinn (Wis.), 10 N. W., 515; In re Cleveland v. Mayor (N. J.), 18 Atl., 67.

In other cases cited it was shown that the mayor was absent from the State, and the court found that he could not perform the duty which the vice-mayor was assuming to do. Such are State v. Byrne (Wis.), 73 N. W., 820, and People v. Van Anden (Mich.), 74 N. W., 1009. In the case first named the facts do not show in the opinion how far the mayor was from the city, nor how long he had been away, nor the particular urgency of the action of the vice-mayor. In the last-named case the mayor was shown to have been absent from the State for two weeks, and as having expressed a purpose, when he left, of being absent for three weeks.

It is a difficult task, if not an impossible one, to lay down a rule that could apply to all cases, defining the meaning of the word "absence," as used in the statute quoted above, and similar ones. We do not lay any particular stress upon the fact that the mayor was not absent from the State, though in one of the cases cited the court seems to have done so. For example, the mayor of Lexington, if at Hickman, Ky., would be further removed from his city, and, therefore, less capable of being in touch with its governmental affairs than if he were at Cincinnati. So the mayor of Newport or Covington, cities of the second class, also would be absent from the State, and of course from their respective cities, if across the river in Cincinnati, a matter of ten minutes' journey.

It may be that the courts, until the legislature has spoken more definitely as to its meaning upon this subject, might have to determine each case largely upon the particular facts presented. We think that the soundest reasoning under the authorities cited and examined gives the word "absence" the meaning of that absence which would make it impossible for the official to perform the act in question. Where the mayor is to preside personally at a meeting of a board which he is ex-officio a member, absence in that case would probably mean an absence from the place of meeting. But for the matter of making an appointment, signing a contract which he was permitted by law to sign for the city, or to issue a proclamation, or to issue a notice citing an official to appear for a violation of the statute, which he was authorized to try, the mayor might perform any of these acts though beyond the corporate limits of the city. Would the chairman of the board of aldermen be authorized, if the mayor should happen to go out to the waterworks near Lexington, and in which his city is interested, as it supplies its citizens with water necessary for their comfort, health and protection, to take advantage of such an absence to disarrange and confuse his policy of government? There can be but little doubt that he should not presume to act in a case of such absence except the emergency was such as to demand that the official act be then done.

In discussing a somewhat similar provision of law found in the Constitution of Louisiana the Supreme Court of that State, in the case of State of Louisiana, &c. v. James Graham, 26 La. Ann., 568 (21 Am. Rep., 551), had under consideration the meaning of the term "absence from the State" as used by the Constitution. In that case the governor had gone beyond the State lines to Pass Christian, a few hours' run from the capital of Louisiana. Said the court: "How is the absence of the governor to be ascertained? It is manifest that there ought to be some certain proof accessible to the public, from which they may, with certainty, derive the knowledge as to who is authorized to act as governor of the State. As the law makes no provision for the mode in which the governor shall manifest to the public his absence from the State, it necessarily is left to his discretion, subject to his responsibility to the people. If the interests of the State should suffer in consequence of his prolonged absence, he would be amenable to public sentiment and to the control of the impeaching power of the State. * * * We do not think that it was ever contemplated that the movements of the governor should be watched with the view that the lieutenant-governor or speaker of the house of representatives should slip into his seat the moment he stepped across the borders of the State."

To the same effect see People v. Parker, 3 Neb., 409, 19 A. Rep., 634.

To adopt a thought so forcibly presented in the last-named case, when we reflect upon the possible consequences of such construction of the statute, and upon the disgraceful tricks, strifes and exhibitions which might be entailed upon the people of the community, we hesitate and cast about for a more salutary rule than to adopt the suggestion of appellee, that the mere physical absence is the one contemplated, for one which, while it will insure the efficient administration of the affairs of the city government during the brief temporary absence of the executive, will at the same time protect that department of the government against unnecessary and ill-advised intrusion.

We have, therefore, concluded that the absence contemplated by the legislature in the employment of that word in the section under discussion is not merely a physical absence of the mayor from the city, but is such an absence as renders him incapable for the time being of performing the act that may be in question, which act must present such a necessity for immediate attention as to require it to be then executed.

In the case at bar there was no such urgency, and no emergency apparent for the president of the board of aldermen to assume the duties of mayor. (Mayor of Detroit v. Moran, Mich., 9 N. W., 252; Lynd v. Winnebago, 16 Wall., 6; Bernard v. Taggart, N. H., 25 L. R. A., 613.)

2d. It is insisted for the plaintiff that the appointment of members of the board to fill vacancies must be confirmed by the board of aldermen as original appointments must be. It is argued, and this we conceive to be the main argument for the appellee in this behalf, that there is no apparent reason, and in fact none, why the legislature should require the mayor's appointees, original and for full terms, always to be confirmed by the board of aldermen, and yet allow him to fill vacancies in the same board without such confirmation. The argument seems to us to be almost irresistible when presented to that body who make the laws. But the consequences are not so much to be regarded in the construction of the statutes as the language employed, where the language is unambiguous. In fact as long as the language of the statute is not ambiguous the courts have no discretion as to the meaning they will give to it.

Says Sutherland on Statutory Construction, section 237: "It is beyond question the duty of courts in construing statutes to give effect to the intent of the law-making power, and seek for that intent in every legitimate way. But, * * * first of all, in the words and language employed, and if the words are free from ambiguity and doubt, and express plainly, clearly and distinctly the sense of the framers of the instrument, there is no occasion to resort to other means of interpretation. It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation."

Any other course would be extremely mischievous and dangerous. It is not for the judiciary to make laws. If they should, under the guise of interpretation, give to plain, unambiguous language used by the legislature in expressing its intention a meaning nowise warranted by the language employed, it would practically be to constitute the courts not only the construers of the law, but its makers. The meaning of the language of the section quoted is absolutely clear, is entirely free from ambiguity, is as plain and as simple as any similar number of words in common use in the English language. We can find no warrant to hunt beyond their common every-day use for a latent meaning supposedly in the minds of the legislature. Furthermore, the statute, section 3108, expressly confers upon the mayor the power to fill all vacancies in office unless it was otherwise provided in that act. We find no provision otherwise, nor can we see why the legislature should confer the power upon the mayor to fill vacancies in more important positions than these are without the confirmation of the board of aldermen, and yet require the confirmation in this particular instance. In any event, as to the wisdom or folly of such a provision, it is a matter beyond the control of the judiciary.

A distinction is obviously intended to be made between original appointments of members of the board and appointments to fill vacancies, otherwise there is no sense or meaning in the provision directing and authorizing the mayor to fill all vacancies. If the legislature had intended that appointments to fill vacancies should be submitted for confirmation to the board of aldermen, it would doubtless have put in after the word mayor, as it expressly did when providing for the original appointment, "subject to the approval of the board of aldermen." Whether the injunction prayed for was or was not a proper incident of appellant's claim and suit, yet the facts stated in the petition were such as presented a cause of action against appellee, and the demurrer thereto should have been overruled.

The judgment dismissing the petition is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer and for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

RODEMER v. RETTIG, EX'OR, &c.

(Filed January 29, 1903.)

1. Wills—Gifts—R. died testate leaving two grown children, the appellee, Mrs. Rettig, and appellant. After making a devise of $800 she devised the residue of her estate, consisting of money, stock and notes, to her son and daughter. She left a note for $2,000, executed by appellee, payable to the testatrix, but the following words are found in the note: "This note, however, to become null and void on the death of said Barbara Rodemer." It is insisted that this note was a gift to her daughter, Mrs. Rettig. Held—That said note was not valid as a gift inter vivos, as there was no delivery of it or attempt to deliver it to the donee.

2. Overruled cases—McGlasson v. McGlasson's Ex'or, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1843.

Harvey Myers and Bromwell & Bruce for appellant.

H. J. Gausepohl for appellees.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

Barbara Rodemer died testate in Kenton county on April 13, 1899, leaving two grown children, a son and a married daughter, appellant and appellee, Mrs. Rettig. After a special bequest of $300, she disposed of the rest of her estate in the following language, to wit: "All the rest of my estate, consisting of money I hold in building associations, notes, and what moneys I may have at the time of my death, I give, devise and bequeath to my son, August Rodemer, and my daughter, Mary Rettig."

She left personal property, consisting of notes and stock in building associations, other than the note here in controversy, amounting to $2,432.79. The question involved is whether or not a note which the appellee, George Rettig, executed to her is part of her estate. It is as follows:

"$2,000.

Covington, Ky., March 8, 1896.

"One day after date I promise to pay to the order of Barbara Rodemer $2,000, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum.

"This note, however, to become null and void on the death of said Barbara Rodemer.

"No.... Due.....

(Signed) GEO. RETTIG."

She collected the 5 per cent. on the note from the time it was executed until the time of her death, except the interest for the last year. George Rettig executed his note to her for $2,500 for borrowed money, and afterwards paid $500 on it; for the balance of the note he executed the $2,000 note; the $2,000 note remained unpaid at her death, and the payor claims it was a gift to his wife. As an evidence of it he relies upon the terms of the note and other testimony tending to show that she intended her daughter to have it as a gift.

The appellant insists there never was any delivery of the note, and, therefore, it was not a gift inter vivos, while the appellee insists that it was by the terms of the note and that the testimony to which we have alluded shows that it was a gift. It is essential to the validity of a gift inter vivos or causa mortis that there shall be a delivery to the donee and the property or thing given must immediately pass and be irrevocable by the donor. (Duncan v. Duncan, 5 Litt., 12; Walden v. Dixon, 5 Mon., 170; Knott v. Hogan, 4 Met., 102.)

It was held in Payne v. Powell, 5 Bush, 252, that a writing signed by a man purporting to make a gift of his personal estate to his sons is ineffectual, because there was no actual or constructive delivery of either the writing or the property by the donor and no acceptance by the donee. In that case the court held that a transfer by writing alone will not satisfy the requirement of delivery. Mrs. Rodemer retained possession of the note from the time of its execution until the time of her death and controlled it, as evidenced by the fact that she collected the interest thereon annually from the payor. There was no delivery of the note at any time actually, symbolically or otherwise. The note was made payable one day after date, and there was no restriction in its terms that prevented her from compelling payment of it at any time.

Suppose the following language had been endorsed on the back of the note and signed by her, to wit: "This note, however, to become null and void upon my death." It would not have had the effect of preventing her from collecting the note during her lifetime, nor would it have been a delivery of it to the payor: it would have been just as ineffectual from a legal standpoint as if it had been written in the face of the note as was done in this case. The note was given for a valuable consideration.

In the case of Knott v. Hogan, 4 Met., 100, the writing was executed at the time the note for money loaned was executed. It was stipulated that if the payee should not collect the note in her lifetime, her representatives were directed to surrender it to the payor, "as I intend it as a gift from me to him." The court held that it was not a valid gift. It is manifest from this conclusion of the court that the stipulation in the note did not amount to a gift inter vivos, as there was no delivery of the note. It is nothing more than an intention to make a gift.

Counsel for appellee relies upon the cases of Meriwether v. Morrison, 78 Ky., 573; Stephenson's Adm'r v. King, & Co., 81 Ky., 425, and also upon the case of McGlasson v. McGlasson's Ex'or, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1843. The Meriwether case and the Stephenson case do not support counsel's position. In the Meriwether case the donor wrote upon the notes "I transfer the within note as a gift to Miss Agnes Morrison," and handed the notes to his nephew, directing him to put them away and give them to her after his death, and informed Miss Morrison that he had given her the notes. The court held that the jury was authorized to find that there had been an actual delivery of the notes to the nephew as trustee for Miss Morrison. In the Stephenson case the court held that when the donor delivered to the donee a letter containing a full description of her notes and bonds it was a sufficient delivery to make the gift causa mortis. In that case the court regarded that delivery as essential, and held that delivery of the letter was equivalent to a delivery of the notes. The case of McGlasson v. McGlasson's Ex'or does support the contention of counsel for the appellee. The consideration of the note in that case was stipulated to be for certain personal property. It contained this language: "If not paid during the holder's life, Leonard McGlasson, this note is void or not attempted to be collected."

The court seems to hold that as the note was not collected during the lifetime of the payee, it was void, according to the stipulation of the note. No case is cited in support of its conclusion. It is not in accord with the rulings of this court on the question of what acts constitute valid gifts, and it is directly in conflict with Knott v. Hogan.

We are of the opinion that the transaction as to the note did not amount to a gift of it to the daughter of the testatrix, but that it is a part of the estate devised to her son and daughter, and should be treated as an asset of the estate. In so far as the case of McGlasson v. McGlasson's Ex'or is in conflict with this opinion it is overruled.

Judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court sitting.

NELSON BROS. v. CITY OF LEXINGTON.

(Filed January 30, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Municipal taxation—Findings of fact by chancellor—This appeal involves the question as to whether the grain elevator of appellants is without or within the limits of the city for purposes of city taxation, and the determination of this question depends on the true location of a mile stone. Held—That as the proof is conflicting and the chancellor who was on the ground and had a better acquaintance with the witnesses, decided that the elevator was within the city, his finding will not be disturbed.

Breckinridge & Shelby and Nelson & Pendleton for appellants.

W. S. Bronston for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The boundary of the city of Lexington is a circle two miles in diameter, the center being the center of the courthouse.

The contention of appellant is that their "grain elevator" is outside of the city limits, and is not subject to city taxation. They claim that the mile stone, placed by authority of the appellee, was for eighty or one hundred years at a point nearer the courthouse than their elevator, leaving their elevator on the outside of the city limits; and they introduced a great deal of convincing proof to substantiate their claim. On the other hand, the city claims that the stone contended for by appellants is not the true boundary-line stone, and that the true line is 206 feet further from the center of the courthouse than the stone claimed by the appellants.

The proof shows that the point claimed by the city is just one mile from the center of the courthouse. Appellants virtually admit this, but claim that one hundred years or more ago civil engineers and surveyors were not provided with accurate and improved instruments, and that, therefore, they committed an error in ascertaining the boundary, and that by reason thereof the actual boundary was fixed at a point claimed by appellants, and that said error was acquiesced in for eighty or one hundred years, and that the city is estopped from now claiming out to where the true boundary ought to have been established. On the other hand, the city claims that no mistake was made, and that the mile stone was first placed at the point now claimed by the city, and that the earth was washed away and the stone fell down and was removed to the place claimed by appellants. The parties have introduced much proof to sustain their contentions, both oral and written, some of the plats made by civil engineers not being in the record, but we have carefully considered the evidence before us and are left in doubt as to which party is in the right. We feel constrained to support the finding of the chancellor, he having seen and heard the witnesses, and being upon the ground, could better understand the facts as applicable to the real issue.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY OF LEXINGTON, &c. v.
MOORE.

(Filed January 30, 1903.)

Office and officer—Change of salary during term of office—Municipal government—M. was elected treasurer of Lexington, a city of the second class, for a term of four years, as provided by section 3131, Kentucky Statutes, and entered upon the discharge of his duties on January 1, 1900. Section 3225, Kentucky Statutes, provides that the city treasurer shall be treasurer of the board of education, and keep its funds and accounts separate from the funds and accounts of the city. The board of education had no authority to elect or employ a treasurer. Section 3064, Kentucky Statutes, provides that the general council shall fix the salaries of all officers and employees of the city before their election or employment, and their salaries shall not be changed during their term of office. Several months after the induction of the treasurer into office the board of education allowed him a salary or compensation as treasurer of the board of $200 per annum. This action was instituted to test the validity of this action of the board. Held—That M. was, by virtue of his office as treasurer of the city, also ex-officio treasurer of the board of education, therefore, said board had no authority to fix any compensation for his services. M. did not hold two offices. He only held one office, the salary of which had been fixed at $1,800 before his election, and under the statute and section 161 of the Constitution said salary could not be increased or reduced during his term of office.

Morton & Darnall for appellants.

J. Soule Smith, A. M. Baker and L. J. Moore for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

By chapter 89, article 3, Kentucky Statutes, Lexington is designated as a city of the second class. Section 3212 of the statute provides for the maintenance of a system of public schools in that city under the control of a board, to be styled the "board of education," consisting of two trustees from each ward of the city, and the appellant board of education was created in this way. The board of education by section 3314 is given control of all the funds that are dedicated to the use of the public schools of the city, and the title to all property, real and personal, in the city used as public school property.

Section 3225 directs that "the treasurer of the city shall be treasurer of the said board of education, and as such shall keep separate and distinct from all other funds all moneys, bonds and securities belonging to, or which may hereafter be dedicated or set apart for, public schools, and shall pay out or deliver any of said funds, bonds or securities upon the warrant of said clerk and approved by the president of the board of education, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by said board."

Section 3131 provides for the election of the treasurer by the qualified voters of the city, and prescribes the qualifications of such treasurer, and section 3132 provides that "the treasurer shall give such bond and receive such salary as the general council shall, by ordinance, provide." Section 3064 declares that "the general council, unless otherwise provided by law, shall fix the salary and compensation and prescribe the duties of all officers, deputies and employes of the city, except as to the officers in office when this act takes effect. Such salary shall be fixed before their election or employment, and the salary of no city officer, deputy or employe when so fixed shall be changed after his election, employment or appointment during his term of office or employment."

The appellant, M. Kaufman, was in November, 1899, duly elected treasurer of the city of Lexington by the voters thereof, for a term of four years, beginning January 1, 1900, and on the last-named date he executed bond, took the oath required by law, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office of treasurer, his salary as such treasurer having theretofore been fixed at $1,800 per annum by ordinance adopted by the general council of the city. From and after his induction into office Kaufman received, as treasurer, the funds under the control of the board of education that were dedicated to school purposes.

On June 4, 1900, and several months after the election and qualification of Kaufman as treasurer, the board of education, by a vote of a majority of its members, allowed him a salary or compensation for his services rendered, and to be rendered, as such treasurer of $200 per annum, and soon thereafter $100 of the salary thus allowed was paid him by the board of education. After the allowance of salary and the payment of $100 to Kaufman by the board of education, appellee, L. J. Moore, a citizen, resident and taxpayer of the city of Lexington, brought suit in the Fayette Circuit Court against appellants, Kaufman and "board of education," seeking a cancellation of the resolution allowing the salary of $200 per annum to the former, and praying that the latter be enjoined from paying him any further sum of the salary allowed. Demurrers were filed by appellants to the petition and overruled. Kaufman then filed answer, in which he in substance averred that by section 3225 of the statute supra he was required, as treasurer, to keep, and did keep, separate and distinct from all other funds, all moneys, bonds and securities dedicated to the use of the public schools of the city, which came into his hands, and that the city council of Lexington in fixing his salary at $1,800 per annum did so without having in contemplation the services he would be required to render to the board of education as treasurer; and further, that the board of education had the right, in the exercise of the power and discretion conferred upon it by law, to make the appropriation in question by way of salary, or compensation to him for the alleged extra services rendered by him as its treasurer.

Appellee filed a demurrer to the answer, which was sustained by the court. Kaufman failing to plead further, and no answer having been filed by the board of education, the lower court thereupon rendered judgment granting the prayer of the petition. To this judgment appellants excepted, hence this appeal.

We are of the opinion that the judgment was proper. Section 161 of the Constitution provides that "the compensation of any city, town or municipal officer shall not be changed after his election, or appointment, or during his term of office." Besides, we find that section 3064 of the statute supra expressly declares that the general council of the city shall fix the salaries of all the city officers before their election or appointment, and the "salaries of no city officer, deputy or employe when so fixed shall be changed after his election, appointment or employment, during his term of office or employment."

The statute (section 3225) requires Kaufman, as treasurer of the city, to act as treasurer for the board of education. Whatever services he performed for it in this capacity were not rendered by reason of any employment from it, for the board had no authority under the statute creating it to employ a treasurer. Kaufman does not hold two offices, for performing the duties of which he may receive two salaries, but only one office, the salary of which ($1,800) is paid by the city of Lexington. In other words, by virtue of his election as treasurer of the city of Lexington he became and is ex-officio treasurer of the board of education.

The law applicable to this case was, we think, correctly announced by this court in Jefferson County v. Waters, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 816. Walters was reasurer of Jefferson county. Before his election the salary of that office was fixed at $1,000, the county furnishing his office, fuel, lights and janitor service. Waters presented a petition to the fiscal court, asking for and obtained an additional allowance of $1,000 as expenses to be paid annually. From this allowance the county appealed to the circuit court. In that court an amended petition was filed, which set out substantially these facts, viz.: "That when appellee was elected county treasurer, and when the salary was fixed by the fiscal court at $1,000, it was thought that under the law the county levy did not extend over property in the city of Louisville, but only reached property outside of Louisville, and that since appellee's election, and since the salary was fixed at $1,000, it had been legally determined that the county levy extended over all the property in the county, including that in the city, and that this decision added to the amount of money coming into his hands by about $140,000, and that the duty of accounting for this additional sum was not intended to be covered by the salary of $1,000 fixed."

Upon appeal to this court the judgment of the circuit court, approving the allowance made by the fiscal court to Waters, was reversed, this court holding that under section 161 of the Constitution, and section 934 of the Kentucky Statutes, the compensation of the county treasurer can not be increased during his term of office, and that the allowance made was an evasion of the constitutional inhibition. The same doctrine was announced by this court in Commonwealth v. Carter, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1509, and also in Morgantown Bank v. Johnson, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 210.

Other decisions of this court might be cited in support of this view, but we deem it unnecessary to do so. Clearly the allowance of $200 per annum to Kaufman by the board of education was violative of section 161 of the Constitution, and of the provisions of section 3064 of the statute supra, as it was a change and increase of his salary as treasurer made after his election and during his term of office as such.

Judgment affirmed.

PAUL v. WETLAUF, &c.

(Filed January 30, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Appeals—Final order—On this appeal appellant complains of an order entered in the lower court confirming the report of the master commissioner, which disallowed his claims. Held—That as there had only been an order confirming the report of the commissioner, it was not a final order and no appeal lies from it.

Chas. Richle and John B. Phipps for appellant.

Kohn, Baird & Spindle for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In May, 1898, the executor of Fred Weitlauf instituted a suit in the Jefferson Circuit Court for a settlement of his estate, and referred the case to the master commissioner to ascertain and report claim against the estate of testator. John M. Paul filed with the master commissioner two accounts against the estate, aggregating $469.80, which were numbered by the commissioner "13" and "14." In February, 1899, the commissioner filed a report disallowing these claims by their numbers on the proof attached thereto. No exceptions were filed to the action of the master commissioner by Paul, and the commissioner's report was confirmed on the 28d day of May, 1899. On the 10th day of May, 1900, Paul appeared in court and filed his affidavit, in which he says that he forwarded his claims to his attorney in Louisville, to be filed against the estate of decedent, and supposed that he was attending to the matter; and that he had only recently learned that the commissioner had disallowed them on his own motion, without exceptions having been filed thereto, and asked that the order confirming the report, in so far as his claims were concerned, might be set aside, and an order was entered to that effect. But on the 22d day of May, 1900, the chancellor set aside the order made at the instance of Paul, and from this last order this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant only brings a small portion of the record up to this court, from which it is impossible for us to determine what the merits of his claim are, or what relief he is entitled to. An order confirming a commissioner's report is merely interlocutory, subject to revision and correction upon final judgment, and from which no appeal lies. (Adkisson v. Dent, &c., 88 Ky., 628.) The record does not disclose any judgment of distribution by the lower court.

In the condition of the record there is nothing for us to do but to dismiss the appeal without prejudice, and it is so ordered.

BLUE, &c. v. WATERS.

(Filed January 30, 1903.)

Infants—Partition of lands—Joint tenants—This appeal involves the sufficiency of title to two lots of land proposed to be conveyed by appellant, which was allotted to her in a partition proceeding dividing the estate of her mother. The mother made a will, devising her estate to her children, appellant being one. After the making of the will, but before the death of the testatrix, a daughter died, leaving her husband and two infant children surviving her, both of whom were under fourteen years of age. The testatrix left land and money to be divided. A suit was instituted for a valuation and division between the joint tenants of the lands and a division of the money to equalize the beneficiaries. The two infants and their father, who was their statutory guardian, were named as defendants in the partition proceeding, but the infants being nonresidents, were not brought before the court by constructive service. The guardian filed an answer for them, agreeing to the allotment. It is urged that the title of appellant to the lots in question is invalid on account of the infants not having been properly brought before the court. The infants were brought before the court by constructive service in this action for specific performance, and their guardian filed an answer for them approving the allotment. Held—That under section 499, Civil Code of Practice, providing for partition of lands, the infants were necessary parties, either as plaintiffs or defendants, and the answer of their guardian approving the division was insufficient to cure the defect. There should be proof showing that said division was advantageous to said infants, and that proof can be made in this action.

Oliver H. Stratton and A. E. Willson for appellants.

J. B. McCormick for appellants E. W. and W. R. Blue.

C. H. Shield for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

We are asked on this appeal to pass upon the sufficiency of the title of appellant, Elizabeth Weller Blue, to two lots, situated on Indiana avenue, in the city of Louisville, which were allotted to her in the division of the estate of her mother, Sarah Weller, and which she has contracted to sell to the appellee, Rebecca Maney Waters. Sarah B. Weller by will, which was duly probated in the Jefferson County Court on the 18th day of July, 1900, after making provision for the payment of her debts, devised all the rest of her estate of every kind and description to her seven children, George P. Weller, Laura A. Sullivan, Elizabeth W. Blue, Mary B. Coldewey, John C. Weller, W. L. Weller and R. L. Weller, equally. After the execution of the will, and before the death of Sarah B. Weller, her daughter, Mary B. Coldewey, died, leaving surviving her her husband, William Coldewey, and two sons, Bernhard and Anton Weller Coldewey, who were infants under fourteen years of age. Her sons, John C. and George P. Weller, were appointed executors of the will. On the 3d day of December, 1900, the executors instituted a suit in equity in the Jefferson Circuit Court, making the other children and W. G. Coldewey, the father and statutory guardian of his infant children, defendants, in which they alleged that testatrix was at her death the owner of a number of separate parcels of real estate in the city of Louisville, which were specifically described, and the title to which at her death vested in her children and grandchildren as joint tenants; that after the payment of the debts there remained $38,809.60 in their hands, the proceeds of the personal estate, and a mortgage note for $2,750, and asked that the entire real property owned by the testatrix should be divided between the four adult defendants and the two infants; and that they should be permitted to retain in money their entire interest in the estate, and to this end asked the court to appoint three commissioners to value and divide the real estate among the defendants, and to report the sum required in cash to make the plaintiffs and defendants equal in the aggregate value of the estate received by them. The estate of the testatrix was divided in this proceeding in accordance with the prayer of the executors, the real estate and mortgage note being valued by the commissioner at $29,750. The real estate allotted to Mrs. Sullivan was valued at $6,800, and each of the other defendants, in addition to the real estate allotted to them, received in cash a sufficient amount to make their interest equal to the valuation placed on the realty allotted to Mrs. Sullivan. The infants, Anton W. and Bernard Coldewey, who were not made parties to the proceeding, received, in addition to certain specific real estate, $450, the plaintiffs, John C. and S. P. Weller, were adjudged $4,800 from the cash in their hands, and the balance of it was divided equally amongst the heirs. The lots in this controversy on Indiana avenue were allotted to E. W. Blue, who sold them to the appellee, Rebecca Mary Waters, on the 3d day of March, 1903, and who refused to accept the pay for them. Appellants thereupon instituted this suit for the specific enforcement of the contract of sale.

Appellee defended on the ground that the infants not being parties to the partition suit, were not divested by the judgment in that proceeding of their title to the lots, and made her answer a cross petition against the infants and their statutory guardian, whom she alleged were nonresidents of the State, and asked that a warning order be issued notifying them of the proceeding. W. G. Coldewey filed an answer as statutory guardian, in which he says that the interest of his wards was promoted by the allotment of the real estate to them instead of money, and asked that the partition made in the former proceeding be approved and confirmed. Upon final submission the chancellor held that the title was not good, and dismissed her petition, and to reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The effect of the judgment in the partition suit was to invest a considerable proportion of the personal estate of the infants in realty. Section 499 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "A person desiring a division of land held jointly with others, or an allotment of dower, may file in the circuit court of the county in which the land, or a greater part thereof, lies a petition containing a description of the land and statement of those having an interest in it, and the amount of such interest, with prayer for the division and allotment, and thereupon all persons interested in the property who have not united in the petition shall be summoned to answer on the first day of the next term of the court.

"2d. The statutory guardian of an infant, committee of a person of unsound mind, and husband of a married woman, may unite in the petition in the names of and in conjunction with such infant, person of unsound mind, or married woman, and if the petition be against an infant, person of unsound mind, or married woman, the guardian, committee, or husband, may appear and defend for them. If they fail to do so, the court shall appoint a discreet person for that purpose."

These sections of the Code clearly contemplate that in a suit for the partition of real estate held jointly by infants and adults that the infants shall be parties to the proceeding, either as plaintiffs or defendants, in order to divest them of title. As they were not parties to the original suit filed by the executors against the other heirs and their father and statutory guardian, the judgment of partition in that proceeding was ineffectual to pass their title to the real estate. But in this proceeding they were made defendants to the cross petition of the defendant, Waters, and are before the court by constructive service of process, and their father, as statutory guardian, has filed an answer, in which he says that the partition of the real estate in the old suit was fair and advantageous to his wards, and that the investment of a part of their money in real estate was advantageous and beneficial to them. If this answer had been supplemented by other proof showing that the partition was fair and the investment of the money of the infants was judicious and advantageous to them, the chancellor would have been justified in approving the partition in the old suit. In the case of the Kentucky Union Land Co. v. Elliott, 12 Ky. Law Rep., 812, it was held that whilst infants were necessary parties to an action for partition of land held by them as joint tenants, and that a judgment of partition in a suit to which they were not parties was erroneous, that their statutory guardian, after they had been brought before the court, might in open court adopt the report if the partition was equal and just. We think that the necessary proof showing these facts can be made in this case without resorting to a new suit for that purpose.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for additional proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MO KAY v. CITY OF HENDERSON.

(Filed January 29, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Location of smallpox pesthouse—Pleading—Appellant brought this action for damages sustained by reason of the location by the city of its pesthouse near his farm, and within one-half mile of the city limits, in violation of section 3909, Kentucky Statutes. In his petition he alleged that he had occupied, for several years, a farm containing about sixteen acres, which he cultivated in fruit and vegetables, and that the city sent smallpox patients to the pesthouse, located near him, which prevented the plaintiff from getting hands, from cultivating and gathering or marketing his said vegetables and fruit, and secluded himself and family from communicating with other persons, and by reason thereof was damaged in the sum of $500. The city filed its answer, which was merely a traverse of the petition. To this the plaintiff filed a reply which was not in avoidance of anything in the answer. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition and reply, which the court sustained, and dismissed the action. Held—That as the reply contained new matter which should have been in the petition the demurrer to it was properly sustained. The damages sustained were not the proximate result from the acts of the city, and it is not shown that the city caused the inconvenience complained of.

Montgomery Merritt for appellant.

John F. Lockett for appellee.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant brought this suit against appellee to recover damages by reason.

of the location of its pesthouse. The city filed its answer, which was merely a traverse of the petition. To this the plaintiff filed a reply, setting out new matter, which was not in avoidance of anything in the answer. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition and reply, which the court sustained, and dismissed the action. As the matter in the reply was not in avoidance of anything in the answer, but was simply new matter, which should have been put in an amended petition, the court properly sustained a demurrer to the reply. The sufficiency of the petition is a matter of more difficulty. It is there alleged that the plaintiff resided for several years before it was filed within one-half mile of the lower boundary line of the city on the farm of one Annie B. Norris, containing about sixteen acres, which he cultivated in fruit and vegetables; that the city maintained its pesthouse near his said residence and within one-half mile of the city limits, in violation of section 3909, Kentucky Statutes. The petition then read as follows: "That they, in the month of April and May, 1895, sent to and kept at said pesthouse persons affected with smallpox, which prevented the plaintiff from getting hands; from cultivating and gathering or marketing his said vegetables and fruit, and secluded himself and family from communicating with other persons, and by reason thereof he was damaged in the sum of $500."

In Clayton v. City of Henderson, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 383, it was held that the pesthouse having been located where it was in violation of the statute, one who lived nearby, and so took the smallpox, might recover damages therefor. (Also City of Henderson v. O'Halloran, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 995.) But the plaintiff does not bring himself within the rule thus laid down, as it will be observed that it is not charged that he or any of his family took the smallpox. The charge is in substance that by reason of the location of the pesthouse, and the keeping of persons there affected with smallpox, the plaintiff was prevented from getting hands or cultivating or gathering or marketing his vegetables or fruit, and that he and his family were secluded from communicating with other persons. Only the proximate damages for a wrong can be recovered. It is not shown in the petition that the persons who refused to work for the plaintiff had any well-grounded apprehension of taking the smallpox, if they did work for him. So far as appears their course may have been entirely groundless. The same is true of the seclusion of the plaintiff and his family from communicating with other persons. The petition shows no pecuniary loss directly to the plaintiff from the pesthouse. The things relied on seem to have come entirely from the acts of others, and there is nothing in the petition to make the city responsible for the conduct of people not controlled by it, or, so far as appears, having any reason to act as they did from what the city had done. In 1 Sedgewick on Damages, section 129, it is said: "The true test would seem to be whether the action of the intervening agency was such as was to be expected to happen upon the defendant's act; and if it were so to be expected the result is not remote. In the case of a human agency, the intervention will generally be of a sort not to be expected. But where the intervention was directly and naturally induced by the defendant's act, the consequence is not remote, though the intervening agency was human."

Under this rule it seems to us that the allegations of the petition were insufficient, and that the demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

EDGAR ALEXANDER AND EDGAR ALEXANDER, ADM'R OF ARTIE ALEXANDER v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF HARRODSBURG AND MERCER NATIONAL BANK OF HARRODSBURG, KY.

ALEXANDER v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF HARRODSBURG, KY.

SAME v. MERCER NATIONAL BANK OF HARRODSBURG, Ky.

(Filed February 3, 1903.)

Usury—Interest—Sureties—Bills and notes—Novation—The principal in notes having died, it was found that his estate would pay only about 70 per cent. of his indebtedness. It was agreed that his brother, a surety, should take the land belonging to decedent at a fixed price, and that the banks, which were principal creditors, should loan to his sureties enough money to pay the 70 per cent. of the indebtedness besides a sufficient sum to pay the balance owing by the sureties, and that the sureties in order to secure these loans should mortgage to the banks the lands received from decedent together with other lands. The original notes to the banks, as also the new notes, bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent. These notes were renewed from time to time, and suit was brought on them. Personal judgments were sought and an enforcement of the mortgage liens on the land. The defendants were not ready to file their answers at the first term of court, and in consideration of further time being given them until the February term they paid the banks interest on the notes sued on to February 10. The answer to the petition of the First National Bank denies the amount of its claim, and in the second paragraph alleges that the note carries with it a large amount of usurious interest, and asks that the entire interest from the date of the first notes executed by the original debtor to the bank be forfeited. A similar answer was filed to the cross petition of the Mercer National Bank. While this suit was pending E., the brother of the original debtor, filed a separate suit against each of the banks, in which he sought to recover double the amount of interest paid within two years. His suit against the First National Bank was dismissed. He recovered judgment against the Mercer National Bank for double the amount of interest paid within two years. In the suit of the banks against him they were given judgment for the amount of their debts without interest prior to the institution of their suits, and a decree directing a sale of lands to satisfy the mortgage debts. Appeals have been prosecuted from said judgments. The sister of the original debtor, who was one of his sureties, died pending the litigation, and E. qualified as her administrator. Held—That the amount of money paid to the banks after suit for indulgence until the next term of court to enable defendants to present their answers were not payments of usury. Such agreements, made in good faith, are upheld by the courts. The claim of E. against the First National Bank for double the amount of payments of interest should have been allowed as the proof sustains same. The testimony of the bank president as to statements of the deceased sister was incompetent to affect the claim of E. E. is not entitled to have the usurious interest paid on notes during the lifetime of the original debtor credited on the debts, as the arrangement entered into by which E. bought the debtor's land, and he and his sister borrowed the money to pay off the debts, was a satisfaction of the original debtor's liability, and, therefore, the interest can not be forfeited as the subsequent notes were not renewals of the original debts.

Gaither & Vanarsdall for appellants.

W. Lawson Sumrall for appellee Mercer National Bank.

T. H. Hardin for appellee First National Bank.

Appeals from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This appeal is from a judgment of the Mercer Circuit Court rendered in three cases, which were consolidated and heard together. A summary statement of the facts out of which the litigation grew is necessary for the proper understanding of the questions of law which we are asked to decide. On the 9th day of July, 1893, T. F. Alexander executed a note to the First National Bank of Harrodsburg for $2,000, due on the 12th of January, 1894, which the appellants, Ed. Alexander and his sister, Artie Alexander, signed as his securities. On the 13th of September, 1893, he executed his note to the same bank with the same securities, due on the 16th of December, 1893, for $6,728.09. This latter note was taken up by the execution of a thirty-day note by the same parties for $6,777.42, and which matured on the 19th day of January, 1894. At this latter date T. F. Alexander executed his note to the bank for $8,768.34, due seven months after date, with his brother, Ed. Alexander, and his sister, Artie Alexander, and James L. Bond as securities. The proceeds of this note were applied to pay off the balance due upon the $2,000 note, dated on the 9th of July, 1893, and the $6,777.45 note dated the 16th of December, 1893. All these various notes bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent., and the accumulated interest was added to the principal at the date of each renewal. On the 6th day of April, 1894, Thomas F. Alexander executed his note to the Mercer National Bank for $4,868.25, due six months after date, with Artie Alexander, Ed. Alexander and James L. Bond as his securities. The net proceeds of this note, $4,200, was put to the credit of T. F. Alexander, a discount of $168.25 being reserved as interest at the rate of 8 per cent.

Thomas F. Alexander died intestate on the 15th of April, 1894, before the maturity of either of the debts to the banks, and his sister and security, Artie Alexander, qualified as his administrator. It was developed after his death that his estate was insolvent, and his heirs at law, with a view of facilitating the settlement of his estate and saving his sister, Artie Alexander, from loss so far as possible because of the various liabilities incurred by her as surety for her brother, sold and conveyed to her in fee all their interest in his estate, real and personal. His realty consisted of a tract of land in Mercer county, containing 220 acres. It was ascertained prior to the 28d of April, 1895, that after reducing to cash all the available personal estate of decedent and selling the 220 acres of land belonging to T. F. Alexander for $40 per acre that his estate would pay 70 per cent. of his debts, and on that day a consultation was had between the administrator, Artie Alexander and the appellant, Edgar Alexander, and their attorney on one side, and the officers of the First National Bank and the Mercer National Bank, their principal creditors, at which it was agreed that the appellant, Edgar Alexander, should purchase the 220 acres of land at $40 an acre, amounting to $8,800; and that the two banks would loan him enough money to pay 70 per cent. of the indebtedness of T. F. Alexander and also a sufficient sum to pay the overplus of his indebtedness, which would fall upon Edgar Alexander and his sister Artie. To carry out this agreement the First National Bank loaned to Ed. Alexander on that day $8,507.36, on which interest was charged at the rate of 8 per cent., and a note was taken therefor, due six months after date, for $8,847.95, and the Mercer National Bank on the same day advanced to him $4,195.45, taking a note therefor, due six months after date, for $4,306.22, on which interest was charged at the rate of 8 per cent. Seventy per cent. of this money was paid over to Artie Alexander, administrator, by Edgar Alexander, and was by her applied to the indebtedness of T. F. Alexander, the balance of the money was used by Ed. Alexander to pay the overplus due the respective banks by his sister and himself as securities thereon. To secure the payment of this note, so executed to the banks, Edgar Alexander and his sister, Artie Alexander, executed a mortgage on several tracts of land, including that which had formerly belonged to the estate of Thomas F. Alexander.

The note to the First National Bank was renewed on the 26th day of October, 1895, by Ed. and Artie Alexander by the execution of a new note for $9,201.82, due on the 29th of April, 1896, interest being added at the rate of 8 per cent., and was again renewed by the execution of a note for $9,569.89, due six months after date. On the 1st of November, 1896, this note was renewed by the execution of a note for $9,752.88, due six months after date. On the 4th day of May, 1897, this note was renewed by the execution of a new note for $9,752.88, due six months after date. At this time Ed. Alexander paid to the bank $390.12, as interest at the rate of 8 per cent., by his check on the Boyle National Bank, and on the 7th of November, 1897, this note was renewed by the execution of a new note to the bank for the same amount due six months after date, interest on this note at the rate of 8 per cent. being paid to the bank by the check of Ed. Alexander on the Boyle National Bank for $390.12.

On the 3d of September, 1898, the appellee, the First National Bank of Harrodsburg, instituted this suit, asking a personal judgment on the last renewal of their debt and for an enforcement of the mortgage lien executed to them on the 28d of April, 1895, jointly with the Mercer National Bank. The Mercer National Bank was made a defendant, and on the same day filed its answer, which was made a cross petition against its co-defendants, Artie and Edgar Alexander, in which they set up their note dated November 9, 1897, for $4,721, which they allege was a renewal of the note executed on the 28d of April, 1895, and ask a personal judgment against Edgar and Artie Alexander, and joined in the prayer for an enforcement of the mortgage. The defendants were not prepared to file their answers to the petition and cross petition at the following October term of court, and in consideration of the continuance of the cause to the next term of the court, which began in February, 1899, and an extension of time to file their answer until the fourth day of that term, they paid to the banks interest on the notes sued on to February 10, 1899, at the rate of 6 per cent. The amount paid to the First National Bank under this agreement was $488.87, and to the Mercer National Bank $211.14. In January, 1899, before the expiration of the time given to the defendants to answer, Artie Alexander died, and shortly after her death the co-defendant, Ed. Alexander, qualified as her administrator, and the action was, by consent, revived against him as administrator.

The answer of appellants to the petition of the First National Bank denies the amount of his claim, and in the second paragraph alleges that the obligation sued on carried with it a large amount of usurious interest, and they ask the forfeiture of the entire interest from the date of the first note executed by T. F. Alexander to the bank, under sections 5197 and 5198 of the United States Revised Statutes. A similar answer was filed to the cross petition of the Mercer National Bank, and while this suit was pending, the appellant, Edgar Alexander, on the 20th of January, 1899, filed a separate suit against each of the banks, in which he sought to recover double the amount of interest paid on his indebtedness to them within two years prior to the institution of the suits. His petition against the First National Bank covers the following alleged payments of interest on the debt sued on :

To amount paid as interest at 8 per cent., May 25, 1897.....	$390 11
To amount paid as interest at 8 per cent., December 27, 1897.....	390 12
To amount paid October 26, 1898.....	488 87
Total.....	$1,219 10

The claim against the Mercer National Bank on this score is as follows:

To amount paid as interest May 27, 1897, at 8 per cent .....	$109 89
To amount paid December 24, 1897.....	190 28
To amount paid October 26, 1898.....	211 14
Total.....	$517 28

The issues were made up in the three cases and they were consolidated, and the proof taken in the consolidated actions and final judgment rendered in all the cases in February, 1901. The suit of Edgar Alexander v. First National Bank was dismissed. In his suit against the Mercer National Bank he was given a judgment for $376.46, being double the amount paid as interest on the 24th of December, 1897. In the suit of the banks against Edgar Alexander they were given judgment for the amount loaned by them on the 28d day of April, 1895, without interest prior to the institution of their respective suits, and a decree of foreclosure directing the sale of the mortgaged lands entered. From that judgment Edgar Alexander and Edgar Alexander, administrator of Artie Alexander, deceased, have appealed.

They insist that under the proof they are entitled to a judgment against the First National Bank for $2,880.20, double the amount of interest paid within two years from the institution of their suit; also that he was not given a judgment against the Mercer National Bank for the full amount sued for. And in the case of the banks against him he complains that the judgments did not give him a credit for all the interest which accrued upon the original loans of T. F. Alexander to the banks prior to the execution of the notes by him and his sister on the 28d of April, 1895.

Nearly all the questions of law involved upon this appeal have been passed upon by this court in the recent cases of the Second National Bank of Richmond v. Fitzpatrick and the Citizens National Bank of Danville v. Farmer's Ass'ee, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 618. It will, therefore, only be necessary for us to apply the law as determined in these cases to the facts as developed by the proof in these consolidated actions. We will first consider the questions involved in the suit by Alexander against the two banks to recover double the amount of interest paid. The money paid to the banks by the appellant on October 26, 1898, can in no sense be regarded as a payment of usury. Appellees were entitled at that term of the court to a judgment by default for their respective demands or that the issues should be made up by answer. To prevent this, and secure time for the preparation of their defense, appellants paid a stipulated sum, which was in fact 6 per cent. interest upon the principal of the respective debts sued on. Courts will not permit agreements of this character made in good faith to become the basis of a claim for double the amount so paid as a penalty under the statute, and, in our opinion, the trial court properly refused to so treat these payments. The $109.89 paid to the Mercer National Bank on the 27th of May, 1897, was less than interest at the rate of 6 per cent. for the time covered upon the debt, and consequently did not contain usury for which a suit can be maintained under the statute.

We will not consider the claim of appellant for double the amount of interest paid to the First National Bank. He testifies unequivocally that on the 25th of May and 27th of December, 1897, at the dates of the renewal of his debt to the bank, that he actually paid the interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. by checks drawn on the Boyle National Bank, and these checks are filed as exhibits with his deposition. The president of the bank admits the receipt of these two sums of money, and that they were paid as interest, but seeks to escape liability under the statute on the ground that Artie Alexander in her lifetime informed him that she was jointly bound for the obligation sued on with the appellant, Edgar Alexander; that she furnished to Edgar Alexander one-half the money which went to make up the respective checks. It was not competent for the appellee's president to testify to oral statement made to him by Artie Alexander after her death as to what proportion of these payments were furnished by her, and even if competent, it is not enough to outweigh the testimony on this point in favor of the appellant. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the appellant, Alexander, was entitled to a judgment in his suit against the First National Bank for twice the amount of these payments, which amounts to $1,560 44, and that their note against him should have been credited with this sum as of the date of the institution of the suit.

We now come to appellant's claim to have the obligations due the banks purged of all the interest which accumulated during the lifetime of T. F. Alexander on his debts to them. This contention is made upon the theory that the obligations executed on the 23d of April, 1895, by Edgar and Artie Alexander were mere renewals of the existing indebtedness of T. F. Alexander, deceased, to the banks as of that date. Appellees, on the other hand, insisted that the transaction of that date resulted in the total extinguishment of the indebtedness of T. F. Alexander, and the loan to appellant was a new transaction. The evidence of every witness who has testified as to what took place between the parties on that day, except the appellant, Edgar Alexander, is to the effect that it was the intention of all parties that the indebtedness of T. F. Alexander should be paid and his estate finally settled. He had been dead more than a year, and his creditors were importunate for the payment of their respective debts. It was made manifest that his estate was insolvent, and that his unsecured creditors would only realize 70 per cent. of their indebtedness if the estate was settled out of court in the most economical way. It was, therefore, agreed that appellant should take the land of T. F. Alexander at $40 per acre, the personal estate had already been reduced to cash, and it was easy to determine what the estate would pay. To save the cost of a settlement in court the sale to Edgar Alexander was agreed to, and to enable him to pay for the land, and to consummate the agreement with the creditors, the appellee banks consented to loan him a sufficient sum of money to make the deal successful. They surrendered as of that date their old obligation on which James L. Bond was bound as security; they gave up all claim against the estate of T. L. Alexander, and loaned the money solely upon the credit of appellant and his sister, with the mortgage upon their lands, including that purchased from the estate of T. F. Alexander. We think that there can be no doubt that on the 23d of April, 1895, the administrator of T. F. Alexander could have, under the Federal statute, required the banks to accept the principal of the indebtedness of T. F. Alexander in payment of their debt; and that after payment they might have maintained a suit for double penalty. But having elected to pursue a different course, they can not at this late day in this transaction be permitted to treat the obligation sued on as mere renewals by the security of the debts due the banks by T. F. Alexander. We, therefore, conclude that the chancellor properly denied appellant this relief.

For reasons indicated the judgment in the case of Edgar Alexander v. The First National Bank, and the First National Bank v. Edgar Alexander, &c., are reversed. The case of Edgar Alexander v. The Mercer National Bank, and the Mercer National Bank v. Edgar Alexander on cross petition are affirmed, and the several causes remanded to the trial court for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE v. GLEASON, &c.

Street improvements—Payment—Statute of Limitation—Appellee G. was a contractor for the construction of a section of Highland avenue, and brought an action on apportionment warrants against abutting property owners to recover the price of the construction. This court decided that the property owners were not liable on said warrants as the improvement was not original construction, but reconstruction, for which the city alone is liable. Several of the property holders pending the litigation paid to the contractor the amounts due on their warrants under an agreement that should it be determined that they were not liable on same, said amounts should be returned. On the trial below, in which the contractor sought to recover the amounts due from the city for the benefit of the property holders who had paid him, the city claims that it had paid said indebtedness, and no recovery could be had for the further reason that the proof did not authorize a recovery. Held—That under section 2838, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that in all actions to enforce liens a copy of the ordinance authorizing the improvement, a copy of the contract therefor, and a copy of the apportionment, each attested by the comptroller, should be prima facie evidence of the validity of the claim. This proof having been made, it devolved on appellant to defeat the claim. Appellant can not claim that the payment to the contractor under a special agreement for refunding same enured to its benefit, as none of these payments were made on behalf of the city.

2. Statute of limitation—The contract being in writing, an action to enforce payment of the contract price will not be barred until after fifteen years. It is not a liability created by statute which would be barred after five years.

H. L. Stone for appellant.

Lane & Harrison for appellees.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This is the third appeal of this case. (106 Ky., 125; 22 Ky. Law. Rep., 1660.)

Appellant Gleason, contractor, entered into a contract with the city of Louisville for the construction of the section of Highland avenue between Broadway and Everett streets, under the ordinance passed by the city council and approved by the mayor on the 6th of April, 1894. This suit was brought by the contractor upon apportionment warrants issued to him under the ordinance and contract mentioned, against the abutting property holders and the city of Louisville, in which the contractor sought to enforce his liens upon the abutting property, provided the court should adjudge it liable therefor, and seeking to recover against the city for the contract price for the work in the event the abutting properties were not liable.

In the appeal last decided (22 Ky. Law Rep., 1660) it was held that this work was not an original construction, such as under the statute governing cities of the first class could be made and charged against abutting properties, but that it was a reconstruction for which the city alone was liable. Among the property holders whose property was affected, and who were proceeded against in this suit, were Kate L. VanCleave, against whom an apportionment warrant had been issued for her portion of the improvement for $127.65. J. W. VanCleave, $150.77, and $56.39; Sarah L. Caron, $179.48; C. T. Dearing, $84.89; Elizabeth Paul, $29.84; Ernest Mennebrocker, $2.02. The total contract price for the work done under this contract was $3,442.61. After the institution of the suit against all the property holders and the city, including those named above, the parties just named, to clear their properties of the cloud and apparent lien against their title created by the litigation, agreed to and did pay to the contractor, Gleason, the respective amounts claimed against them, under an agreement with Gleason that if in that action it should finally be determined that the property holders were liable under the ordinance and contract for the assessment, these payments should operate as their discharge; but that if it should be held by the courts that the property holders were not liable, then the contractor would repay to these parties the said sums respectively, with interest. These facts were set up in this action by an amended petition, filed May 11, 1900, and the suit progressed for the recovery of the remainder of the contract price of $3,442.61. Upon final hearing the circuit court adjudged, and that was affirmed upon appeal, that under the statute property holders were not liable, nor was their property, for any part of this sum, but that the city alone was liable therefor.

At the close of that judgment was this reservation: "It is further considered by the court that this action is retained upon the petition of the plaintiff to recover of the city of Louisville all sums and warrants paid to him by persons against whom warrants were issued therefor by the city of Louisville in favor of said plaintiff on the issues as made by and between the plaintiff and the city of Louisville thereon."

Not until after the affirmance of the judgment against the city on the last appeal did it attempt to controvert the allegations of the amended petition just referred to. After the affirmance it filed an answer, in which it denied the averments of the amended petition, that Gleason, the contractor, had agreed with the respective property holders named to refund to them the sums so paid by them, and denied that the said sums were paid under the agreement alleged. In the second paragraph it pleaded that since the affirmance of the judgment against it it had fully paid the same to the plaintiff. In the third paragraph it pleaded that a summons had not been issued upon either the original or the amended petition against any of the parties whose names are set out above, and that summons had not been issued against the city in said action until more than five years after the plaintiff's cause of action accrued as against said parties respectively and as against the city, and the five years' statute of limitation was pleaded and relied upon. A demurrer was interposed to this last paragraph. The cause was submitted and decided without proof. The judgment of the court was in favor of the plaintiff, Gleason, against the city for the aggregate of the sums represented by the apportionment warrants issued against VanCleave and others above named, aggregating $600.70 (so recited in the judgment). From that judgment the city has appealed. Copies of the ordinance, contract and apportionment, as provided for in section 2838 of Kentucky Statutes, were on file in the action.

The issues thus presented by the record are as follows: Plaintiff asserted that he had performed the labor mentioned under a written contract with the city, the contract price of which was $3,442.61. The contract was admitted, as was the performance of the labor, and the price. It was also admitted that the city had paid the plaintiff the amount of the judgment last appealed from, which was all of the contract price except that reserved by the judgment and represented by the apportionment warrants of VanCleave and others set out above. As to this sum the plaintiff pleaded as special matter that he had released the property owners under an agreement with them that he would reimburse the sums paid by him for the release if it should finally be determined that the improvement was not one for which the property was liable. The city did not deny the consideration for this agreement, but denied the special arrangement to reimburse the lot owners. Under section 2838, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that in all actions to enforce liens a copy of the ordinance authorizing the improvements or work, a copy of the contract therefor, and a copy of the apportionment, each attested by the comptroller, should be prima facie evidence of the due passage, approval and publication of the ordinance, and of the due execution and approval of the contract, and shall also be prima facie evidence of every other fact necessary to be established by the plaintiff in such action as to entitle him to the relief authorized to be given in that act. And it has been held by this court in Keller v. Gleason, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 154; City of Louisville v. Cassidy, 105 Ky., 424, and other cases, that where there is no evidence in the record save the copies mentioned in the section referred to above, a prima facie case is made out, although an issue may be joined upon all the matters averred in the petition. In this case, however, the city did not put in issue the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover under his contract. It relied alone upon the proposition that the property holders and not the city were liable; that it was an original construction, and not a reconstruction of the street.

The question then is, upon whom was the burden to prove that the city had been discharged by reason of the payments made by VanCleave and others to the plaintiff? The city insists that inasmuch as this matter was averred in the amended petition by the plaintiff and denied by the city in its answer, that it was error to adjudge against the city without any proof on this subject. Upon all the pleadings, including the original petition, and the city's original answer thereto, the plaintiff was shown to be entitled to recover the full contract price of $8,442.61 against the city. The only defense presented by the answer of the city was the plea that it had paid since the affirmance of the last judgment the amounts therein adjudged against it. The city did not plead, nor was it claimed in the record, that the payments made by VanCleave and others to appellee were made for or on behalf of the city, or that they were accepted by appellee as a discharge of the city's liability, or as a satisfaction, to that extent, of the contract sued on, and entered into between the city and appellee. If it be that the city was entitled to the benefits of appellee's pleadings suggesting these payments, then the city must accept the statements made by the plaintiff as to the payments, coupled with the conditions therein named. VanCleave and others were not parties to the contract. They were not bound thereon. However, the pendency of this suit by the contractor asserting the claims against their property created a cloud against their title. This, by arrangement with the contractor, they procured to be discharged. This arrangement did not and could not possibly have affected the rights of the city.

A payment made by a stranger to a contract, who was under no obligation thereon, will not operate as a discharge or payment of the obligation unless it is made with that intention on the part of the person making the payment, and is so accepted by the creditor. (Dodge v. Freedman's Sav. and Trust Co., 98 U. S., 385; Stark's Adm'r v. Thompson's Ex'ors, 3 Mon., 303; Daniels on Negotiable Instruments, section 1254.)

As to the plea of limitation contained in the third paragraph of the answer to the amended petition the plea was not good, and the demurrer should have been sustained.

In Kirwin v. Nevin, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 947, it was held that the liability of the lot owner to the contractor for street improvements was one arising under a statute, and that the five year period of limitation applied to it. This case and this doctrine, however, are not in point here, because the city's liability is not properly one created by statute, but is created by a contract in writing and signed by it, therefore, the fifteen year period of limitation alone applies.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

HAY v. CITY OF LEXINGTON.

(Filed February 8, 1903.)

Street improvements—Damages—Statute of limitation—Appellee improved the street in front of appellant's property by the construction of a brick street. The grade of the street was raised about seven and one-half inches above appellant's lot, causing water from the street to run on appellant's lot, for which he instituted this action for damages. There was no allegation of any imperfection in the plan or construction of said improvement. The city interposed the statute of limitation of five years as a defense. Held—That under section 242 of the Constitution an action for injury to private property can be maintained where it was not allowed before, but where there is no defect in either the plan or execution of the work the property holder may recover his entire damages in one suit. The appellant having failed to institute his action for damages until after five years from the construction of the improvement, is barred.

Forman & Forman for appellant.

W. S. Bronston for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

The city of Lexington, in November, 1891, improved the roadway of North Broadway in front of the property of appellant by the construction of a brick street. This improvement involved the alteration of the graded street, raising it slightly so as to leave the street and the sidewalk about seven and one-half inches above appellant's lot. This suit was brought in October, 1900, against the city for damages resulting from the inconvenience caused appellant's tenants and the diminution of the rental value of his property by reason of the water being thrown onto his premises from the street, whereas before the change of the street it had been allowed to run down the street and not onto appellant's lot.

The evidence failed to show that the improvement complained of was in anywise negligent, or deficient in plan or execution. It further showed pretty conclusively that the improvement was a permanent one as that term is used in this connection. The court, at the conclusion of appellant's evidence, directed peremptorily a verdict for the city. This appeal involves alone the plea of limitation, appellee having interposed the plea of the five year statute. At common law the judgment of the municipal governing body concerning the grading of its streets, and the manner of its being done, so far as either was not negligent, was a matter within their discretion.

Damages resulting from its proper exercise, that is, its exercise in the absence of negligence, were not recoverable against the municipality. (Keasy v. City of Louisville, 4 Dana, 154; Wolfe v. Covington & Lexington R. R., Co., 15 Ben Mon., 409; Chapman v. The Albany & Schenectady R. R. Co., 10 Barb., 860.)

For its negligent execution of its plan of public improvements the city was of course liable to suit by the property owner injured thereby.

Section 242 of the present Constitution provides that municipal and other corporations invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for the property taken, injured or destroyed by them. This section of the Constitution, as applicable to damage or injury done to abutting property by a regrading of a public street, was first under consideration by this court in City of Henderson v. McClain, 102 Ky., 402. There the question was fully considered and the court held that the municipality was liable under this section for damage done abutting property in regrading a street, although under the previous decisions of the court, including those cited above, it would not have been. This has been followed in City of Mt. Sterling v. Jephson, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1028, and Thoman v. City of Covington, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 117. But none of these cases dealt with the question of limitation. They merely determined the fact that the city was liable, whereas before the enactment of that section of the Constitution they could not have been. The nature of this liability is not changed from a tort by the section of the Constitution. It merely extends to the municipality a liability for an act, which is essentially a tort, for which it had not before been subject.

For appellant it is contended that the act of the city in this instance constituted a continuing nuisance which rendered the city liable for each recurrence of damage to the premises in question. Many authorities from other jurisdictions are cited in support of this argument, wherein the question is interestingly discussed. In this State, however, it is settled that where the injury done by a public improvement, permanent in its nature, is such as that the damages occasioned thereby are permanent, the recovery must be had for the entire damage in one action, and such damages accrue from the time the nuisance is first created, and from that time the statute of limitation begins to run. (E., L. & B. S. R. R. Co. v. Combs, 10 Bush, 382; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ky., 109.)

Thus it appears that the city's wrong, its tort, is of that character, for which it is liable, but the liability is an entirety, accrues upon the completion of the public work, and the damages therefor must be recovered in one action. The case of City of Louisville v. Coleburne, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 64, is cited and relied on by appellant as settling a contrary rule. This case and others of the kind, such as Cornelius v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1069, and Finley v. City of Williamsburg, 24 Ky. Law Rep., ante, 1336, are not authority in point. In all of these cases it appeared that the improvements causing the damage had been negligently made, and were, therefore, susceptible of remedy, by repairing the defects. It must be evident that if a public improvement of this nature is negligently done, so that its imperfect condition causes an unusual accumulation or flow of water upon the adjacent premises, the remedy will lay more effectually in repairing the defective part, and allowing damages for the injury up to that time, than by attempting to fix upon the probable damages for all time, or in assessing them from time to time. On the other hand, if the work is of a permanent character, and perfectly done, nothing in the way of its betterment that could remedy the evil complained of is possible or practicable. All that could be done in that way has already been done. If, then, the injury is caused and must, from the nature of the situation continue, it is obvious that the only remedy is to measure the damages that will compensate for the injury, and give them to the party aggrieved. It is also equally clear that it must be then apparent, when such work is completed, just what this damage is likely to be. It is, in such case, the diminished value of the property, in money, caused by the act in question. (R. R. Co. v. Price, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 1367; Henderson v. Winstead, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 628.) This entire damage is then a cause of action against the wrongdoer.

The doctrine underlying the cases of Cornellius v. L. & N. R. R. Co., supra; City of Louisville v. Coleburne, and Finley v. Williamsburg, supra, is that a continuing nuisance caused by a negligent construction, being susceptible of remedy by repairing the defective premises, gives to the demandant a new cause of action for each successive injury, for it was the duty of the wrongdoer, as it was in his power to remove the cause of the recurring injuries; his failure to do so was a new cause of the damage, and, therefore, a basis for a new right of action therefor at each occurrence. This distinction between the two classes of cases is clearly recognized in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, supra.

While it is argued for the appellant that the injury in this case was such as might be remedied by a special system of drainage, or sewage, at that point, nothing appears in the record to show this fact; no witness testified to it; nor does it appear what the present system is. The record shows that the impairment of appellant's property is due to the fact that since the reconstruction of this street in 1891 the pavement has shed its surface water during rainy weather so that some part of it goes upon appellant's premises, damaging the walls and foundation of his houses, and making them undesirable as places of residence. This is an injury differing in degree only from any other inconvenience, annoyance or impairment caused by such an improvement, which lessens the value of the property. It was not shown that it was practicable to provide at that point any different method of disposing of his natural and damaging incident from the one actually adopted. We are of opinion that the facts shown by appellant's evidence were such as to conclusively establish that the statute of limitation in favor of the city began to run in November, 1891, and the peremptory instruction was justified.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDREWS, & CO. v. WILSON'S ASS'EE.

(Filed February 3, 1903.)

Assignment for benefit of creditors—Trusts—Discharge of trustee—Decedents' estates—W. made a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors to A. and B., who instituted an action to settle the trust in which the creditors were paid 10 per cent. of their indebtedness. About five years thereafter an order was entered in that action, reciting that as the assignees had fully settled the trust that they are hereby discharged from liability and their sureties released. Afterwards a creditor of W. filed this action in the circuit court, alleging that W. had died and appellant, as administrator of his estate, had taken possession of his books and accounts, which were valuable, and was proceeding to have them sold for his benefit. Appellant, in his answer, alleged that as the trust had been fully settled and the assignees discharged, that he, as administrator, was entitled to the books and accounts. In another paragraph of his answer he alleges that in the event the court should decide that he is not entitled to the books as administrator, that he as a creditor of W. be permitted to maintain this action for the benefit of all the creditors, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the books and accounts, collect all accounts and apply the proceeds to the payment of the unpaid debts of W. On appeal, Held—That appellant, as administrator, was not entitled to the books and accounts of W. The deed of assignment vested all the interest of W. in his assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and his death did not have the effect of revoking the trust created, so long as there remained any debts due by him at the date of his assignment, nor to deprive his creditors of any right which they acquired by the deed of assignment. Nor did the order of court discharging the assignees from all further connection with the trust estate and releasing their sureties have this effect. Equity will not allow a trust to fail for want of a trustee. The effect of the judgment discharging the assignees was to create a vacancy in the position of assignee, which the court could fill, and appellant should be granted the relief prayed for the benefit of himself and the other creditors, except the bank books should not be sold.

R. J. Babbitt and Jos. H. Powers for appellants.

W. G. Dearing, G. A. Cassidy, B. S. Granlis and John P. McCartney for appellee.

Appeal from Fleming Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

In February, 1896, David Wilson, doing business as a private banker under the name of the Exchange Bank of David Wilson & Co., at Flemingsburg, Ky., made a general deed of assignment of all of his property to the appellees, R. K. Hart and J. H. Sousley, for the benefit of all of his creditors equally. The assigned estate was settled in a proceeding instituted by the assignees in the Fleming Circuit Court in March, 1896, to which all the creditors were made parties and received 10 per cent. of their respective demands, which was paid to them under an order of the court. At the April term, 1901, of the Fleming Circuit Court the following judgment was entered in the proceeding: "All the matters in controversy herein having been fully settled the assignees are now discharged, and they and their sureties are now relieved from any further liability herein on their bond as such assignees or otherwise, and the cause is filed away."

In September, 1901, Barney Cassidy instituted a suit in the Fleming Circuit Court against the assignees, Hart and Sousley, and Watson Andrews as administrator of David Wilson, who died pending the litigation, and Watson Andrews as an individual, in which he set out all the foregoing facts, and alleged that he was a creditor of Wilson; that Andrews, as administrator of David Wilson, had taken possession of the books of Wilson belonging to the bank, which he alleged were of the value of $175, and sought to have them sold for his exclusive benefit. Andrews, as administrator of Wilson, and in his individual capacity, filed an answer, which he made a cross petition against Hart and Sousley, in which he alleged in substance that he was a creditor of David Wilson, deceased; that he had qualified as his administrator; that the assignees had been discharged by a judgment of the Fleming Circuit Court as assignees and released from further liability as such; admitted that the books sought to be attached showed claims due the estate of Wilson in excess of the valuation placed thereon by plaintiff which had not been collected by the assignees previous to their discharge, and claimed that as administrator of David Wilson he was entitled to hold the books and collect the unadministered assets shown thereon for the benefit of his creditors. And in the third paragraph of his answer he alleged that in the event the court should be of opinion that he was not entitled to the possession of these books in his capacity as administrator of Wilson, that he was interested in the collection of the indebtedness due as shown by the books as a creditor; that the assignees, Hart and Sousley, had grossly neglected their duties; had made fraudulent and improvident compromises; wasted the assigned estate, and had been discharged from any further connection therewith by a judgment of the Fleming Circuit Court in the proceeding supra; denied their right to further administer the trust or hold possession of the books, and asked that a receiver be appointed to wind up the trust; and that he be allowed to prosecute and defend for all the creditors of David Wilson, who were too numerous to be brought before the court; and that the books, consisting of ledgers, memorandum books, cash books, and all other property belonging to the assigned estate not administered by the assignees, should be turned over to the receiver, who should hold the books and any moneys realized therefrom for the benefit of all the creditors of Wilson.

General demurrers were filed by the assignees to the petition of Barney Cassidy, and they also filed general demurrers to each paragraph of the cross petition of Andrews, all of which were sustained by the trial court and the existing attachment discharged, and a judgment entered that Hart and Sousley, as assignees of David Wilson, were entitled to the possession of all the books and memorandum belonging to the bank and the assigned estate, and that they should be delivered to them, and Andrews has appealed.

The deed of assignment of Wilson vested all of his interest in the assigned property in the assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and his death did not have the effect of revoking the trust thus created so long as there remained any debts due by him at the date of his assignment, nor to deprive his creditors of any right which they acquired by the deed of assignment. (Gardner v. Letcher, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 776; West v. Griffing, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 311.) Nor did the order of the Fleming Circuit Court discharging the assignees from all further connection with the trust estate and releasing their securities from all further liability in connection therewith have effect. Equity will not allow a trust to fail for want of a trustee, nor there be any doubt that a trustee may be discharged from further o-tion with the trust by a court of competent jurisdiction, and a new trustee or receiver appointed to administer the trust, either upon his own application or that of a creditor or party having pecuniary interest in the trust estate. (Burrell on Assignments, 3d edition, section 469.) It seems to us that the necessary effect of the judgment of April, 1901, was to create a vacancy in the position of assignee. Appellant does not seek in this proceeding to surcharge or falsify any former settlement made by the assignees. All he asks is that the court by proper orders will appoint a receiver to look after assets which he alleges have not been collected and apply them equally for the benefit of all the creditors. Upon the averments of the cross petition he was entitled to the relief sought. But it would not be proper to decree a sale of the bank books themselves. They are the evidence of the assets of the trust estate, which belong alike to all the creditors, and which should be preserved for their inspection upon proper application and at proper times.

For reasons indicated we think the chancellor erred in sustaining a demurrer to the third paragraph of the appellant Watson Andrew's cross petition, and adjudging the former assignees entitled to the absolute custody and control of the bank books and papers of the assigned estate. The judgment is, therefore, reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MURPHY v. BALTIMORE & OHIO SOUTHWESTERN R. R. CO.

(Filed February 3, 1903.)

Railroads—Negligence—Defective coupler—Appellant was a brakeman on a freight train of appellee, and while attempting to make a coupling between two cars his arm was caught between the bumpers and mashed, necessitating its amputation, for which this action was instituted to recover damages. Contributory negligence of appellant was relied on for defense. At the conclusion of appellant's testimony the court gave a peremptory instruction to find for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The proof showed that one of the cars that appellant attempted to couple was provided with a Buckeye automatic coupler which, when in good condition, is operated by a rod running along the end of the car, at the end of which is a crank which the brakeman, standing outside the track, may operate, and a chain attached to this rod will raise the pin, and the only other duty required is to open the knuckles, which requires but a moment. The chain on the rod which moved the pin was broken, but this fact was not known to appellant until he was in the act of making the coupling, and knowing that if he failed to make the coupling the car would be run down grade against a car in which some men were loading stock, thus endangering their lives and property. Held—That the court erred in giving the peremptory instruction as the defective condition of the coupler was known to appellee or its agents, whose duty it was to inspect same, or could have been known to them by the exercise of ordinary care. It was unknown to appellant until a few moments before the accident, and while he might have avoided the injury to himself by stepping from between the cars, it was not negligence on his part if he attempted to make the coupling in the only way he could, by raising the pin with his hand, in order to prevent injury to the men and stock on the track ahead of him. The defective coupler was the prime cause of the injuries, and it was a question which should have been submitted to the jury to determine from all the circumstances whether appellant was or not guilty of negligence in attempting the coupling, and if so, whether such negligence contributed to his injuries to such an extent that but for same they would not have been received.

Geo. Weissinger Smith and O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

Barnett Gibson and Gibson, Marshall & Gibson for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, John F. Murphy, while in the service of the appellee, Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad, as a brakeman upon one of its freight trains, in attempting to make a coupling had his arm caught between two cars, wounding and mangling it to such an extent as to require amputation between the elbow and shoulder.

The petition alleges in substance that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the appellee in providing a defective engine for pulling its train of cars, and in failing to provide a good and sufficient coupler for one of the two cars which he was attempting to couple, that is, that the coupler on one of the cars was defective and the chain belonging thereto broken, which defect made it dangerous for use. It is further averred in the petition that the defective condition of the coupler was known to appellee, but unknown to appellant at the time of the injury.

The answer denies the negligence complained of in the petition and pleads contributory negligence on the part of appellant, which is denied by the reply. Upon the conclusion of appellant's evidence the jury, under a peremptory instruction from the special judge, found for appellee, and appellant's motion and grounds for a new trial having been overruled, he prosecutes this appeal. No effort was made in the trial court to show that the engine was defective, but appellant sought a recovery upon the sole ground that the coupler was defective and dangerous. The coupler complained of was what is known as a Buckeye automatic coupler, which, when in good condition, is operated by a rod running across the end of the car at right angles to the track. On the end of the rod a lever or crank is attached. A brakeman standing outside of the track may pull the lever and thereby move the rod, which in turn draws a chain attached to an iron pin which is raised by the use of the lever, and when so raised the only remaining duty is to open the knuckles on a plane with the earth's surface. If the coupler is in order, all this may be done in a moment, and the stationary car is thus made ready to automatically grasp the approaching car. It is manifest, therefore, that when the Buckeye coupler is in good order there can be little or no danger to the brakeman in making the coupling.

Although the answer denies that the coupler was in a defective condition, in the brief of counsel for appellee it seems to be admitted that it was in fact defective, in that the chain attached to the pin was broken, and, besides, it is overwhelmingly shown by the evidence introduced in the court below that such was its condition. The proof also conduces to show that when in this defective condition the only practical way to make the coupler do its work is to insert the arm between the humpers, take hold of the pin with the thumb and fingers and lift it up, and at the same time pull the knuckles out with the hand, and it is further shown that while attempting to operate the coupler in this way appellant's arm was caught between the irons of the two cars when they came in contact.

It is, we think, also conclusively shown by the evidence that the defective condition of the coupler was known, or by the use of ordinary care could have been known, to appellee's agents and servants, whose duty it was to give attention to such things, sometime before appellant's injuries were received. Upon the other hand, the evidence also shows that its condition was not known to the appellant until in the act of making the coupling. The coupling was done at Flora, Ill., under the following circumstances: At that point the conductor desired to take in his train some loaded cars standing on the side track. These cars were stationed behind a flat car loaded with lumber. By order of the conductor appellant opened the switch and signalled the engineman to back the engine, to which was attached one freight car. The engine and car slowly backed down the grade, while appellant ran ahead, and he reached the lumber car when the backing train was about twenty-five feet away. He kept outside of the rails, and when he reached the lumber car, pulled the lever out. As the chain was broken the effort failed, of course, to draw the pin. This was the first warning that he received of the broken condition of the coupler. By this time the backing train had gotten in about twelve or fourteen feet of him. It appears that about twenty feet behind the lumber car were two cars wholly or partly loaded with live stock, with one or more persons on them, or at them loading the stock. This fact was known to appellant, who doubtless also knew that if he failed to make the coupling the lumber car would probably be driven down grade against the cars upon which were the men and stock, by the collision with the backing train. Upon discovering the condition of the coupler appellant placed one foot inside the rail, reached over the dead irons, and with his hand opened the knuckles, and raised the iron pin, and in this position his arm was caught by the colliding cars and crushed as stated.

The lower court in granting the peremptory instruction seems to have proceeded upon the idea, not that appellant was guilty of negligence in the manner of operating the defective coupler, but that his injury resulted from his negligence in failing to get out of the way of the approaching train after he discovered that the coupler would not work by the action of the lever, and this conclusion seems to have been reached because of an answer made by appellant to a question upon cross-examination, to the effect that he might have stepped back after the discovery of the defect in the coupler before the cars met.

We do not agree with this conclusion of the trial court, for, in our opinion, the question of whether the appellant was or not negligent should not be made to depend altogether upon whether it would have been possible for him to have escaped by stepping back from between the cars, after he discovered the defect in the coupler, but whether in the emergency presented, confronted as he was with the necessity for immediate action, and knowing of the danger to himself from attempting to make the coupling, and of the danger of injury to the men and stock in the cars a few feet beyond him from his failing to do so, he acted with ordinary care in the performance of his duty.

On this point appellant testified as follows: "The whole thing didn't consume but a few seconds, the engine and cars were moving down on me, and I was trying to get the coupling open because I was on the down hillside, and I knew the gentlemen below were loading the stock on the two stock cars to go with us, and a man braking as long as I had been, nine or ten years, didn't want to miss a coupling."

"Q. What would have been the consequence of doing nothing?"

"A. I was trying to do that because if I missed the coupling the cars would roll on down onto the stock cars and cripple some one. A person has to look out for that."

"Q. Was that part of your duty?"

"A. Yes, sir."

It must be borne in mind in this connection that the entire transaction consumed, as appellant stated, "but a few seconds."

At the time he went in to adjust the coupler the backing car had gotten within ten or twelve feet of him; the cars were moving very slowly, not faster than two miles an hour. It can not be said that in reaching over the irons with his hand to open the knuckles, or to release the iron pin, appellant was guilty of negligence, for according to the evidence this was the only way to open the coupler in its defective condition, and, besides, he doubtless believed that the coupler could be thus prepared for performing its office in time for him to avoid the backing train, if it continued the same slow movement until it got to the car to which it was to be coupled. But according to the evidence, when the backing train was only four or six feet off, it gave a sudden lurch, as if something had let loose, thus attaining an increase of motion, which in all probability could not reasonably have been anticipated by appellant at the time he took hold of the coupler, and but for this increased movement of the train, it may without violence to the evidence be assumed, that he could have adjusted the defective coupler, and stepped back from between the cars before they came in contact, and thereby have escaped injury.

So we think that in view of such an emergency as that in which the evidence shows appellant was required to act, with little time for thought or reflection, and having in view, as he doubtless did, the danger that threatened the men and stock in the cars beyond him, and the danger to himself as well, the lower court erred in assuming that the appellant was negligent in failing to step back from between the cars. The jury under proper instructions from the court should have been allowed to determine from the evidence whether he was or not guilty of negligence in attempting the coupling, and, if so, whether such negligence contributed to his injuries to such an extent that but for same they would not have been received.

We find in Goodrich v. New York Central & H. R. R. Co., 22 N. E. R., 397, a case not altogether unlike the one at bar, Goodrich, who was a brakeman, in attempting to couple some cars, got his hand crushed. The train was slowly backing at the time, and when the cars to be coupled were in a few feet of each other, he stepped between them for the purpose of inserting the link in the bumper or drawhead of the stationary car. When the cars were three or four feet apart he discovered that the bumper of the moving car was lower than the bumper of the stationary car. He testified that he thought by raising the link it would enter the bumper of the stationary car, but found that it would not do so, and his hand was caught in the effort to raise the link. In discussing the cause of the accident the Court of Appeals of New York said: "The defective bumper was thus shown to have been the proximate cause of the accident. It was literally the causa causans. Its immediate effect was to permit the deadwoods of the two cars to come together, and the plaintiff was from that cause exposed to a danger not within the ordinary risks of his employment. This result was traceable directly to the defendant's failure to provide the moving car with bumpers in good order, and unless the proof showed (which it did not) that plaintiff himself was in some way responsible for the condition of the car, the negligence of the defendant was established. The question as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence was, I think, one of fact for the jury. * * * He appears to have thought that the coupling could be made with the straight link that was in the draw head. He had the right to assume that fact, and that the coupling appliances were in good order. It was only at the moment that the cars were about to collide that he discovered his error. The court can not affirm that for such an error of judgment, induced as it was, to some extent, by defendant's neglect, he is to be held to have been careless. Under such circumstances, when the whole transaction is the occurrence of a moment, a man is not to be held responsible if he errs as to the estimate of danger that confronts him. If he acts the part of a prudent man, willing to and intending to perform the duty to which he has been assigned, he has done all that the law demands of him, and whether he acted such a part under the circumstances of this case was for the jury to determine."

The Supreme Court of Iowa, in Fox v. Chicago & St. P. R. R. Co., 17 L. Rep., annotated, 289, in discussing the question of whether a brakeman was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to climb a car to set a brake when the train was in motion, in doing which he fell and his foot was crushed, said: "It is contended that the plaintiff can not recover on account of the dangerous speed of the train because he testified that he knew of its speed before he caught hold of the ladder, but he was required to mount the car. It is true he might have refused to have done so because it was running too fast, or because his lantern was out, or because when he approached the car he discovered that the ground sloped away from the track, so that he could not readily seize the ladder and place his foot on the stirrup. But he was acting under orders, and in an emergency which gave no time for reflection, and the jury might well find, as they did, that he was not chargeable with contributory negligence."

We find nothing in the foregoing authorities that conflicts with any rule of law announced by this court in respect to cases of this character, and an examination of the authorities cited by counsel for appellee will, we think, show that none of them discusses the law in regard to the sudden discovery of dangerous defects, or the duty of a brakeman, in an emergency such as confronted appellant, to protect property or the lives of others thereby imperiled.

With reference to the danger that might, and doubtless would, have resulted to the stock and stockmen near appellant, in the event he failed to effect the coupling of the cars, we find the rule thus stated in American & English Encyclopædia of Law, 2d edition, volume 7, sections 2 and 3, page 896: "He whose duty it is to care for the safety of others may do so even though his duty leads him into great and visible danger, and not be chargeable with contributory negligence. But the injured person must not have created the danger, or been guilty of negligence from the consequences of which he tried to save others, or his recovery will be barred; and it must appear that he was in the discharge of duty, and could by the exercise of ordinary care have performed his whole duty, and yet escaped the danger."

The rule stated is manifestly sound in principle and consonant with reason, and by it the conduct of appellant on the occasion of receiving his injuries should be measured. We find no error in the rulings of the lower court in excluding certain questions and answers in the depositions excepted to.

For the reasons herein indicated the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the case remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict and judgment and grant appellant a new trial.

HENRY, CHAIRMAN, &co. v. SECREST.

(Filed February 8, 1908.)

Election—Injunction to compel count of ballots in primary election—Appellee was a candidate for the nomination of assessor at a Democratic primary election held for county officers in Nicholas county, and was defeated by six votes. Appellee was present at the meeting of the committee when it met to canvass the returns, and demanded that the boxes be opened and the ballots counted. The committee declined to do this, but awarded the certificate of nomination to appellee's opponent. Whereupon appellee instituted this action for a mandatory injunction to compel the committee to open the boxes and count the ballots, alleging that upon a count of the ballots it would be shown that he was nominated for the office; also that he had given notice to the committee of his intention to contest the nomination and requesting that they provide the manner of conducting the contest, and that the committee had refused to do so. A demurrer to the petition was interposed and overruled. Appellants then filed an answer, to which a demurrer was sustained, and the injunction granted from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That the petition was insufficient, and the demurrer to it should have been sustained as it contained no allegation of fraud or mistake on the part of the committee or on the part of the election officers, and did not set forth any specific grounds of contest. A mere statement, though in the form of a written notice, from a candidate made to the committee that he proposed making a contest would not be sufficient to justify the latter in prescribing the form or manner of proceeding in such contest when such contest might not be made. The committee could not be required, in the absence of a contest, to open the ballot boxes and count the ballots.

Dickson & Kennedy for appellants.

John I. Williamson and Chas. W. Wood for appellee.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

On May 4, 1901, a primary election for the nomination of Democratic candidates for county offices was held in Nicholas county by order of the Demooratio committee. Appellee, E. J. Secrest, and six others were candidates in the primary for the nomination of county assessor. The race was quite close between the candidates for assessor, for appellee was defeated by only six votes by the candidate declared the nominee.

The primary seems to have been fairly and legally conducted, returns were duly made from the several voting precincts of the county, and on May 6 the committee met at the courthouse in Carlisle, the county seat, and in due form canvassed all the returns, and declared the candidates receiving the highest number of votes duly nominated. Appellee was present at the meeting of the committee mentioned, and demanded of them that they open the ballot boxes returned from the several precincts, and count the ballots in order that it might be determined whether he or his leading opponent was entitled to the nomination for the office of county assessor. The committee refused to comply with his request, and thereupon appellee instituted suit in the Nicholas Circuit Court against appellant Henry and others, chairman, and members of the Democratic committee, respectively, for the purpose of obtaining a mandatory injunction from the judge thereof to compel the county committee to open the ballot boxes, and make a count of the votes from the ballots cast and returned.

The petition avers in substance that the appellee had, after notice to the committee, demanded of them a count of the ballots and the opening by them of the ballot boxes for that purpose; that he believed that a count of the ballots would show that he had received a plurality of the votes cast in said primary for the nomination as assessor. It was alleged that the committee refused his request to count the ballots; and further, that though requested, and in writing notified by him to do so, they refused to make or arrange the form or manner of deciding the contest which he proposed to make for the nomination of assessor. Appellants filed special demurrer to the petition and to the jurisdiction of the court, which was overruled. They then entered motion to require appellee to paragraph his petition, make it more specific, and to strike out certain parts thereof, all of which motions were overruled. Thereupon a general demurrer to the petition was filed and overruled, after which answer was filed.

The answer traverses the petition; denies the jurisdiction of the court, and avers in substance that no contest had been instituted by appellee, and that none was then pending; that the vote had been fairly canvassed and counted by the committee from the returns made by the election officers of the various precincts of the county; that the count thus made showed the nomination of a person other than appellee for assessor, and that they had no right to open the ballot boxes and count the vote from the ballots. A demurrer was filed to the answer by appellee, which was sustained, and appellants refusing to plead further, the lower court granted the mandatory injunction to compel the committee to open the ballot boxes and count the ballots. To that judgment appellants excepted, and to reverse it they prosecute this appeal. The petition contains no averment of fraud, wrongdoing or mistake on the part of the committee, or any of the officers of the election. It does not set forth any ground for a contest. It gives no reason to support appellee's claim to the nomination, but merely expresses his opinion that the counting of the ballots contained in the boxes would show him entitled to the nomination.

Section 1563, Kentucky Statutes, provides that "in all cases of a tie or contest the committee or governing authority of the political party holding such primary election shall have the power to hear and determine such contest, and decide who shall be entitled to the nomination. The proceedings in such cases shall be in such form and manner as the committee shall determine upon."

We are not inclined to believe that a mere statement, though in the form of a written notice, from a candidate made to the committee that he proposed making a contest, would be sufficient to justify the latter in prescribing the form or manner of proceeding in such contest, when after all it might, or might not be made, and certainly the committee could not be required, in the absence of a contest, to open the ballot boxes and count the ballots.

If appellee intended to inaugurate a contest, he should have done so in the usual and only proper manner, by giving notice to the committee as well as to the candidate whose right to the nomination was to be contested, and by filing with the committee specifications showing fully the grounds upon which the contest was to be based. If for irregularities, fraud, or mistake in the manner of holding the election, receiving votes, counting votes, or certifying the returns, it should be stated. In the absence of such specifications the committee were justified in refusing the appellee's demands. We are also of the opinion that the special judge erred in not sustaining the general demurrer to the petition. It presents no cause of action, and the court had no authority to grant the injunction in the absence of a contest, and upon the mere suggestion of appellee, that he believed a count of the ballots would show his nomination, especially when the facts alleged in the petition show that a count had been properly made by the committee by a canvass of the returns.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the lower court to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the petition.

CAVENAUGH v. WILLSON.

WILLSON v. CAVENAUGH.

(Filed February 3, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Judicial sales—Rights of parties after reversal of judgment—Interest—Rents—Repairs—Attorneys' fees—Executions amounting to $2,213.02 were issued against the property of appellant C. in favor of several laborers who had obtained judgments against her as a silent partner in a firm which had taken contracts to build a portion of a railroad. The property was sold under these executions, and appellee Willson became the purchaser for the amount of same. Appellee paid off the purchase money and took possession of the property, which he held for several years, until after the judgments on which the executions issued were reversed. No supersedeas was issued in the case. This action was instituted to ascertain the rights of the parties in the property. The case was referred to the commissioner, and he reported that appellee had, and could have, collected during the time he had possession of same rents to the amount of $2,725.78; that he had paid for necessary repairs, taxes, insurance, etc., $1,588.81, and that appellee had paid the purchase money with interest. The court gave judgment against appellee for the amount of the rents, but credited him with the amount paid for repairs, taxes and insurance. It gave judgment in favor of appellee for the amount paid on the executions, with interest. Held—That the judgment of the chancellor was fair and equitable. Appellee held the property as a quasi trustee, and was liable only for the rents that were collected by the exercise of reasonable diligence in renting same, and was entitled to be compensated for rents, insurance and taxes. He was entitled to collect the amount paid by him under the execution sale. It is no objection to his claim that this amount included his fee as attorney, amounting to 25 per cent. of it as it was reasonable for the services rendered, and the court properly treated it as paid by him; besides, he settled with his clients and partner on this basis.

Lane & Harrison for Catherine Cavanaugh.

Burton Vance for A. E. Willson.

Appeals from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

A firm styled Cavanaugh, Crow & Co. had obtained a contract for the building of a part of the Louisville Southern Railroad. They failed. A number of their laborers instituted suits against them, and included Mrs. Cavanaugh, appellant, as a party defendant under an allegation that she was a silent partner in the firm. She was then authorized to contract, etc., as a feme sole. The lower court held her to be liable, and rendered personal judgment against her in favor of the laborers, upon which twenty-three several executions issued. The aggregate sum to be raised by these executions, including costs, was $2,213.02. Willson & Thum were the attorneys for the plaintiffs in these suits. Appellee, Augustus E. Willson, was a member of that firm. They charged their clients, and were settled with on that basis, 25 per cent. of the claims for their legal services. The proof shows this particular charge to have been reasonable and satisfactory. Mrs. Cavanaugh prosecuted an appeal to this court without supersedeas. It was not decided for several years. In the meantime the executions were levied upon a house and lot belonging to Mrs. Cavanaugh, and at the sale appellee Willson became the purchaser at the price of $2,213.02. No one else bid. He then offered, and frequently thereafter offered, to Mrs. Cavanaugh to allow her to redeem the property by paying off the debts represented by his bid. She declined, though amply able financially to have complied. After Willson had obtained a deed and the possession of the lot the judgment in favor of the laborers against Mrs. Cavanaugh was reversed by this court. This suit is to settle the rights of Mrs. Cavanaugh, owner, and Willson, purchaser. It was decided on a former appeal of this case (22 Ky. Law Rep., 474) that Mrs. Cavanaugh was entitled to the property; that an attorney for a plaintiff who had procured the property sold under an erroneous judgment under which he had bought it, was liable to restore it or its value to the defendant, including an accounting by the attorney for "rents and profits" during the time he held the possession. But it was then decided that in the accounting the purchaser should be reimbursed by the owner for the purchase money paid out by him in buying the property. The former opinion on this point is as follows: "It follows from what we have said that * * * the value of the property or the property itself must be adjudged to Mrs. Cavanaugh. The purchase money paid out by appellee, which appears to have been $2,213.00, with interest from the 1st day of April, 1889, is to be charged on the property, less the rents and profits appellee has received from the property since his possession of it in May, 1896."

On the return of the case further pleading was allowed to show the state of the account thus directed to be struck between these litigants. An order of reference to the master commissioner was entered. He took proof, and reported that appellee Willson had, and could have, received rents to the amount of $2,725.78; that he had during his possession paid for necessary repairs, taxes and insurance, etc., $1,538.81. The foregoing figures represent the sums as altered slightly (by allowance of interest) in the final judgment of the court. The commissioner also found, and the court confirmed it, that Willson paid for this property $2,213.02, as of April 1, 1889, and allowed that sum and interest accordingly.

The complaints of Mrs. Cavanaugh on this appeal are that Willson did not pay $2,213.02, or other sum than about $400, for the property; that he should have been charged with the reasonable rental value of the property, without regard to what he actually received; and that he was entitled to nothing for repairs or insurance (taxes seem to be conceded).

It is argued by appellee that this court found on the former appeal as a settled fact that Willson had paid $2,213 for the property as of April 1, 1889.

Whether it so decides or not, we are convinced that he did so. The facts are, at the marshal's sale Willson became the purchaser, as stated, and executed to the respective plaintiffs bonds as required by law for the purchase money, bearing interest from April 1, 1889. These bonds he subsequently paid off, as he was bound to do. It is not material when they were paid, as they bore interest from date. The commissioner consequently correctly charged interest from their date. But it is said that Willson's fee of 25 per cent. was not "paid" by him, and that it should have been excluded by the court. No sound reason was advanced why this should be. Willson & Thum charged, and were paid, this fee in settling with their clients. Whether the bonds were paid by Willson to the clients, and they then repaid the fees in cash, or whether the fees were credited, is mere matter of form, and can not change the legal effect of the transaction. That was a payment in law of the bonds, and likewise a payment by the client of the fees. (2 Benjamin on Sales, section 1062.) It was shown, too, that in the settlements between Willson & Thum of their partnership business these fees were divided between them. So Willson paid the money evidenced by these fees, paid one-half direct to his partner in satisfaction of the latter's right thereto. Besides, Willson's services were shown to be worth the sums charged as fees. Why should not the value of one's labor be reimbursed to him in such an accounting as this as rightfully as his money? Labor was doubtless one of the earliest, as it is now one of the essential, criterions of value. The purchaser was required to account for "rents and profits" during his holding of the property. This accounting was directed to be, and was had, in equity.

The effect of the former ruling was to hold that the purchaser held the property in trust for the owner. He was bound to take care of it. If he had failed, he would have been liable for the resultant damage. The court is trying to restore the parties to their former situations in so far as it can. The property was adjudged, and has been restored, to the owner. But that does not satisfy her legal rights, for had the possession not been taken from her she would have received the rents in the meantime. What rents? The highest and continuously? Not so; but such as could have been obtained under existing state of repairs and condition of the property, and demand for it by renters. It is indisputably shown that appellee exercised the best care and the utmost diligence in keeping it occupied, and got for it the most rent that could be had for such property. This is the very best test of rental value, far more satisfying to the court than expert witnesses, testifying upon hypothetical states of case. It was, therefore, proper to have charged appellee with the rents actually received, and which by ordinary care and reasonable diligence, he would have received. But had appellant been in possession she could not have had her rents as clear profits, for the property had to be repaired. If not, it would not only have fallen down and become worthless so far as the building was concerned, but of course it would not have been tenanted at all. Nothing was claimed or allowed for permanent improvements or betterments; only necessary repairs were allowed. And this was right. Had the property burned during the appellee's possession he would have been compelled to either account for its value or to restore it as it was. The insurance, though in appellee's name, would in equity have been adjudged for the benefit of appellant upon proper showing, as he held it as a quasi trustee for her.

We are of opinion the judgment of the lower court conforms to the directions and principles announced in the former opinion, and that it has reached a just and equitable conclusion.

Both judgments affirmed.

WORTHINGTON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF LEXINGTON.

(Filed February 4, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Municipal taxation—Submission of vote on taxation to the people—The board of education of Lexington adopted a resolution providing that a proposition be submitted to the voters of the city, authorizing the issual of $75,000 of bonds for the purpose of building three additional school houses. The proposition was submitted to a vote at the November election, 1902, and resulted in 1,621 yeas and 487 nays. At the same general election there was cast for a member of congress by the city of Lexington 8,769 votes. This action was filed by appellant to enjoin the issual of the bonds on the ground that two-thirds of the vote cast at said election was not cast in favor of said proposition. Held—That only two-thirds of those voting on the question was necessary to give authority for the issual of the bonds, and as the proposition received this vote in its favor appellant's petition was properly dismissed.

Wm. Worthington for appellant.

Geo. S. Shanklin for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, Wm. Worthington, instituted this suit against the appellee, the board of education of the city of Lexington, to enjoin and restrain them from the issual of seventy-five bonds of $1,000 each in the name of the city of Lexington. He alleges that at a regular meeting of the board of education they unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, Additional school buildings are necessary to accomodate the white and colored children of the city of Lexington, and the regular annual revenue of the board of education is not sufficient to purchase sites, erect and equip said buildings; now, therefore, be it resolved by the board of education of the city of Lexington, Ky. :

"Section 1. That this board incur a debt not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of purchasing sites for and erecting and equipping three new school buildings in Lexington, two for white and one for colored children, and issue bonds to the amount of the indebtedness so incurred, to run for thirty years, which shall be of the par value of $1,000, and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and which shall be secured by a pledge of the property so purchased, erected and equipped, and all other property and revenue of the board of education.

"Sec. 2. That the proceeds of the said bonds shall be used exclusively for the purpose set forth in this resolution.

"Sec. 3. That this board request the general council to provide for the collecting of a sinking fund tax sufficient to pay the interest on said indebtedness, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, within the term for which the bonds are issued.

"Sec. 4. That the county court of Fayette county be, and it is hereby, requested to order a special election to be held, of which fifteen days' advertisement and notice shall be made in the official newspaper of the city of Lexington, Ky., at the same time and place as the regular election in the city of Lexington, Ky., on November 4, 1902, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of said city the question whether or not said board of education shall incur said indebtedness, and issue bonds therefor, and to direct those charged with the duty of having printed the ballots to be used at said election, to have printed thereon said question in such form as the law provides."

That on the 1st day of October, 1902, the Fayette County Court entered an order calling for a special election on November 4, 1902, submitting to the qualified voters of the city of Lexington the question as to whether the board of education of the city of Lexington should incur the indebtedness for the purpose indicated in the resolution; that on the 4th of November the special election was held in conformity with the order of the county court, and that the vote upon the question of the issual of the bond resulted in 1,621 yeas and 437 nays; that the general council of the city of Lexington in conformity with section 3 of the resolution of the board of education did levy a tax to create a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds and the interest thereon; that the assessed value of the taxable property of the city of Lexington amounts to more than $17,500,000, and that the indebtedness of the city does not exceed $750,000, and that the tax rate for the year 1902 was only $1.16½ on each $100 of taxable property; that at the same election on which the bond proposition was voted there was cast for a member of congress by the city of Lexington 3,769 votes.

The ground on which appellant asks the injunction is that the board of education has no power to issue and sell the bonds in question; second, that the proposition to issue the bonds did not receive two-thirds of all the votes cast for members of congress at the election at which a vote was taken upon the proposition. The act of the general assembly approved March 20, 1900, amending the act for the government of cities of the second class, to which Lexington belongs, reads as follows: "That the board of education shall have power to issue school bonds, to run for not exceeding forty years, for an amount not exceeding $100,000, sufficient to purchase sites and erect and equip school-houses: Provided, That said bonds do not bear exceeding 6 per cent. per annum interest, payable semi-annually, and shall not be sold for less than par and accrued interest, and the proceeds of said bonds shall be used exclusively for the purpose named in this act, and shall not be in violation of the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and provided that said bonds shall not be issued without the assent of two-thirds of the voters voting at the election to be held for that purpose."

We are of the opinion that the board of education had authority to submit the proposition to issue bonds in question to a vote of the people, and it is apparent from the averments of the petition that the statutory method of taking the necessary steps have been strictly complied with; that none of the limitations imposed by section 157 of the Constitution upon the incurring by municipalities of indebtedness are infringed by the proposed issue of the bonds sought to be enjoined. It was held in Belknap v. City of Louisville, 99 Ky., 474, that under section 157 of the Constitution a city was not authorized to become indebted beyond the current revenue for the year without the consent of two-thirds of the voters actually voting at the general election when the question was submitted, and not merely two-thirds of those voting upon the question. But in Montgomery County Fiscal Court v. Trimble, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 828, it was held that only two-thirds of those voting on the question was necessary to give authority to issue the bonds, and so much of Belknap v. The City of Louisville as was in conflict with the opinion was overruled. Under the authority of this case we conclude that the proposition received the necessary two-thirds of the votes, and we are, therefore, of the opinion that the chancellor properly dismissed appellant's petition, and held that appellees had full authority to issue and sell the bonds sought to be enjoined.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

---

RYAN, &c. v. QUINN.

1. Damages—Assault and battery—Evidence—Instructions—Pleading—Appellee was a sheriff of a Democratic primary election and instituted this action against appellants, R. and N. and four others, charging that while engaged in performing his duties, he was without provocation assaulted by defendants, R. and N., who were accompanied by four others, and was beaten and kicked, and severe and painful injuries inflicted upon him, for which he sued to recover damages. He also alleged that three of the defendants conspired and combined with R. and N. in the commission of the injuries complained of. The answer traversed the allegations of the petition, and in the second paragraph alleged that plaintiff was endeavoring to block the polls and prevent the election from being held, and without any cause, committed an assault on others, including defendant Ryan, and that his conduct resulted in an altercation, which was the result of his own assault. The court sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, and a trial was had on the issues presented in the first paragraph of the answer, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff against R. for $1,000, and for $500 each against the other defendants, from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence the rules of the committee regulating the conduct of the election; also that the court erred in permitting a witness to testify that about eleven o'clock the committee declared the primary election off on account of various disturbances at the polls. Held—That evidence of the rules of the committee regulating the holding of the primary election was incompetent as officers of primary elections have the same powers and are subject to the same limitations as officers of regular State elections. It was also error to permit evidence to be introduced showing that the primary election had been declared off. Errors in instructions given are also urged for reversal. Held—That in the first instruction the court erred to the prejudice of appellants in resting the authority of appellee upon the rules of the committee and not upon the statute. The instruction was also erroneous and prejudicial in not defining the limitation upon the authority of the officer. By section 1470, Kentucky

Statutes, no person other than the election officers shall remain within fifty feet of the polls except when voting. Under section 1484, Kentucky Statutes, it is made the duty of the sheriff to preserve order at the polls, and enforce the provisions of the election laws under the direction of the judges. Neither of defendants were residents or voters of the precinct. If the evidence for defendants be true R. did not propose to remain within fifty feet of the polls, but only wished to talk with the judges to get them to admit S. as a challenger or inspector. When R. communicated this to appellant it was his duty to report the fact to the judges and act under their discretion. In the meantime he might require R. to stand back fifty feet from the polls, and if R. disobeyed his order he might place him under arrest, distinctly notifying him of the cause of his arrest. But he had no right without this to strike R. unless in his necessary self-defense. If R. resisted arrest he might use such force as was necessary to make the arrest (short of taking his life). Under the pleadings and facts proven, showing that R. pulled appellee off the steps, the court should have instructed the jury that they should find for plaintiff against R. a reasonable compensation therefor, and if they believed from the evidence that in addition to this R. struck appellee, or beat or kicked him, or that others did so with whom R. was acting in concert, or whom he incited, aided or abetted or procured to do so, they should in addition find in favor of plaintiff against R. such an amount as would fairly compensate plaintiff for any physical or mental suffering or medical or dental bills caused to him by such striking or beating, and that in addition to compensatory damages they might, in their discretion, award punitive damages in such sum as they deemed proper under all the evidence, not exceeding in all the amount claimed in the petition; and on the question of punitive damages they might take into consideration any mitigating circumstances shown by the evidence. The evidence does not warrant the giving of the third instruction, to the effect that as there was no plea of son assault de mesne the verdict must be for plaintiff, and that the only question for the jury to determine is what amount in damages should be assessed. The court properly sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer as it was insufficient. Although it alleged that appellee began the difficulty by striking him, he did not allege that he then took hold of him in his necessary self-defense to prevent him from striking him again, using no more force than was necessary for his protection, and that this was the wrong sued for. Although self-defense was not pleaded, the matter pleaded was competent in mitigation of damages. If those who did hurt appellee were not acting in concert with R., but of their own wishes, R. was not responsible for their acts. The third and fourth instructions were in effect peremptory instructions to the jury to find against R. compensation for plaintiff's injuries, and should not have been given. The fourth instruction was also erroneous in using the word "approved." If R. incited, procured or encouraged the other men to beat plaintiff he is responsible, but he is not responsible because in his heart he may have "approved" of it. The word "procure" in this instruction should be substituted for the word "cause." The fifth instruction relative to punitive damages was erroneous. The sixth and seventh instructions are erroneous for the same reason as the fourth, in using the word approved. The court should have given a peremptory instruction to find in favor of the three policemen, as there is no evidence to show that they aided or acted in concert with any one in the infliction of the injuries complained of.

Zack Phelps, Fred Forcht, Jr., and Wilson Goldsmith for appellants.

Wallace & Miller, McDonald & McDonald, W. W. Thum and W. C. Owens for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, James C. Quinn, filed this suit against appellants, charging in his petition that on June 12, 1899, while he was engaged in performing his duties as sheriff of the Democratic primary election, he was without provocation assaulted by the defendants, John Ryan and Frank Jeff Naves, who were also accompanied by four others, and was beaten, kicked, bruised and otherwise maltreated by them and their associates, so that he was painfully and seriously injured, having several of his teeth knocked out, his wrist sprained, and his face, head and body bruised in numerous places. He also charged that the defendants, Whitman, Raidy and Wentz, had previously combined and conspired with the other defendants, and aided and abetted them by remaining in the presence when the assault was committed and protecting the other defendants from interference while committing the assault. The defendants all filed answer, traversing the allegations of the petition. In the second paragraph they alleged affirmatively in substance that the plaintiff was endeavoring to block the polls and prevent a regular Democratic primary from being held, and without any cause committed an assault on others, including the defendant, Ryan; that his conduct resulted in an altercation which was the result of his own assault. The court sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, and with the pleadings in this condition the parties went to trial. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against Ryan for $1,000, and against each of the other defendants for $500, on which the court rendered judgment.

The proof shows that John Ryan is a pump inspector of the city; that Frank Jeff Naves is employed in the fire department, and the other three defendants are policemen. The proof also shows that the plaintiff, Quinn was the sheriff of the primary election, regularly appointed, and that neither he nor Ryan lived in that precinct. The testimony on the plaintiff's behalf was substantially as follows: After the officers had got everything in order at the polls, and were getting ready to open them, a man named Tom Scally came in and presented credentials as inspector or challenger, and wanted to stay in, but the officers ruled him out. He went out, and not long afterwards John Ryan drove up with his son, Dennis Ryan, in a buggy, and Jeff Naves and Tom Scally and others had a conversation with him. Ryan then said: "Who is that fellow in the door?" Scally said: "His name is Quinn." Ryan pulled out a paper and said: "He has no right there; make him show his papers." Quinn then pulled out his papers; Scally read them and said "they are all right," and then went back to the buggy. He and Ryan had a conversation, and Ryan drove away. In a few moments Ryan returned in his buggy and had a conversation with the police; then he jumped out of the buggy and rushed up to the door and grabbed Quinn by the arm, saying with an oath, "I will put you out," and as he grabbed him by the arm he struck him. Quinn was standing on the step eight or nine inches above the level of the pavement, and from the strike and jerk fell on the pavement; just as he went to get up Ryan kicked him in the mouth, and kicked one tooth entirely out and broke off another. As Quinn got up Jeff Naves struck him, and a half a dozen more struck him in the back. He halloed for protection to the police, and they did not move. Some one called out "kill him," and, thinking he was going to be killed, he ran across the street. four or five men after him, and there he fell again, or was knocked down again. When he got up on the other side of the street the police were in the same place opposite the voting place, and Ryan and his buggy were going out the street. The police were thirty five or forty feet away, and did not move during the whole encounter. Such is the version of the transaction given by Quinn, and it is in the main sustained by the testimony offered by him, except that some of his witnesses say that when he ran across the street and fell the second time the police intervened. On the other hand, John Ryan testified that he went to the precinct in the interest of certain candidates for whom he was working to see if everything was right, and inquired for the inspector, Scally, and after learning that he was not admitted to the polls, drove away, but after going a short distance concluded to return, thinking that as the inspectors had been admitted at the other polls he would reason the matter with the officers and get them to admit Scally; so he came back and got out of the buggy and went up to Quinn, who was standing in the door, with a view of having an interview with the judges, and asked to be allowed to see them; that he had no conversation with the police and had no idea of trouble; that Quinn made a strike at him and knocked his hat off while he was parleying with him, and that he then, to protect himself and to keep Quinn from striking him again, grabbed Quinn; that he did not hit or kick him, and nothing was said about killing him or hurting him, and that as Quinn came off the steps toward the curbing his son, Dennis, jumped out of the buggy and squared off at Quinn and knocked him down and there was a running fight across the street, a number of men following them. The police crossed the street and the crowd dispersed. It was all done so fast that no mind could realize what was taking place until it was over. The defendant, Naves, testified substantially to the same facts, and so did the other defendants, who also testified that they intervened as soon as they saw Quinn down, and that the person who was assailing him then ran down the street. The proof for the defendants also showed that no body had voted at the time the difficulty came up, and that Quinn's conduct was bolsterous and unseemly. There was no dispute as to the extent of Quinn's injuries. He had two teeth knocked out and was somewhat bruised, but not enough to require medication. His teeth were replaced by a dentist. He remained about the polls an hour or two after the difficulty, but finally was suffering so that he left.

The plaintiff introduced as a witness Isaac P. Miller, and over the objections of the defendants introduced certain rules of the Democratic committee for the purpose of showing that by these rules no person excepting those wanting to vote should be allowed within fifty feet of the voting place. The purpose of this evidence seems to have been to show Quinn's authority for keeping persons out. It has been held by this court that primary elections must be held under the statute; that the State having prescribed an official ballot and provided that a nominee by a primary election is entitled to have his name printed on the ballot, may properly prescribe how the primary elections shall be held. By section 1551, Kentucky Statutes, all primary elections must be held under the same requirements as regular State elections, except as provided in the statute. By section 1560 the officers of all primary elections have the same powers and are subject to the same limitations as officers of regular State elections. Appellee Quinn, therefore, derived all his powers from the statute, and the rules of the committee could add nothing to them, and should not have been admitted.

The witness, Miller, was also allowed to state that the committee, about 11 o'clock, declared the primary off, owing to the fact that the election officers in various precincts had been interfered with by persons connected with the city administration. This evidence was incompetent. The defendants were in no way connected with, or responsible for, what occurred in other precincts, and the witness had no personal knowledge of the facts testified to. Proof of what others did was not competent against the defendants. (Finnell v. Bohannon, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1587.)

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"1st. The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff in this action, James C. Quinn, who was the duly appointed and authorized sheriff of election at the polls or voting place for the fourth and fifth precincts of the eleventh ward at the Democratic primary held June 14, 1899, and as such it was his legal duty, and the duty of his associate officers, to obey and carry out the authorized and official instructions promulgated by the duly appointed and authorized Democratic authorities who directed the holding of said primary, and especially to obey and enforce instruction No. 2 to exclude all persons from the said voting place where he and they were the duly appointed officers, after it was opened, excepting those wanting to vote, and as such officer the plaintiff had a right to prevent, by force, if necessary, any person from entering said voting place except those wanting to vote.

"2d. The court instructs the jury that the defendant, John Ryan, was not an election officer or voter in said precinct, and did not go to the voting place at Nineteenth and Main, whereat the plaintiff was sheriff, for the purpose of voting, and had no legal right or authority after the voting place was opened to go within fifty feet thereof, or to enter without permission the said voting place for any purpose whatsoever after it was opened for the purpose of receiving votes.

"3d. The court instructs the jury that upon the pleadings in this case, as there is no plea or answer of son assault de mesne, their verdict must be for the plaintiff against the defendant, John Ryan, as it is shown from the defendant, John Ryan, himself, and he is corroborated by all of his own witnesses, that he seized hold of the plaintiff in anger, which, in law, the court instructs the jury is an assault and battery. So that as to the defendant, John Ryan, the only question for the jury to determine upon the evidence is what amount in damages they will assess in favor of the plaintiff.

"4th. Upon the question of damages to be awarded against the defendant, Ryan, the court instructs the jury that it is their duty to find, and they should find, in favor of the plaintiff such an amount as will fairly compensate the plaintiff for any physical or mental suffering and medical and dental bills, caused to him by the said assault and battery committed upon him by the defendant, Ryan, or by any of the others then and there committing an assault upon the plaintiff, if the jury believe from the evidence that such further assault and battery by others was incited, caused, encouraged or approved by the said Ryan at the time of its commission.

"5th. The court further instructs the jury upon the question of damages against the defendant, Ryan, that if they believe from the evidence that the assault and battery committed upon the plaintiff by said Ryan or by others who were incited, encouraged, aided or abetted by Ryan to further assault the plaintiff, was accompanied by acts of cruelty and oppression, or were wantonly committed in reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights, then in addition to compensatory damages, as defined in instruction No. 4, the jury may further award punitive damages as a punishment to said Ryan, and as a warning to others not to commit similar assaults and batteries. But upon this question of punitive damages the court instructs the jury that they may consider mitigating circumstances, if any such they may believe from the evidence there were, and gauge their verdict as to the amount of punitive damages, if any such they decide should be given, by such mitigating circumstances. But the court instructs the jury that as to compensatory damages for the physical and mental pain, suffering and medical and dental bills caused by said assault and battery the jury should not consider mitigating circumstances at all, but should award the plaintiff such compensatory damages in full as defined in instruction No. 4, but not in all to exceed the amount claimed in the petition, $5,000.

"6th. As to the other defendants in this case, Whitman, Raidy and Wentz, the three policemen, and Naves, a fireman, the court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that they, or either of them, committed an assault and battery upon the plaintiff, or that they, or either of them, were present at the election precinct at Nineteenth, near Main, and when the said assault and battery was committed by the defendant, Ryan, or either of the said defendants, upon the plaintiff, but did not actually themselves join in the said assault and battery, but stood by and encouraged, incited, aided, approved and abetted the commission of any assault and battery upon the said plaintiff at said time and place, then such of the other defendants or defendant who did actually commit an assault and battery upon the plaintiff, for the law makes no distinction between accessories and principals in misdemeanor cases, of which the assault and battery as complained of in the petition is one, and all persons either actually committing an assault and battery, or inciting, encouraging, aiding, approving or abetting the committal of an assault and battery are liable equally and jointly as principals.

"7th. But unless the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants, Whitman, Raidy, Wentz and Naves, or either or any of them, committed an assault and battery upon the plaintiff, or that they, or either of them, was present at the said election precinct at Nineteenth, near Main street, when the said assault and battery was committed by the defendant, Ryan, or either of the defendants upon the plaintiff, and actually themselves joined in the assault and battery, or encouraged, incited, aided, approved or abetted the commission of said assault and battery upon the said plaintiff at said time and place, their verdict should be for such defendant or defendants.

"8th. As to such defendant other than Ryan, if the jury should find for the plaintiff, their verdict may be for compensatory or punitive damages, or both, as above instructed as to the defendant, Ryan. If, however, the jury as to all or any of the defendants, except Ryan, find for any or all of the defendants, except Ryan, their verdict should be: 'We, of the jury, find for the defendants (naming the defendants in whose favor they desire to find).'

"The court instructs the jury that they can not find any damages for plaintiff for or on account of loss of time caused to plaintiff by the assault and battery complained of in the petition.

The first instruction is erroneous in resting the authority of Quinn upon the rules of the committee and not upon the statute. It is also erroneous and prejudicial under the evidence in not defining the limitations upon the authority of the officer. By section 1470, Kentucky Statutes, no person other than the election officers shall remain within fifty feet of the polls, except when voting. By section 1484 it is made the duty of the sheriff to preserve order at the polls and enforce the provision of the election laws under the direction of the judges. By section 1576 any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful command of any officer of an election shall be fined not less than $25 nor more than $500. If the evidence for the defendants be true Ryan did not propose to remain within fifty feet of the polls, but only wished to talk with the judges to get them to admit Scally. When Ryan communicated this to Quinn it was his duty to report the fact to the judges and act under their discretion. In the meantime he might require Ryan to stand back fifty feet from the polls, and if Ryan disobeyed his order he might place him under arrest, distinctly notifying him of the cause of his arrest. But he had no right without this to strike Ryan unless in his necessary self-defense. If Ryan resisted arrest he might use such force as was necessary to make the arrest (short of taking his life).

As these facts were not shown by the proof, in lieu of instruction Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 the court should simply have told the jury that it was conceded in the evidence that Ryan took hold of Quinn and pulled him off the steps, and that under the pleadings they should find in favor of the plaintiff against Ryan a reasonable compensation therefor; and that if they believed from the evidence that in addition to this Ryan struck Quinn, or beat or kicked him, or that others did so with whom Ryan was acting in concert, or whom he incited, aided or abetted, or procured to do so, they should in addition find in favor of the plaintiff against Ryan such an amount as would fairly compensate Quinn for any physical or mental suffering or medical or dental bills caused to him by such striking or beating; and that in addition to compensatory damages they might, in their discretion, award punitive damages in such sum as they deemed proper under all the evidence, not exceeding in all the amount claimed in the petition; and on the question of punitive damages they might take into consideration any mitigating circumstances shown by the evidence.

The evidence does not warrant the third instruction, although it is shown by the evidence that Ryan took hold of Quinn. All the proof introduced by the defendants is to the effect that he did this after Quinn struck him. The court properly sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph of Ryan's answer, because in it, although he alleged that Quinn began the difficulty by striking at him, he did not allege that he then took hold of him in his neces-necessary self-defense to prevent him from striking him again, using no more force than was necessary for his protection, and that this was the wrong sued for. But although there was no plea of self-defense, the matter shown was competent in mitigation of damages, and if Ryan testified truly he did not hurt Quinn at all. If those who did hurt Quinn were not acting in concert with Ryan, but of their own wishes to get even with him for his own boisterous conduct, Ryan was not responsible for his injury. The court, therefore, should have only told the jury under the pleadings that they should find against the defendant, John Ryan, as above indicated. The third and fourth instructions taken together were in effect a peremptory instruction to the jury to find against Ryan compensation for the plaintiff's injury. The fourth instruction is also erroneous in using the word "approved." If Ryan incited, procured or encouraged the other men to beat Quinn he is responsible, but he is not responsible because in his heart he may have approved of it. A man is not responsible for a beating inflicted by another because he thinks the punishment deserved, or is secretly pleased to see it go on. He is only responsible when he incites or procures it or aids in its conclusion. (Blue v. Crisp, 4 Ill. Ap., 51; Lester v. McKee, 79 Ill. Ap., 210; Hilmes v. Strobell, 59 Wis., 74; True v. Commonwealth, 90 Ky., 651; Omer v. Commonwealth, 95 Ky., 353.) The word "cause" in this instruction may have been misleading under the evidence, for it may have been inferred from it that if Ryan's act, however innocent, was the cause or occasion of Quinn's being beaten by the other men, Ryan was responsible, and it will be better to substitute the word procure for the word "cause." The fifth instruction was erroneous in so far as it authorized the jury to find "punitive damages as a punishment to Ryan and as a warning to others not to commit similar assaults and batteries." (Snyder v. McGill, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 587.) The sixth and seventh instructions are erroneous for the same reason as the fourth in using the word "approved."

As to the three policemen, appellants Whitman, Raidy and Wentz, the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The allegations of the petition as to them is that they had "previously combined and conspired with the other said defendants for the said assault, and aided and abetted in said assault by remaining in the presence when such assault was committed, and protecting said other defendants from interference while committing said assault." There is no evidence of a previous combination or conspiracy between the policemen and John Ryan or Frank Jeff Naves. The only evidence on this subject is that Ryan had a talk with the policemen before he came up to Quinn, but what passed is not shown, and there is nothing from which it might be inferred that the police aided in the assault by remaining present and protecting the other defendants from interference while committing it. They were thirty-five feet away; the altercation was continuous from the time Ryan's hat was knocked off until Quinn fell the second time on the opposite side of the street, and took less time perhaps than it would one to describe it. The only thing that it would seem the police failed to do that they ought to have done was to make the proper arrests. But this was after it was all over. Dennis Ryan says he ran away to avoid arrest, but it is clear from the evidence that he did not run far, and could have been arrested by proper diligence. Still a peace officer is not to be presumed to violate his duty under his oath of office, and there must be something more than a mere failure to make an arrest which might be due to other causes before he can be held as a party to the assault. As to the three policemen, we see no reason why the peremptory instruction to find for them should not have been given.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

GOODIN v. WILSON.

(Filed February 4, 1908.)

Title—Judicial sales—Executions—Appellant obtained a judgment for money against appellee, and an execution for same was issued and levied upon a tract of land in the possession of appellee, and the execution was returned with the endorsement of the levy made thereon. Appellant then instituted this action to enforce her lien, alleging in her petition that appellee had purchased the land at a judicial sale for $2,000, and had paid the purchase money except $400, but no deed of conveyance had been made to him by the commissioner. Her petition was dismissed, from which she prosecutes this appeal. It is urged for appellee that he had no title that could be subjected to either a levy or sale under execution. Held—That by his purchase of land at judicial sale he only obtained the equitable title, which was not subject to levy or sale under execution, under sections 1681 or 1709, Kentucky Statutes, but appellant should have proceeded to subject same to her debt, under section 439, Civil Code of Practice. Only lands to which the debtor holds the legal title can be subjected to levy or sale under execution, and appellant acquired no lien under the levy of her execution, and her petition was properly dismissed.

John T. Hays and John H. Wilson for appellant.

Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellee.

Appeal from Knox Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellant, Mary J. Goodin, obtained a money judgment against appellee, J. H. Wilson, in the Knox Circuit Court, upon which she caused to be issued an execution, which was placed in the hands of the sheriff of Knox county, for the purpose of enforcing satisfaction of her demand. The sheriff attempted to levy said execution upon a tract of land, described by metes and bounds in his return on the writ, as the property of appellee. This execution was returned by the sheriff without further action than the endorsement of the levy; whereupon the appellant, for the purpose of enforcing her supposed lien, instituted this action in the Knox Circuit Court, setting up her judgment, the execution thereon, and the levy of the officer upon said land, and reciting the fact that appellee's title to the land in question was obtained by a purchase at decretal sale in the case of Tinsley v. Tinsley, in the Knox Circuit Court; that appellee had purchased said land for the sum of $2,000, for which he had executed bonds payable to the commissioner of said court, one W. F. Westerfield, who was made a party defendant to the action, and called upon to set up and enforce his lien for the unpaid part of the purchase money, which appellant alleges, she was advised, amounted to about $400.

1512    WORTHINGTON V. BD. ED. CITY OF LEXINGTON.

of the city does not exceed $750,000, and that the tax rate for the year 1902 was only $1.16½ on each $100 of taxable property; that at the same election on which the bond proposition was voted there was cast for a member of congress by the city of Lexington 3,769 votes.

The ground on which appellant asks the injunction is that the board of education has no power to issue and sell the bonds in question; second, that the proposition to issue the bonds did not receive two-thirds of all the votes cast for members of congress at the election at which a vote was taken upon the proposition. The act of the general assembly approved March 20, 1900, amending the act for the government of cities of the second class, to which Lexington belongs, reads as follows: "That the board of education shall have power to issue school bonds, to run for not exceeding forty years, for an amount not exceeding $100,000, sufficient to purchase sites and erect and equip school-houses: Provided, That said bonds do not bear exceeding 6 per cent. per annum interest, payable semi-annually, and shall not be sold for less than par and accrued interest, and the proceeds of said bonds shall be used exclusively for the purpose named in this act, and shall not be in violation of the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and provided that said bonds shall not be issued without the assent of two-thirds of the voters voting at the election to be held for that purpose."

We are of the opinion that the board of education had authority to submit the proposition to issue bonds in question to a vote of the people, and it is apparent from the averments of the petition that the statutory method of taking the necessary steps have been strictly complied with; that none of the limitations imposed by section 157 of the Constitution upon the incurring by municipalities of indebtedness are infringed by the proposed issue of the bonds sought to be enjoined. It was held in Belknap v. City of Louisville, 99 Ky., 474, that under section 157 of the Constitution a city was not authorized to become indebted beyond the current revenue for the year without the consent of two-thirds of the voters actually voting at the general election when the question was submitted, and not merely two-thirds of those voting upon the question. But in Montgomery County Fiscal Court v. Trimble, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 828, it was held that only two-thirds of those voting on the question was necessary to give authority to issue the bonds, and so much of Belknap v. The City of Louisville as was in conflict with the opinion was overruled. Under the authority of this case we conclude that the proposition received the necessary two-thirds of the votes, and we are, therefore, of the opinion that the chancellor properly dismissed appellant's petition, and held that appellees had full authority to issue and sell the bonds sought to be enjoined.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

---

RYAN, &c. v. QUINN.

(Filed February 4, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Damages—Assault and battery—Evidence—Instructions—Pleading—Appellee was a sheriff of a Democratic primary election and instituted this action against appellants, R. and N. and four others, charging that while engaged in performing his duties, he was without provocation assaulted by defendants, R. and N., who were accompanied by four others, and was beaten and kicked, and severe and painful injuries inflicted upon him, for which he sued to recover damages. He also alleged that three of the defendants conspired and combined with R. and N. in the commission of the injuries complained of. The answer traversed the allegations of the petition, and in the second paragraph alleged that plaintiff was endeavoring to block the polls and prevent the election from being held, and without any cause, committed an assault on others, including defendant Ryan, and that his conduct resulted in an altercation, which was the result of his own assault. The court sustained a demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, and a trial was had on the issues presented in the first paragraph of the answer, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff against R. for $1,000, and for $500 each against the other defendants, from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence the rules of the committee regulating the conduct of the election; also that the court erred in permitting a witness to testify that about eleven o'clock the committee declared the primary election off on account of various disturbances at the polls. Held—That evidence of the rules of the committee regulating the holding of the primary election was incompetent as officers of primary elections have the same powers and are subject to the same limitations as officers of regular State elections. It was also error to permit evidence to be introduced showing that the primary election had been declared off. Errors in instructions given are also urged for reversal. Held—That in the first instruction the court erred to the prejudice of appellants in resting the authority of appellee upon the rules of the committee and not upon the statute. The instruction was also erroneous and prejudicial in not defining the limitation upon the authority of the officer. By section 1470, Kentucky

* * * As a general rule, however, the purchaser acquires no more than an equitable title prior to the execution of a proper deed."

The contention of appellant's counsel, that the right of possession and the right to receive rents, necessarily carries with it the legal title, can not be maintained. There are many instances where the legal title may be in a trustee, with the possession and the right to the usufruct of the property remaining in the cestui que trust. It seems to us, therefore, that the title of appellee Wilson in the land in question was merely an equitable one, and that, as such, it was not subject to levy or sale under execution, and that appellant's remedy for subjecting the same to the payment of her debt is under the provision of section 489 of the Code, and not under sections 1681 or 1709 of the Kentucky Statutes. Holding this view, we think the court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition as amended and upon appellant's refusal to plead further in dismissing her petition.

Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

BARKER, &c. v. TENNESSEE PAVING BRICK CO., &c.

(Filed February 4, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Street improvements—Res judicata—Contracts—This action was brought against appellants on apportionment warrants issued by the city of Somerset to appellee, as contractor, for the construction of sidewalks abutting appellants' property. A judgment resulted in favor of appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted. On appeal it is insisted that the proof does not show a right in appellee to recover under section 8567, Kentucky Statutes. It is also insisted that as this court has heretofore held that other actions under this same statute should be dismissed, that those cases are decisive of this, and the matter is, therefore, res judicata. Held—That in those cases the record showed that the actions were brought before the work was completed under the contract, and those actions were, therefore, prematurely brought, and this being true, it is not a bar to the present suit as a judgment in a premature suit is not a bar to another action. The regular passage of the ordinances directing the improvements to be made, the contract for same, the acceptance of the entire work and the apportionment of the cost, are shown by copies of the official proceedings, which are filed with the petition and not denied. There is no allegation of fraud or mistake on the part of the council. It is thus shown by the proceedings of the council, which are attacked in no way, that it has determined that the entire work has been done, and that the contract has been complied with. This was sufficient to authorize a recovery.

Denton & Robinson for appellants.

O. H. Waddle for appellees.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

This is an action against the property owners to enforce apportionment warrants for the construction of the sidewalk on Main street in Somerset, Ky. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition, but on appeal to this court the petition was held sufficient and the judgment dismissing the petition was reversed. (Tennessee Paving Brick Co. v. Barker, &co., 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1069.) On the return of the case the defendants filed answer. The court sustained a demurrer thereto, and the defendants have appealed.

There was a former suit to enforce seven of these warrants. The circuit court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed, and in this court obtained a judgment directing the petitions to be dismissed. This judgment was pleaded by these defendants in bar of the action as to them. The sufficiency of this plea depends on what was determined on that appeal. The opinion of this court is found in Barker v. Southern Construction Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 796. The court, after discussing a number of irregularities in the proceedings of the council, concluded the opinion with these words: "If it be conceded that the plaintiff presented a prima facie right to recover, we are still of the opinion that, taking the entire proceeding had in relation to the contract, the performance of the work and the so-called apportionment warrants, that the same failed in so many substantial respects to comply with the law that the plaintiff has failed to acquire any lien upon the property in question, and that the judgment adjudging to it a lien is erroneous."

It will be observed that the court did not rest its judgment on the irregular proceeding had in relation to the contract alone, nor alone on the performance of the work, nor alone on the character of the apportionment warrants; but on all these things combined. In so resting its decision the court had in mind section 3567, Kentucky Statutes (under which the action was brought), which provides that "no error in the proceedings of the board of council shall exempt from payment or defeat the lien after the work has been done as required by ordinance; but the board of council or the court in which the suit may be pending shall make all corrections, rules and orders, to do justice to the parties concerned."

The court, among other things, had shown that the work had not been completed. It held the contract was entire, and that a proper apportionment could not be made until the contract was completed; and it was to this it referred when it used the words, "the performance of the work," in the quotation made above. The court did not decide that the irregularities of the council or the character of the apportionment warrants alone would defeat the action, and could not do so in view of the statute referred to. The opinion is not, therefore, res adjudicata, that either of these objections alone would be sufficient. It is res adjudicata that that action could not be maintained, but it is not conclusive as to what would be the rights of the parties after the work was all done and the objection on account of the nonperformance of the entire contract was removed.

We, therefore, conclude that the judgment in that case dismissing that action must be considered as holding merely that the action was prematurely brought, and this being true, it is not a bar to the present suit as a judgment in a premature suit is not a bar to another action. (Freeman on Judgments, section 268.)

In the second paragraph of their answer the defendants stated that the contractor had failed to construct the sidewalk in accordance with the ordinance on the west and north side of Main street, from the south line of

Mrs. T. M. Shepherd's property to the foot crossing at the southeast corner of Mrs. J. M. Huskison's property, and did not build the sidewalk for more than half the distance provided in the ordinance that it should be built; that it failed to build it on the south side of Main street, as provided in the ordinance and contract, from the foot crossing at Mrs. J. M. Huskison's property to the street between H. B. Johnson and J. T. Howell as therein provided; that it failed to build, construct or reconstruct the sidewalk in many places along the line of the street and public square on both sides of the street and failed to grade, construct or reconstruct the sidewalk which they pretended to build in the manner provided by the ordinance and contract, in that they failed to use clean, sharp sand or to remove vegetable or murky material, or to roll or ram the bed of the sidewalk, so as to make it solid, or to spread it with sharp sand for the depth of two inches, or to use good vitrified brick as provided in the contract, or to set the outside curbing eight or six feet from the property line, as provided in the ordinance and contract, or to set the inside curbing of stone of sufficient thickness and durability to hold the pavement in its place as therein provided; but used in many places bats and broken brick, and no stone whatever for the inside curbing and no outside curbing next to the pavement, and in many places used no brick for some distance next to the outside curbing.

The ordinance passed by the city council ordained: "That sidewalks be constructed on the east side of Main street, from Griffin avenue to the foot crossing at Johnson's Hall, and on both sides of said street from the said foot crossing at Johnson's Hall, to Mrs. T. M. Shepherd's property, and on the west and north side of said street, from the south line of Mrs. T. M. Shepherd's property to the foot crossing at the southeast corner of Mrs. J. M. Huskison's property, and on the south side of said street, from the west line of Mrs. M. J. Wait's yard, to the street between H. B. Johnson and J. T. Howell, and both sides of the said street from the said corner of Mrs. M. J. Huskison's property and the said street, between Johnson and Howell, to Fifth street, including all sides of the public square; and wherever sidewalks have heretofore been constructed on said territory the same shall be reconstructed so as to have uniformity in the entire construction and reconstruction of the same, in accordance with the plans and specifications as heretofore provided."

The contract was let "for the construction and reconstruction of the sidewalks in the city of Somerset on Main street, from Griffin avenue to Fifth street, as provided by the ordinance." On August 12 the city engineer reported to the council that the contractor had completed the work of making the sidewalk on Main street, from Griffin avenue to the foot crossing at Johnson's Hall, in all respects as set forth in the ordinance. The work was accepted by the council and the cost apportioned among the property owners. On October 21 the engineer reported that the work of making a sidewalk around the public square was completed, and the council accepted it and apportioned the cost. Later, he reported that the contractor had completed the work of making the sidewalks from the foot crossing at Johnson's Hall to the north line of Mrs. T. H. Shepherd's property. The council accepted the work, and apportioned the cost as before. On November 27 he reported that the contractor had completed the work on the east side of Main street from the public square to Third street. The council then examined the sidewalk, and finding that certain defects had been removed, apportioned the cost among the property owners. In his next report he reported that the work was completed on the east side of Main street from Columbia street to Fifth street. The council examined the work and finding it satisfactory, accepted it. On September 14, 1896, he filed his final report, stating that the contractor had completed the work of constructing and reconstructing the sidewalk on the east side of Main street from Griffin avenue to the foot crossing at Johnson's Hall, and both sides of the street from that foot crossing to Mrs. T. H. Shepherd's property, and on the west and north side of the street, from the south line of Mrs. T. H. Shepherd's property to the foot crossing at the southeast corner of Mrs. Huskison's property, and on the south side of the street from the west line of Mrs. C. Wait's yard to the street between H. B. Johnson and J. T. Howell, and on both sides of the street from the said corner of Mrs. Huskison's property and the said street between Johnson and Howell to Fifth street, including all sides of the public square. The work was accepted by the council, and the cost was apportioned among the property owners.

These facts are all shown by copies of the official proceedings of the council, which are filed with the petition and not denied. There is no allegation of fraud or mistake on the part of the council. It is thus shown by the proceedings of the council, which are attacked in no way, that it has determined that the entire work contracted for has been done, and that the contract has been complied with. In City of Henderson v. Lambert, 77 Ky., 80, it was said: "This court has several times decided that when work has been accepted by the proper authority of a city, and there is no allegation of fraud or collusion, such acceptance is conclusive evidence that the work was performed according to the requirements of the contract." (Joyes v. Shadburn, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 892; Whitfield v. Hipple, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 386; Bogard v. O'Brian, 14 Ky. Law Rep., 648.)

¶ We, therefore, conclude that the court properly sustained the demurrer to the answer.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUISVILLE RAILWAY CO. v. CASEY.

(Filed February 4, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Street railways—Negligence—Instructions—Verdict—Appellee brought this action for personal injuries sustained while getting off one of appellee's electric cars, which started before she could get off, throwing her to the ground and severely spraining her ankle, and she recovered a judgment for $1,000, damages from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is insisted that the court erred in giving an instruction authorizing damages for a permanent injury, and that the verdict is excessive. Held—That the court properly permitted the jury to consider the case on the theory that the injury was permanent as the proof was sufficient to authorize the submission of that question.

Fairleigh, Straus & Eagles and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellant.

Forcht & Field for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

Appellee, Catherine Casey, in her petition states that she was a passenger upon one of the appellant's street cars running over its line on Preston street, in Louisville, Ky. Just before the car in question reached Roselane street appellee, desiring to leave the car, rang the bell, and when the car stopped at Preston and Roselane streets she attempted to alight from the rear platform. As she was about to step from the lower step of the platform to the ground the car was negligently and carelessly started by appellant's employes in charge thereof, and she was violently thrown to the ground, wrenching and spraining her ankle, from which she suffered great pain and which has never become entirely well, it remaining so weak that she has not been able to walk upon it since with ease or comfort to herself, and that, by reason of said injury, her power to earn money has been substantially diminished.

Appellant's answer put in issue the material allegations of the petition, and also pleads contributory negligence. The evidence in this case, as is usual in cases of this kind, is conflicting and contradictory. That for the appellee shows a case of gross neglect on the part of appellant's servants and employes in charge of the car in question; whereas, the evidence for appellant shows no neglect whatever upon the part of its agents or employes, but, on the contrary, the kindest and most considerate treatment of appellee; that she was helped down from the car by the conductor, and stumbled and fell in the street after the street car had passed twenty-five or thirty yards beyond the point where she had alighted.

The jury which tried the case evidently believed the witnesses for appellee, as, upon trial of the case, they returned a verdict of $1,000 in her favor. Upon this appeal appellant rests its right of reversal upon two grounds: First, that the court erred in submitting the question of permanent injury to the jury; and, second, that the verdict is excessive. We think there was sufficient evidence of permanent injury to authorize a submission of the question to the jury. Appellee testified that her ankle has never recovered its strength, and that she walks with difficulty; is unable to go up and down the steps as she had done before, and that she still suffers pain from the injury in question; and we, therefore, believe that the court did not err in submitting the question as to whether or not, under all the circumstances, appellee was permanently injured, to the jury.

The amount of the verdict we believe to be full large; but we can not say that, under all the circumstances of this case, it was excessive; certainly not so much so as to warrant us in invading the province of the jury in estimating it.

If the witnesses for the appellee are to be believed, the negligence of appellant's employes was great and reprehensible; and it was peculiarly within the province of the jury, who had all the parties before them, who heard the testimony and saw the demeanor of the witnesses, to judge of their credibility, and to estimate and fix the damage sustained by appellee.

Perceiving no error in the record the case is affirmed.

ATCHISON v. CITY OF OWENSBORO, &c.

(Filed February 4, 1908.)

Attorney's fees—Appellant was city attorney for appellee from January 1, 1894, to January 1, 1898; that during his term of office a controversy arose as to the liability of the banks to pay municipal taxes. Under his direction the city collector proceeded to collect the taxes, and suits were instituted, enjoining the collection of said taxes. Appellant represented the city in the circuit court, and on the trial the injunction was dissolved. An appeal was prosecuted to the Court of Appeals and an affirmance was had, with damages, which amounted to something over $1,000. The banks prosecuted an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, which resulted in affirmance of the judgment, with damages. When the case came on to be heard in the Supreme Court appellant's term of office had expired, and he informed the council of the pendency of the appeal, and asked whether he should attend to it. No response was made to his letter, but he went to Washington and attended to the suit at an expense of $90. The city collected $18,859.56 from the banks, and refused to pay him anything for his services or on account of his expenses to Washington. He instituted this action to recover 10 per cent. of this amount, under section 3314, Kentucky Statutes, and the amount of his expenses. Held—That in defeating the actions brought by the banks against the city appellant did not recover anything except the damages, which were given on the affirmance of the case, to which he was entitled to 10 per cent. commission, but he was not entitled to his expenses to Washington, as he went at his own suggestion as a volunteer.

Chas. S. Walker and Lucius P. Little for appellant.

George W. Jolly for appellees.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant was the attorney of the city of Owensboro from January 1, 1894, to January 1, 1898. In the year 1894 there was a controversy between the banks and the city as to whether they were liable to municipal taxation. As city attorney appellant advised the tax collector to proceed to collect the taxes. As soon as proceedings were instituted for this purpose by the tax collector the banks filed their petitions in the Davless Circuit Court, obtaining an injunction against the collection of the taxes. Appellant, as city attorney, was directed to defend the suits, which he did, and on March 2, 1895, obtained a judgment in the Davless Circuit Court dismissing the petitions and dissolving, with damages, the injunctions. The damages awarded on the dissolution of the injunctions amounted to something over a $1,000. The banks prosecuted an appeal from the judgment of the Davless Circuit Court to this court. Appellant, as city attorney, represented the city on these appeals, and on March 24, 1897, obtained an affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court, with 10 per cent. damages on the supersedeas. From the decision of this court the banks on August 3, 1897, prosecuted an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and before that appeal was heard appellant's term as city attorney ended. After the end of his term he wrote to the city council, calling attention to the cases and offering to go to Washington and attend to them if the council wished him to do so. The council laid the communication on the table. Appellant, however, at his own expense, went to Washington, and in connection with his successor, the acting city attorney, attended to the cases in the Supreme Court, his expenses in this matter being something over $90. On April 3, 1899, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of this court. After this the city council directed its tax collector to collect the taxes, which he did, and refused to pay appellant anything for his services, or on account of his expenses, and he thereupon filed this suit to recover therefor. The amount collected by the city tax collector from the banks was $18,859.56, and appellant insists that a much larger amount was due by them, which the tax collector failed to collect. He claims that he is entitled to 10 per cent. on the amount paid by the banks, or which should have been paid by them.

Section 3314, Kentucky Statutes, is as follows: "The city attorney shall be paid an adequate annual salary, payable monthly out of the city treasury, the same to be fixed by ordinance before his election, and not changed during his term of office. In addition to his salary the city attorney shall be paid his expenses when it shall be necessary for him to go out of the city to attend to legal business for the city, and 10 per cent. upon all sums recovered and collected by him for the city."

As appellant was not city attorney when he went to Washington, and was not requested or employed by the council to go there, he has no claim against the city for his expenses in this behalf. The city attorney then in office did go in behalf of the city, and was in Washington attending to the matter, and appellant's position in the case was wholly that of a volunteer. He has no claim, therefore, against the city for the docket fees allowed in that court, or for his personal expenses. The services rendered in the Daviess Circuit Court, and in this court, stand upon a different plane. He was the city attorney when these services were rendered. In attending to the cases he was in discharge of his duties as city attorney. Whether such services, in the contemplation of the statute, were covered by the "adequate annual salary, payable monthly out of the city treasury," as therein provided, or whether he is, therefore, entitled to 10 per cent. of the sums in controversy in those actions, is a question which must be determined from the language of the statute itself.

The suits which the banks had brought against the city were proceedings instituted by them to prohibit the city from collecting the taxes. Appellant merely defended these suits. He did not recover anything in those actions, except the damages on the dissolution of the injunctions and the damages on the supersedeas. The term "recover" has a well-defined meaning in the law, and this meaning had been the matter of adjudication by this court prior to the adoption of the present statutes. Under the statute giving an attorney a lien for money or property, which may be recovered in an action prosecuted by him, it was held that the defendant's attorney, who merely defeated a judgment which was sought against his client, had no lien on the fund which was in controversy. (Wilson v. House, 73 Ky., 406.) We, therefore, conclude that for merely defending the suits brought by the banks it can not fairly be said that appellant recovered anything for the city, except the judgment for damages, and that he is not entitled under the statute to 10 per cent. of the amount of the taxes in controversy in that case, which he did not in any legal sense recover. The purpose of the statute seems to have been to make the attorney diligent in recovering and collecting money due the city where the claim was placed in his hands for collection. If the statute were construed to give the attorney 10 per cent. of the amount in controversy in all actions which he might defend, the purpose of the statute in providing for him an adequate annual salary would be entirely defeated.

The court adjudged appellant entitled to 10 per cent. of the damages recovered by him for the city, and of this the city complains on the ground that he did not collect the money. But the statute should receive a reasonable construction. Appellant obtained a judgment for the money and an affirmance of the judgment of this court. The collection of the judgments was delayed by the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, without his fault and by matters over which he had no control. He did all he could do. The judgments were good, and in view of appellant's faithful services for the city, and his skill and efficiency in those actions securing to the city valuable rights, which it enjoys, we are not prepared to say that, under all the facts of the case, there was any error of the court in the judgment to this extent.

The judgment complained of is, therefore, affirmed on the original and cross appeal.

INGRAM v. COMMONWEALTH

(Filed February 5, 1903.)

1. Criminal law—Seduction under promise of marriage—Evidence—Instruction—Appellant prosecutes this appeal from a conviction and sentence to confinement in the penitentiary for three years under an indictment charging him with seduction of a female under twenty-one years of age under promise of marriage. Appellant complains because the court refused to permit the woman to testify that in a conversation between her and appellant he told her that when he went to get her father's consent he told him that he had had sexual intercourse with his daughter. Held—That while the daughter should have been permitted to make such statement, the refusal to permit same to be made was not prejudicial as both appellant and the father deny that such a statement was made in a conversation between them.

2. Instruction—The court erred to the prejudice of appellant in failing to give to the jury an instruction to the effect that if they believed from the evidence, appellant, after the seduction of the girl and before his marriage to another woman, in good faith offered to marry her, but was prevented from doing so by her refusal to consent thereto, if she did so refuse, he was entitled to an acquittal. Appellant had the right, under the statute, to condone the offense by offering in good faith to marry the girl, and the jury should have been so instructed.

W. S. Pryor, M. O. Scott and Romine & Miller for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Metcalfe Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The appellant, Robert Ingram, colored, was indicted in the Metcalfe Circuit Court for the seduction, under promise of marriage, of one Curtis Pendleton, also colored, a female under twenty-one years of age. The trial resulted in a conviction, his punishment being fixed by the verdict of the jury at three years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The motion of appellant for a new trial having been overruled, he prosecutes this appeal. There are but two questions necessary to be considered by this court: First, did the lower court err in refusing to permit appellant's counsel, upon cross-examination, to ask the prosecutrix in reference to a conversation she had with appellant, in which the latter claimed to have reported to her what had been said by her father in refusing his consent to their marriage; second, did the court err in refusing to give instruction No. 3, asked by appellant's counsel.

The following facts seem to be fully established by evidence, to wit: First, that appellant did, on at least two occasions, have sexual intercourse with the girl, Curtis Pendleton; second, that he did promise to marry her; and, third, that the father of the girl refused his consent to such marriage. There is, however, this difference between the statements of the prosecuting witness and those of appellant. She says the promise of marriage was made by appellant before, and when he first had carnal knowledge of her, and he says it occurred afterward. She also testified that no other man ever had similar intercourse with her, and that she would not have yielded her person to the gratification of appellant's lust but for his promise to marry her, and his assurance, as a minister of the gospel, that he would comply with his promise.

Appellant testified that after his illicit intercourse with the girl he offered in good faith to marry her, and asked her father to permit him to do so, but the latter refused his consent; that he then reported to the daughter what the father said, and she refused to marry him without her father's consent. Appellant further testified that he later went to see the girl and offered to take her to Tennessee and marry her without her father's consent, but she refused to go with him, and not a great while thereafter he married another woman. These conversations were denied by the girl in rebuttal, and she also testified that she did not refuse to go with him to Tennessee to be married, but, upon the contrary, asked him to take her to that State for that purpose, which he refused to do.

George Pendleton, the father of Curtis, when introduced as a witness, admitted that appellant had asked his permission to marry her, but that he had refused his consent on account of her youth, and so informed appellant. He also testified that he did not know at the time of the conversation with appellant that the latter had seduced his daughter. The question asked by appellant's counsel of the girl on cross-examination, which she was not permitted by the court to answer, was in substance as follows: "When the defendant returned to you from your father did he not state to you what had passed between him and your father about the marriage, and tell you what your father said about it?" It was avowed by counsel that the witness, if permitted to answer the question, would have said: "The defendant did tell me that he had stated to my father that he had had intercourse with me, but that my father would not let me marry him, and I told him that. I knew I was pregnant, but I would not marry him, or go to Tennessee with him.

Though the avowal shows that a part of the expected answer would not have been responsive to the question, still we think the question not improper as the girl testified that appellant, with her knowledge, went to her father to obtain his consent to their marriage; she saw them in consultation, and as he immediately reported to her what had been said by the father, she should, we think, have been permitted to state all that was said by appellant and herself when he reported to her the conversation with her father. We are of opinion, however, that the refusal of the lower court to permit the question to be answered did not operate to the prejudice of appellant, as he and George Pendleton both testified that he did not, in the conversation mentioned, inform the latter that he had had intercourse with the daughter.

While we do not think it would have been proper for the lower court to instruct the jury in form as set forth in instruction No. 3, asked by counsel for appellant, we are of the opinion they should have been instructed in substance that if they believed from the evidence appellant, after the seduction of Curtis Pendleton, and before his marriage to another woman, in good faith offered to marry her, but was prevented from doing so by her refusal to consent thereto, if she did so refuse, he was entitled to an acquittal. Such an instruction with those given by the court would, we think, have presented the whole law of the case to the jury.

The prosecutrix and her father corroborate the appellant as to the offer of marriage made by him at the time the father refused his consent, and though the daughter denied that any offer of marriage was made by appellant after her father's consent was refused, appellant testified that he did again, and in good faith, make such offer, notwithstanding the opposition of the parent. We are unable to say what credit, if any, was given by the jury to these statements of appellant, or what weight they might have given them under proper instructions from the court. In any event, we know the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury, as indicated, deprived appellant of any benefit that he might otherwise have received from his testimony with respect to the offer of marriage, as effectually as if the testimony had been excluded altogether from the consideration of the jury.

The statute under which this prosecution against appellant was instituted (section 1214, subdivision 12, chapter 36, Kentucky Statutes) provides that "no prosecution shall be instituted when the person charged shall have married the girl seduced, and any prosecution instituted shall be discontinued if the party accused marry the girl seduced before final judgment. All prosecutions under this section shall be instituted within two years after the commission of the offense."

This court, in the case of the Commonwealth v. Wright, 16 Ky. Law Rep., 251, affirmed the judgment of the circuit court which dismissed an indictment for seduction against Wright, who appeared in court upon the call of the case for trial, and offered then and there to marry the woman whom he had seduced, but she refused the offer and the marriage did not take place.

In recording its approval of the action of the lower court in dismissing the prosecution this court said: "The marriage of the parties is the purpose, intent and spirit of the statute, within its keeping the past misery and shame may be forgotten, the future happiness of both secured, so that the statute being so construed, although the seducer be forced almost to the very doors of the penitentiary before offering to fulfill his promise of marriage, yet having done so in good faith and his offer having been declined, he can do no more. The woman and not the man defeats the object and purpose of the law."

If, therefore, the offense denounced by the statute may, as in the case supra, be condoned because of an offer of reparation made at the eleventh hour, may not an earlier offer of atonement by the offender merit a like favor at the hands of the law?

Appellant testified that such an offer was made by him in good faith, and if so, and it was rejected by the prosecutrix, the defense thus presented was authorized by the statute, and the jury should have been instructed thereon by the court.

For the reasons indicated the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the case remanded for a new trial and such other proceedings as may not be inconsistent with this opinion.

MASILLON ENGINE AND THRESHER CO. v. CARR, &c.

(Filed February 5, 1902—Not to be reported.)

1. Husband and wife—Homestead—A mortgage on land was signed by husband and wife to secure an indebtedness to appellant. The name of the wife did not appear in the mortgage as one of the grantors. In an action to enforce collection of the debt it is urged that the wife had not relinquished her homestead in the land. Held—That said mortgage was insufficient to release the homestead interest and the proof showed it to be of less value than $1,000.

2. Evidence—The evidence in the case is insufficient to show that the husband had improved the property out of his own means so as to increase its value beyond $1,000.

Wm. M. Cravens for appellant.

H. K. Bourne and W. O. Jackson for appellees.

• Appeal from Henry Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The defendants, James W. Carr and his wife, Amy A. Carr, signed and acknowledged the following mortgage to appellants upon a house and lot occupied by them as a homestead, worth about $400:

"This indenture, given and entered into this 20th day of June, 1898, between James W. Carr, of the first part, and the Masillon Engine and Thresher Co. (Incorporated of Masillon, O.), of the second part: Witnesseth, that the party of the first part, for and in consideration of his indebtedness to the party of the second part, as follows: * * * And to secure the payment of the same, we have granted, bargained and sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain and sell to the party of the second part all the following described real estate: * * * This indenture is conditioned as follows: The said James W. Carr is indebted to the said Masillon Engine and Thresher Co., as aforesaid; now if said parties of the first part, or any one for them, shall pay said indebtedness at the maturity, this indenture shall be void, else remain in full force.' And the said parties of the first part hereby waive and relinquish to the said party of the second part all claims they have or may have to said property under the homestead laws of this State.'"

In this suit plaintiffs asked an enforcement of this mortgage lien and for a sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy their debt. Defendants, among other defenses, relied on their answer, say that at the date of the execution of the mortgage, and long prior thereto, they were bona fide housekeepers with a family, occupying and using and claiming the house and lot covered by the mortgage as a homestead; and that it was of less value than $1,000; that the defendant's, Amy A. Carr's, name did not appear in the body of the mortgage; and that her mere signature thereto was not a release or waiver by her of her homestead exemption. The plaintiff for reply to this averment of the answer denies that the signature of Amy A. Carr was not sufficient evidence of a release and waiver of her homestead right in the mortgaged property, and affirmatively alleges that since the execution of the notes sued on and the mortgage the defendant, James W. Carr, had built valuable additions to the house, and had also erected a barn on the lot, which materially enhanced the value of the property; that these improvements were erected out of the means acquired or earned by him; that they were unable to state the value of such improvements, but that they would amount to a considerable sum, and asked that the property be subjected to the extent of the value of such improvements. A general demurrer was sustained to this reply, and upon final submission it was held that the homestead of defendants could not be subjected to the payment of plaintiff's debt.

Upon this appeal it is insisted for appellants that they were entitled to subject the homestead of appellees to the payment of their debt, and that the trial court erred in not so adjudging. It is further claimed that if the mortgage did not convey the entire homestead, that, in any event, the chancellor erred in sustaining the demurrer to their reply, in which they sought to recover for valuable improvements alleged to have been made upon the homestead after the creation of their debt. The law is well settled in this State that a homestead right is not waived by a mortgage, signed and acknowledged by the mortgagor and his wife, wherein she is mentioned as a party of the first part, but does not join in the grant, nor in any manner express in terms her intention either to relinquish her dower, or join her husband in waiving his right to the homestead exemption. This question was first considered in Wing v. Hayden, &c., 73 Ky., 276, and was followed up by McGrath v. Berry, 76 Ky., 371. In that case the wife was mentioned as a party of the first part, and she signed and acknowledged the instrument, but she did not join in the grant, nor in any manner express in terms her intention to join her husband in waiving his right to the homestead exemption, and it was held that the homestead did not pass, and this rule has been since steadily adhered to. In this case the name of the wife does not appear even as a grantor in the mortgage. Her only connection with the instrument appears in her signature thereto. We are, therefore, of the opinion that defendants were not divested of the homestead exemption under and by virtue of the conveyance of the husband.

Nor did the chancellor err in sustaining the demurrer filed to the reply. If appellant desired to subject to the payment of their debt any other or different interest in the mortgaged property than was stated in their original petition, it should have been done by an amended petition, and not by reply. But even if we waive this irregularity in the pleading and treat the reply as in effect an amended petition, it does not state a good cause of action. It does not deny that the property is of less value than $1,000, and that defendants occupied it as a homestead. There is no averment fixing distinctly the amount which the alleged improvements added to the pecuniary value of the homestead. And construing this pleading most strongly against the plaintiff, we must conclude that this alleged enhancement in value of the homestead was inconsiderable, or, at least, not sufficient to bring it within the rule announced in Nichols v. Sennett, 78 Ky., 680; Fish v. Hunt, 81 Ky., 584, and Mosely v. Bevins, 91 Ky., 260.

For reasons indicated the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. GILLIAM'S ADM'X.

(Filed February 5, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—Damages—Appellee's intestate was a fireman on a freight train on appellant's road. Some of the cars in the train were not provided with air brakes. At a water station the fireman had gotten out on the tender to adjust the water spout, as it was his duty to do, and while engaged in this act a portion of the train which had become detached ran against the section attached to the engine with such force as to knock the fireman from the tender, and caused such injuries as resulted in his death. This action for damages by his administrator resulted in a verdict for $10,000 damages, from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to give a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for defendant. It is also insisted that the court erred in giving an instruction authorizing punitive damages. Held—That there being evidence showing negligence on the part of the agents and employes of the company, the court properly refused to give a peremptory instruction. The instruction permitting a finding as to punitive damages was properly given as the evidence fails to show that any of the brakemen were in their proper places when the train parted to give any warning whatever. The verdict is not excessive in view of the gross negligence proven.

W. F. Browder, J. C. Browder, B. D. Warfield and Edward W. Hines for appellant

B. F. Proctor for appellee.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant has appealed from a judgment of the Logan Circuit Court against it for the sum of $10,000 in favor of appellee, for the death of her intestate, J. H. Gilliam, caused by the negligence of its agents and servants superior in authority to him.

The facts, in substance, are as follows: The decedent was a fireman on the train of appellant, composed of an engine and tender, thirteen box cars, a passenger coach and a caboose. The box cars were loaded and the seven box cars next to the engine had air-brakes, and the others without air-brakes. The train crew was composed of a conductor, engineer, three brakemen and a fireman, the deceased. This train and crew started from Russellville to Owensboro, Ky., on the morning of the 18th of February, 1900. The last stop made before Gilliam lost his life, at Pettit Station, was at Crow Hickman, about four miles from Pettit. Between these two stations the train parted in some way, not known, and in stopping the train for the engine to take water at Pettit the detached portion ran against the front part and the collision knocked the intestate off of the tender, where he had gone in the discharge of his duty to adjust the spout of the water tank to take water; he was badly bruised and unconscious when found, and died in a few hours. The proof in the record shows that the conductor was in the passenger coach, making out a report of his trip, one brakeman was on the passenger coach with him, the front brakeman was in the cab with the engineer, and the other or middle brakeman was not located on the train (he did not testify). One witness stated that at the time or immediately after the collision he saw him sliding down a rod on the caboose. Some half a dozen witnesses who lived at Pettit, and along the railroad track back in the direction of Crow Hickman, state that they did not see any one on the train of cars except the brakeman, who was on the front end of the passenger coach, and appeared to be setting the brake. The first witness who saw that the train had parted was about a mile back from Pettit, and stated that the sections were about 250 yards apart then, and that the detached portion was gaining on the front portion, and the next witness, about a half mile from Pettit, stated that when the train passed him the sections were about three car lengths apart and the rear section was gaining on the front, and when the train arrived at Pettit the witnesses vary from one to two car lengths apart. The water tank is three or four hundred yards further on. The conductor, engineer and the two brakemen who testified stated that they did not know that the train had parted, nor what caused it; that the track was straight and there were some high and some lower cars in the train, and the high cars out off their view, and, therefore, they did not see the break in the train. Not one of them states that he made any effort to see the condition of the train between said stations, nor was there a brakeman in his proper place or position on the train, and the engineer and conductor both knew of this fact, and made no effort to have them in their proper places. The rules of the company were introduced as evidence, and the same, with the other evidence, showed that the conductor's place was in the cupola of the caboose; the brakemen's on the top of the train, one at the rear end, one in the middle, and the other on the front end. All were violating the rules, and by reason thereof the intestate lost his life.

The lower court refused to give a peremptory instruction offered by appellant. The court did right in this. The court, at the instance of the appellee, gave to the jury five instructions, to the giving of all of which the appellant objected and excepted. Appellant then offered seven instructions, and the court gave them all, without objection from appellee. The twelve instructions submitted to the jury cover every conceivable hypothesis of the case. They had two approved definitions of "gross negligence." All the instructions, taken together, were more favorable to appellant than it was entitled to. The appellant contends that the court should not have given the instruction on punitive damages. We think that the court did not err in giving same.

The case of Newport News & Mississippi Valley Co. v. Dentzel's Adm'r, 91 Ky., 45. In that case it appears that Dentzel was the head brakeman and was in his proper place on the train, near the front end. The train parted and left him on the front portion. The engineer increased the speed of the engine, to keep out of the way of the rear portion, and blew his whistle for the rear section to put on the brakes; supposing that they had done so, he checked the engine, and immediately there was a collision, and Dentzel lost his life by reason thereof. The conductor was in the caboose and the rear brakeman was with him. The court on these facts said: "While the appellant is not liable to an employe for injury arising from the neglect of a co-laborer, not superior to the one injured, yet in this instance the conductor, who was in charge of the train, was a party to the neglect. He not only permitted it upon the part of the rear brakeman, but also failed to give attention otherwise to the conduct of the train. The rule of respondeat superior, therefore, applies, and it is evident that the neglect was willful. It was an intentional failure upon the part of the one in charge of the train, and who represented the company, to perform a known and manifest duty, important to the safety of the deceased."

The court did not err in giving said instruction. The appellant insists that the lower court erred in overruling its plea to the jurisdiction of the Logan Circuit Court. It claims that appellee was a resident of Daviess county, Kentucky, and that her intestate's death occurred there, and appellant's residence, or home office, was in Jefferson county, Kentucky. Appellee admitted all this, except she denied that she was, at the time or then, a resident of Daviess county, Kentucky, and alleged that at the time of bringing the action, and at that time, she was a resident of Logan county, Ky. On the first plea the only evidence heard was that of appellee, and the court dismissed the plea of appellant. About one year after this order was made the appellant filed another plea to the jurisdiction, in which the same allegations were made, and also charged that appellee obtained the first order in her favor by fraud and false testimony. The court again heard all the testimony, and decided the question in favor of appellee.

Conceding that the first order was not final, which we do not decide, the court, on the second application, heard all the evidence, saw and knew most of the witnesses, and since the evidence was conflicting, we do not feel justified in deciding that appellee made a false statement when she said that her residence in Owensboro was only a temporary residence; that she claimed her residence all the time in Logan county, Kentucky, and that Logan county, Kentucky, at the time she instituted this action was her place of residence. The verdict appears large, but when considered in the light of all the facts introduced in evidence, and the age (twenty nine), strength and health of the deceased, we can not say that the jury exceeded the amount the appellee was entitled to recover.

Wherefore, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MARAMAN BROS. v. TROUTMAN.

(Filed February 5, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Title—Possession—This action is in effect an action of trespass to try title to land. Held—That appellee having proven that he and those from whom he purchased had enjoyed the adverse possession of the lot of ground, eighty-five feet in length and about twenty in width, for about twenty years, has the better title to same.

Ben Chapeze and Chapeze & Halstead for appellants.

Chas. Carroll for appellee.

Appeal from Bullitt Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

This action was instituted in the Bullitt Circuit Court, and though styled a suit in equity, it is in fact more in the nature of an action of trespass to try title. The lot in controversy is eighty-five feet in length and about twenty in width. Appellee owns one and a half acres of ground which he claims embraces the strip in controversy. About 1893 the one and a half acres were purchased by Troutman Bros. from the estate of George Withers, and they received a deed thereto from his heirs. Later, Troutman Bros. sold and conveyed the lot to appellee, C. F. Troutman. George Withers bought the lot of Wesley Phelps, and according to the proof was in actual possession of it as far back as 1883, and he and his heirs seem to have held the actual and adverse possession of same from that time continuously down to the time of the sale and conveyance of it to the Troutmans. It also appears that the Troutmans took possession of the lot when they purchased it, and have had the possession ever since. When they bought the lot it was enclosed by a fence which stood at the time of the institution of this suit in practically the same condition as when they bought the lot. They always claimed to the fence which enclosed the ground in controversy.

The answer of appellant contains a traverse of the petition, a claim of title and possession in themselves, and a plea of the statute of champerty.

In April, 1893, appellants entered upon the land in controversy, dug post holes thereon, set posts and erected a fence by which they attempted to enclose the strip in controversy. In doing this work they obstructed any entrance into appellee's lot except by going to the rear and tearing down the fence. Appellants' contention is that the strip in controversy is a part of a lot purchased by them of George Simmons, for which they received of him a deed that was acknowledged by the grantor April 2, 1900. In this deed it is recited as to the land in controversy, "It is further agreed that any part of the west side of said lot that may be enclosed or used by any person or persons is accepted by the grantees in statu quo, and in this manner the grantees hereby convey same." It would seem, therefore, that Simmons did not regard his title to the land in controversy good, and the expressions in the deed mentioned would seem to indicate that Simmons and appellants then knew that some person or persons other than Simmons held the possession of the land in dispute. Simmons' possession of the ground described in his deed to appellants, exclusive of this strip, was as old or older than the possession of appellee and the Withers.

There is some testimony from Simmons and one or two others to the effect that in a conversation with the widow of Withers some years after his death, he (Simmons) made some remark to her about her use of the ground in controversy, which he then claimed and she likewise claimed, and that he told her that she might have the use of the disputed strip as long as she lived, to which she replied, "all right." Even if this be true, it could not affect the title of her children, nor of appellee, their vendee, for the old woman only owned a homestead or dower in the lot. Her children were the true owners, subject to her dower or homestead.

We find from the evidence that appellee's possession of the ground in controversy, and that of those under whom he claims it, goes back to 1888, a period of nearly twenty years, and that possession seems to have been actual, continuous and adverse to appellants and all others. It may also be said that appellants' possession goes back through themselves and their vendors even a greater length of time than the possession shown by appellee, but they do not seem to have had actual possession of the ground in dispute until about the date of their deed from Simmons, at which time they forcibly, or, at any rate, without appellee's consent, took possession of it.

It is evident that the chancellor gave the parties to this action every liberty that could have been claimed in taking proof. The witnesses are numerous, and are doubtless known to the chancellor. With all the lights before him he came to the conclusion that appellee was entitled to the possession of the ground in controversy, and to $40 in damages for the trespass committed by appellants. An examination of the record has given us no cause, or ground, for disturbing his judgment, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

HARDIN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 5, 1903.)

Criminal law—Malicious shooting and wounding—Instructions—Appellant was tried under an indictment charging him with unlawfully, willfully and maliciously shooting and wounding another, a felony under section 1242, Kentucky Statutes, and was convicted, from which he has appealed. Held—That the court should have confined its instruction to the definition of the offense as given in section 1242, Kentucky Statutes, and not have used in instruction No. 2 the words "and under circumstances reasonably calculated to excite his passion beyond his power of control." These words were prejudicial to appellant. The offenses described in sections 1166 and 1242, Kentucky Statutes, were misdemeanors at common law, and the definition of each as fixed by statute should be followed.

M. B. Bowden and Roy R. Clark for appellant.

Clifton J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant was tried in the Logan Circuit Court on an indictment charging him with unlawfully, willfully and maliciously shooting and wounding one Will Grimes, with the intent to kill said Gaines, and on the trial the evidence showed that the appellant was, at the time, the keeper of a pool room in the town of Russellville, and Gaines and others were in front of his building using boisterous language, and that appellant went out of his room on the pavement, where the parties were, and requested them to keep quiet or leave, and appellant and Gaines had an altercation of words, all that was said and done not being made clear, but the accused stepped back, or in his door, and fired and wounded Gaines in the leg. The court gave to the jury instructions, of which No. 2 was excepted to by the appellant, and is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence, to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Jonah Hardin, did, in Logan county, Kentucky, within one year before the finding the indictment, unlawfully and willfully, and not in his necessary self-defense, or apparently necessary self-defense, and in sudden affray, or sudden heat and passion, without previous malice, and under circumstances reasonably calculated to excite his passions beyond his power of self-control, shoot at and wound one Will Gaines, upon his body or person with a pistol, a deadly weapon, loaded with leaden ball or balls, or ball or balls of other hard substance, with the intent to kill him, but without so doing, then, and in that event, the jury shall find the defendant not guilty as charged in the indictment, but guilty of shooting and wounding in sudden affray, or sudden heat and passion, and fix his punishment at a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or imprisonment in the county jail for a period of time not less than six months nor more than twelve months, or both fine and imprisonment in their discretion."

Prior to the enactment of the statutes defining the offenses described in sections 1166 and 1242 of the Kentucky Statutes the offenses named therein were misdemeanors under the common law. The legislature of the State deemed it necessary to enact statutes with reference to such offenses, and in doing so it defined the offense of shooting and wounding another, as described in section 1166, and the offense of shooting in sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, as defined in section 1242, and fixing the penalties to be imposed under each section. The offense, as defined in section 1242, is: "If any person shall, in sudden affray, or in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice, and not in self-defense, shoot at, etc." This, we understand to be a complete definition of the offense to be punished by said section. If the legislature had intended that the language used in instruction No. 2, "and under circumstances reasonably calculated to excite his passion beyond his power of self-control," be added to said definition, it would have been in said section.

It is contended by the Commonwealth that the same principles governing a prosecution under sections 1166 and 1242 of the statutes are the same as the common law offenses of murder and voluntary manslaughter, and refer this court to the cases of Rapp v. Commonwealth, 14 B. M., 494, and Young v. Commonwealth, 2 Duvall, 375. In these cases the court was discussing common law offenses, and the language used by the court is subject to the construction claimed by the attorney general. But, in our opinion, the cases referred to have no application to prosecutions under the two sections of the statutes above referred to, for the reason that the common law definition of murder is a very different thing from the statutory offense of shooting and wounding as described and defined under section 1166, and the definition of the common law offense of voluntary manslaughter is a very different thing from the statutory offense of shooting and wounding, as described and defined under section 1242 of the statutes, and the court, in said instruction No. 2, should have confined itself to the definition as given in section 1242 of the statutes, and the interpolation of the language referred to was prejudicial to the appellant.

Wherefore, the judgment of conviction of appellant is reversed and the case remanded to the lower court for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WOOLLEY v. MILLER, JUDGE, &c.

(Filed February 6, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Writ of prohibition—The appellant, as chancellor, rendered a judgment enforcing a lien for taxes on real property and reserved the question as to whether a personal judgment should be rendered against W. An appeal was prosecuted from the judgment enforcing the lien, and W. fearing that the court would render a personal judgment against him, applied for a writ of prohibition. Held—That as the decision enforcing the lien has been affirmed, this court will not prejudge the right to a personal judgment by granting the writ of prohibition.

H. L. Lane, W. S. Pryor and R. W. Woolley for plaintiff.

H. L. Stone for City of Louisville.

Shackelford Miller for defendant.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery division.

Judge Paynter delivered the following response to petition for writ of prohibition :

By this proceeding the petitioner sought to have this court issue a writ of prohibition against the Hon. Shackelford Miller, judge of the chancery branch, first division, of the Jefferson Circuit Court, to prevent him from adjudging the question as to the right of the city of Louisville, the plaintiff in action No. 4,992, to a personal judgment against the petitioner.

The suit was to enforce an alleged lien for taxes on property belonging to the petitioner and others, and to obtain a personal judgment against him for the amount thereof. Judgment was rendered, giving the city a lien upon property for the taxes ascertained to be due the city. In that judgment a reservation was made in language as follows: "No personal judgment is now rendered in favor of plaintiff against either of the defendants for any part of the taxes, interest and costs aforesaid."

The petitioner prosecuted an appeal from the judgment and superseded it. Subsequently the city attorney desired to have the defendant, Judge Miller, pass upon the city's right to a personal judgment, and thereupon the petition was filed herein for the purpose of having this court issue a writ prohibiting the defendant from doing so. The court awarded the writ prohibiting the defendant from passing upon the question pending the appeal. The writ was granted upon the idea that no proceedings should be had in the court below until the appeal was finally disposed of, as the supersedeas suspended further proceedings therein. The court has disposed of the appeal. The question which now confronts us is whether the writ shall be kept in force, thus preventing Judge Miller from finally determining the question of the right of the city to a personal judgment against the petitioner for the taxes sought to be recovered. The judgment did not dismiss the parties, nor did it purport to grant part of the relief sought and deny plaintiff's right to the other relief for which it prayed. The language used manifested a purpose to reserve the question as to the right of the city to a personal judgment. If we should take the opposing view, then we would hold that when the court said that "no personal judgment is now rendered" it was equivalent to saying that the plaintiff is not entitled to a personal judgment. The court might have used more apt language in reserving the question for future consideration. The mere fact that inartificial language was employed to express the purpose of the court can not have the effect of depriving the court of jurisdiction to adjudicate the question which it manifestly intended to reserve.

Section 376 of the Civil Code provides that "in an action to enforce a mortgage or other lien judgment may be rendered for a sale of the property and recovery of the debt against the defendant personally." This section expressly provides that in an action to enforce a lien a judgment in rem and in personam may be rendered. Suppose in such an action the court should render a personal judgment against the defendant, and would add thereto that no judgment in rem is now rendered. Certainly the court would be compelled to hold that the question of the plaintiff's right to a judgment in rem had been reserved for future adjudication. We are of the opinion that the court in its judgment reserved the right to pass upon the question of personal judgment. It would not be proper for us to intimate what, if any, judgment should be rendered, as that question must be determined by the court below.

Motion for the writ is overruled.

Whole court sitting.

Judge Hobson dissenting.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF NEW YORK v. SINCLAIR.

(Filed February 6, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Insurance—Delivery of policies—Agents—Appellee brought this action to compel appellant to deliver to him two policies of life insurance for $5,000 each. He made a written application for two policies, for $5,000 each, to the Nashville agency, and agreed to accept one of them absolutely and was to have an option of sixty days to decide as to his accepting the second policy. Both policies were issued and sent to the agent at Russellville. Appellee accepted one of the policies and paid the premium on it. The other policy remained in the hands of the agent, and within the sixty days, he tendered the premium and demanded the policy, but the company refused to deliver it to him, on the ground that it was stipulated in the application that the policy should not be delivered until the insured had paid the premium during his good health, and that subsequent to the issue of the policy, and prior to the tender of the premium, appellee had received several pistol shot wounds, which the company deemed sufficient grounds for refusing the risk.

Held—That the company could not be compelled to deliver the policy while appellee had the option to accept the policy and pay the premium within sixty days, it was on condition that he should remain in good health. The second policy which the company is asked to be compelled to deliver was issued from the Louisville agency on an application containing the same condition as to good health of the insured. A., the agent at Pembroke, went to Russellville, the home of appellee, and the kind of policy agreed on, the application was signed, and it was agreed that the application and policy should be issued in the name of B., a brother of A., who was also an agent. It was understood that A. and B. would share the commission to be received from the premium. The policy was issued and mailed to B. at Pembroke, but before it arrived B., who left Pembroke, requested his brother, A., to receive the policy. After appellee had received the pistol wounds he tendered the premium and demanded that the policy be delivered to him, but the company ordered that it be not delivered to him. Appellee claims that the policy having been delivered to A., he was his agent, and not the agent of the company. Held—That the company had the right after appellee received the wounds to refuse to deliver the policy. A. was the agent of appellant and not of appellee, and a delivery of the policy to A. was not a delivery to appellee.

Edward Layman Short, Frederick L. Allen, Browder & Browder and Grubbs & Grubbs for appellant.

W. P. Sandidge and W. L. Reeves for appellee.

Appeal from Logan Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellee, Sinclair, instituted this action to compel the appellant to deliver to him two certain policies of insurance on his life for $5,000 each. On December 11, 1899, the appellee made a written application to the appellant's Nashville, Tenn., agency for two policies on his life for $5,000 each, but it was understood that it was optional with him to take one of them. Both policies were issued, but the one actually contracted to be taken was delivered and accepted, but the other remained in the hands of the appellant's agent with the agreement that the appellee, within a specified time, had the right to take it. On December 14, 1899, the appellee made application, in writing, to the appellant's agency at Pembroke, Ky., for a policy on his life for $5,000. The application was forwarded to the home office of the appellant, it was approved, and the policy was issued and forwarded to the agency at Pembroke, Ky.

The policy for which application was made at Nashville is known in this record as the Tennessee policy, and the one for which application was made to the Pembroke agency is known as the Kentucky policy, and, for convenience, we will so designate them.

TENNESSEE POLICY.

The appellee claims that the agent of the company agreed, when he made the application for the Tennessee policies, that he would certainly take one of them, and that he should have sixty days in which to take the other one; in other words, that he, by that contract, acquired an option on the policy, and as he tendered the premium thereon within that period, he was entitled to it. The appellee thus claims that there was a consideration for the option on the second policy. The appellant claims, first, that there was no consideration for the option, as they were independent contracts; second, that by the terms of the application the appellee expressly agreed that the policy was not to be in force "until the first premium shall have been paid during my continuance in good health." This quotation is taken from the application which the appellee made for the policies.

The facts are that after the first policy had been delivered to the appellee, and before the tender of the premium on the second one, the appellee received several pistol shot wounds, and from which he was suffering at the time the premium which was to be paid upon the policy was tendered and the policy demanded for it. After the general agent of the company learned of the appellee's condition he notified the Nashville agency not to deliver the policy. The question of the right to acquire an option upon a policy of insurance is ably and interestingly discussed by counsel for the appellee.

The evidence does not establish the fact that the appellant, through its agent or otherwise, agreed to waive the condition that the policy was not to go into effect until the first premium was paid while the applicant was in good health. There is evidence to show that there was an agreement that the policy in question was to be held and the appellee should have time in which to determine whether or not he would accept it, but he has failed to establish that there was an agreement to the effect that appellant's agents were to accept the premium when the applicant was not in good health. The mere fact that the appellant agreed to hold the policy for a certain period for the appellee to determine whether or not during that time that he would accept the policy did not, and could not, have the effect of waiving the necessity for the payment of the first premium while the applicant was in good health. The premium was not tendered while he was in good health. The evidence fails to show that the appellee's life will not be shortened by reason of the injuries which he received. The most that it does is to show that some persons have lived many years after having received injuries of the character of those inflicted upon the appellee. The appellant can not be compelled to assume a risk in the absence of a contract imposing it. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court properly refused to compel the appellant to deliver the Tennessee policy.

KENTUCKY POLICY.

Eustis Hall and his brother, Elvis A. Hall, were the agents of the appellant at Pembroke, Ky., on the 14th day of December, 1899. Before that date the appellee, who was a friend of Eustis, notified him that he desired to take out a policy of insurance in the appellant company. Eustis promptly went to Russellville, where the appellee lived, to see him in regard to it, for he said "I had always regarded him as a good subject to insure, and kept my eye on him as a matter of course." After discussing the matter for some time, they agreed upon the character of policy for which the appellee was to make application. After doing this Eustis then told Sinclair that he wanted the application to go in in the name of his brother, Elvis, whereupon the appellee agreed to it, but enjoined him to look after it for him and see that it was attended to properly. The blank application was filled out by Elvis Hail and signed by the appellee and forwarded to the company, approved by it and the policy issued and mailed to Elvis. Elvis was called away from home on some business, and, expecting the policy to reach Pembroke during his absence, he told his brother Eustis to take it out of the office, which he did. The two brothers were to participate in the commission, a per cent. of the first premium, which was to be paid them by the company for securing the policy, Elvis to receive the greater part of it. The policy was never forwarded to the appellee.

There is a provision in the application that the policy was not to be put in force until the first premium was paid while the applicant was in good health. After the appellee received the wounds heretofore mentioned the general agent at Louisville inquired of Elvis Hail if the policy had been delivered, and Hail told him that it had not. Thereupon he was instructed to return it, which was accordingly done. The premium was not tendered by the appellee until after he received the wounds mentioned, nor was the policy ever delivered, unless the facts which we will hereafter state amount in law to a delivery of it. It is claimed by the appellee that it was delivered to Eustis Hail for him, which was equivalent to a delivery to him, as Eustis was his agent; that although the premium had not been actually paid, the delivery of the policy to Eustis was a waiver of the provisions of the policy, which required it to be paid while the applicant was in good health. This claim is based upon the idea that Eustis was not the agent of the company in the transaction, but was the agent of the appellee, because the appellee had permitted the application to go in in the name of Elvis and had requested Eustis to see that the policy was properly issued.

Eustis testified that at the time appellee agreed to take the policy he told him that he could charge the premium to the "Pembroke account" (which was an account in the bank, of which Eustis was cashier, in his and Sinclair's name), or charge it to him on his (Eustis') own books, or to draw on appellee for it. It may be added here that neither of these things was ever done. Appellant insists that there was no delivery of the policy; that Eustis was its agent and not that of the appellee, and the fact that he took it from the postoffice in the absence of his brother was not intended as, nor did it amount to, a delivery of the policy to appellee. In addition, it claims that the premium was never paid at all, and, of course, not paid during the good health of the applicant; and, further, that there was a provision in the policy that the Hails were not authorized to waive the necessity of the payment of the premium before the delivery of the policy, and, therefore, if Eustis was the agent of the appellee, and Elvis delivered the policy to him as such, he could not waive this condition.

Eustis was as much the agent of the company as was his brother Elvis; he was the active agent in securing the application for this policy; he participated with his brother in the agent's commission, and the mere fact that for some business reason he preferred the application to be sent in by his brother, did not alter his relationship to the appellant. The appellee dealt with him as agent of the appellant, but as appellee had confidence in him, and was not so well acquainted with his brother, he enjoined upon Eustis to see that the business was properly transacted. That request and agreement to do so could not dissolve the relationship of agency and principal which existed between Eustis and the appellant, and make him the agent of the appellee in the transaction. As the application was made in the name of Elvis, the policy was forwarded to him at Pembroke, and he requested his brother to get the envelope containing the policy and open it. The policy was in the hands of the agent of the appellant, whether with Eustis or Elvis.

As an evidence that Eustis did not regard the delivery to him as a delivery to appellee he never charged the premium to the account of Sinclair and Hall, nor to Sinclair on his own books, nor did he draw on Sinclair for the amount of it. Eustis was asked the following question: "But you had not determined when you received the policy in what manner you would attempt to collect that premium?" He answered: "No, sir; I had not, because I expected to go to Russellville and finally close up the other transaction." His testimony shows that he intended to deliver in person the policy to Sinclair and to go to Russellville for that purpose, and to try to get appellee to accept another policy.

Elvis Hall evidently did not regard the policy as delivered at the time he was instructed to return it, because he told the general agent that it had not been delivered, and that the premium had never been paid upon the policy. Eustis at the time did not believe it had been delivered, or that he held it for appellee, as he consented to the return of the policy to the company.

We are of the opinion from the facts shown, that Eustis was not the agent of the appellee in this transaction, but that of the company. We are further of the opinion that the receipt of the policy by Eustis was not intended as, and did not amount to, a delivery of the policy to the appellee. We differ from the circuit court in its finding on this question, as it held that the delivery of the policy to Eustis was a delivery to the appellee. Having reached the foregoing conclusion, it is unnecessary to discuss the question as to what would have been the effect of the transaction had the policy been delivered to Eustis, as the agent of the appellee, before the payment of the premium by the applicant.

The judgment is reversed on the original, with directions to the court below to dismiss the petition, and is affirmed on the cross appeal.

NELSON MANUFACTURING CO. v. MANN BROS.

Lien—Material men's lien—Appellees made a contract with J. & Son to put in their building hot water heating apparatus of certain specifications for the price of $1,800, $800 to be paid in cash and a note for the residue, payable in ninety days from the completion of the work. J. & Son made a contract with appellant to furnish them the material necessary for the work at the price of $1,286.44. The work was completed. Appellees paid to J. & Son the sum of $800, but refused to execute the note for the residue, claiming that the work was not done according to contract. Appellant filed its claim of lien under section 2463 of Kentucky Statutes against the property of appellees. Issues were joined between appellees and J. & Son as to the amount of damage sustained by the imperfect heating apparatus. The court adjudged that appellant was entitled to a judgment against J. & Son for the amount of their claim, but that the payment to J. & Son of $800 was to be credited on their claim, and that they have a lien on the property for $225, and that same be sold to satisfy said lien. It was also adjudged that appellees had been damaged $745 by putting in the defective heating apparatus. On appeal. Held—That it was error to credit appellant's claim with the $800 paid to J. & Son, but appellants are entitled to a lien under the statute for the full amount of their claim against appellee's property, as the statute makes it the duty of the property owner to see that all claims for material put in his house are paid for and he can not evade this lien by paying to the contractor the full amount of the contract price. The damages allowed were more than appellees had sustained.

Yeaman & Yeaman for appellant.

S. B. & R. D. Vance for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellees, Mann Bros., who are merchants in Henderson, Ky., entered into a written contract with T. M. Jenkins & Son, plumbers, to put into their three-story building, at the corner of Second and Main streets, in Henderson, a hot-water heating apparatus, at the agreed price of $1,800, $800 of which was to be paid in cash, and for the balance appellees were to execute their note, payable in ninety days after completion of the work. By the terms of the agreement it was stipulated that the heating plant in question was to be first-class in every respect, and of sufficient capacity to heat the first and second stories of the building at 70 degrees fahr., when the temperature on the outside is not colder than twenty degrees below zero; the radiators and all other work to be first class material, good style, and all necessary parts painted, and the work to be first-class in every respect. Said plant was to be so constructed as to burn hard or soft coal, and pea or slack coal if desired; flues to be made suitable for the plant.

In order to carry out said contract Jenkins & Son entered into negotiations with the appellants, the Nelson Manufacturing Co., of St. Louis, Mo., who were dealers in the material used in making such a heating plant as was contemplated by the contract between Jenkins & Son and appellees. These negotiations resulted in a sale by appellants to Jenkins & Son of the necessary material to carry out their said contract, at the agreed price of $1,286 44. One of appellant's salesmen, L. B. Yeiser, visited Henderson, and assisted in the measurements and calculations and negotiations between Jenkins & Son and appellees, which took place prior to the consummation of the contract in question.

The plant was duly installed by Jenkins & Son, on the 30th day of November, 1899, before which time appellees paid over to Jenkins & Son, the contractors, the sum of $800, but declined to execute their note for the remaining sum of $1,000, and finally declined to pay anything further on the contract, claiming that the plant was worthless, and utterly failed to come up to the stipulations and agreements contained in the written contract between them and the contractors. Whereupon appellants, as the statute provides, filed their claim for a material man's lien, in the office of the Henderson County Court, within the time prescribed by law, and afterwards instituted this action in the Henderson Circuit Court against Jenkins & Son, the contractors, and Mann Bros., the owners of the building in question, for the purpose of obtaining judgment for their claim and the enforcement of their material man's lien.

The issues between the parties were duly made up, and involved the question as to whether or not the heating plant came up to the terms of the contract between Jenkins & Son and appellees, and, if not, what damage appellees had sustained by reason of such failure. A great deal of testimony was given upon this mooted question, and when the case was finally submitted, the chancellor rendered a judgment in favor of appellants against Jenkins & Son for the full amount of their claim, $1,286.44, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from November 30, 1899, until paid, and adjudged that the appellants were entitled to a lien on the property of appellees, in which the heating plant had been installed, for the sum of $225, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from November 30, 1899, until paid, and entered an order of sale of the property for the purpose of enforcing this lien. From this judgment only the appellants, the Nelson Manufacturing Co., are complaining.

The chancellor evidently reached the conclusion that the payment of $800 to Jenkins & Son, the contractors, by appellees, the owners of the building, was valid as against the claim of appellants for their material, and that the plant fell short of the contract stipulations, and that appellees were damaged in the sum of $745 by reason of this failure on the part of Jenkins & Son to comply with their contract; he evidently believed, as the evidence indubitably shows, that all of the material furnished by appellants to Jenkins & Son was first-class, and suitable for the purpose for which it was sold, as he gave judgment in their favor against Jenkins & Son for the full amount of the contract price for the material in question.

We shall first examine the question of law which arises out of the payment by appellees to Jenkins & Son of the sum of $800, and ascertain whether or not this payment relieved appellee of the duty imposed upon them by the statute, to see that the material man's claim was paid.

Section 2463 of the Kentucky Statutes contains the law affording to material men liens for the amount of their claim, where they have furnished material for the purpose of improving real estate. It is not necessary to set forth this section herein; we deem it sufficient to say that the statute amply covers the claim of appellants in this case. This statute has been construed by this court in several cases, and the question of law herein involved has been adjudicated. The constitutionality of the act was upheld in the case of Hightower v. Bailey & Kerner, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 88. In this case the court, by Hazelrigg, Chief Justice, said: "This statute is radically different from our former laws on this subject, and has not heretofore been before this court for construction.

"The preceding statute, while giving liens to contractors, subcontractors, material men and laborers, practically, thereby, provides a process of garnishment in the hands of the owner of any money he might owe the contractor. Its purpose was merely to substitute the subcontractor, material man and laborer to the rights of the contractor, and was effectual only in the event the owner was indebted to the contractor. It was entirely safe for the owner, without notice of the claims of others, to pay his contractor when he pleased, even in advance. The present statute was clearly meant to fasten, and it does fasten, on the property owner a lien for the claims of the subcontractor, material man and laborer, although the owner has no notice of such claims, and may owe the contractor nothing."

This case was cited and approved in the case of Browinski v. Pickett, &c., 24 Ky. Law Rep., 305. In this case the owner of the building in question had paid over to his contractor all of the contract price of the building except the sum of $874.41, whereas the claims due to various parties who had furnished material in the erection of the building amounted to $2,992.24. The owner prorated the balance in his hands among these various parties, tendering to Browinski & Adcock, who had furnished paints, putty and glass for the building in question to the value of $856.53, the sum of $265.62, as their pro rata of the balance remaining in his hands. Browinski & Adcock refused to accept the sum thus tendered, and having complied with the statute, in order to effectuate their lien, brought suit to enforce the same for the full amount of their claim. Upon final submission the chancellor gave judgment against the contractor for the full amount of the material man's claim, and adjudged said material man a lien on the real estate of the owner for the sum of $346.61. From this judgment the material man appealed, because he was not adjudged a lien for the full amount of his claim, $856.53, and the owner of the building prosecuted a cross appeal, because the sum awarded the material man as lien was in excess of $265.62. There was no dispute in this case that the owner of the building had paid over to the contractor, upon estimate of the architect, all but the balance above stated. In the opinion of this court, Burnam, Judge, it is said: "There is no doubt that appellants furnished the material sued for to Pickett to be used by him in the erection of appellee's house, and that they were so used. The statute, under this state of facts, gave to appellants a lien upon the land on which the building was erected which can not be evaded by the owner paying to the contractor on estimates made by the architect, and the fact that he did so furnishes no defense to the claim sued for. The only limitations upon the liens of persons who furnished labor and material in the erection of the building is that they shall in no case be for a greater amount than the contract price of the original structure. The report of the commissioner shows that the appellants are the only parties who have availed themselves of this provision, and secured a lien upon the property of appellees.

"It is insisted for appellees that before a material man can acquire a lien under the statute it must appear that the material was obtained by the contractor as the agent of the owner for use in the construction of the building; that if purchased in his own name, with the intention to be used in the construction of the building, that the material man would acquire no lien upon the property, even for the materials that were actually used in the building. There is nothing in the statute which is susceptible of such a construction. On the contrary, it says in plain terms that a person who performs labor, or furnishes materials in the erection, altering or repairing of a house by contract with the owner, contractor, subcontractor, architect or authorized agents, shall have a lien thereon, and upon the land upon which said improvements shall have been made. The testimony in this case is up both to the letter and spirit of the statute, and we think the chancellor erred in not adjudging appellants entitled to a lien on the property for the full amount of their claim."

We do not see how the legal effect of the payment to Jenkins & Son can be distinguished from the payment so made by the owner of the building, Barker, to his contractor, Pickett, in the case cited. The owner of the building, in cases like the one involved here, pays money to his contractor at his peril. It is immaterial whether he knows of the claim or not; the statute casts upon him the duty, to the extent of the full contract price of the improvement to be made, of seeing to it that the material men, who have furnished material for the work provided for by the contract, are paid. No payments made by him to his contractor will relieve him of this duty, and, as said before, the question as to whether or not he knew of the claims of the material men at the time of the payment to the contractor is entirely immaterial. (Hodges v. Arvidson, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 207S.)

The chancellor, therefore, erred in allowing the payment of $800 to Jenkins & Son, contractors, as a credit against the claim of appellants on their claim for the material furnished by them.

In regard to the question of the amount of damages allowed by the chancellor to Mann Bros. for the alleged failure of the heating apparatus to come up to the specifications in the contract, we are, after a careful reading of the record, convinced that it was entirely too large. We do not believe that a preponderance of the evidence warrants the conclusion that it would require $745 to make the heating plant in question come up to the stipulations of the contract. We are not profoundly impressed with appellees' evidence as to the deficiencies of the heating plant. It is not necessary to state the effect of the evidence in this case with any great particularity, but we believe that a good deal less money than $745 will supply all the deficiencies of the heating plant, if there be any; and we think, as said before, that the chancellor erred in allowing so large a sum as against the material men, the appellants.

Wherefore, the case is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment giving appellants a lien on the building of appellees for $1,286.44, with interest from November 30, 1899, until paid, to be credited by any sum or sums of money which may have been paid by appellees to appellants since the judgment was rendered.

ANGLIN v. CONLEY.

(Filed February 6, 1903.)

Fraudulent conveyances—Mortgages—Appellee instituted this action in equity to set aside a deed of conveyance made by A. to B., his brother, alleging that he had obtained a judgment against A. for $850 damages for an assault and battery committed on him; that prior to obtaining this judgment A. had made a conveyance to B. of his one-fifth interest in land. Appellee alleged that this conveyance was made without any consideration, and with the fraudulent intent of cheating and defrauding his creditors. The court set aside the conveyance and ordered the land sold to satisfy appellee's judgment. On appeal it is insisted that appellee was not a creditor of A. Held—That appellee was a creditor of A., but the proof shows that B. had furnished to A. about $500, besides had paid for him about $1,200 attorneys' fees, but he had no knowledge of any fraudulent intent on the part of A. to defraud his creditors, and the conveyance of the land was in effect a mortgage which gave B. a prior lien on the land for money advanced and paid for A. Appellee is entitled to a second lien on said land to satisfy his debt.

Theobald & Theobald and C. B. Wilhoit for appellant.

G. W. Armstrong, H. L. Woods and R. D. Davis for appellee.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The object of this suit was to set aside a deed which Talton B. Anglin executed and delivered to the appellant, James E. Anglin, by which he conveyed to him an undivided fifth interest in a certain tract of land, the appellee claiming that at the time of its conveyance he was a creditor of the grantor. The deed was dated July 10, was acknowledged on the 15th and lodged for record on the 22d of the same month. The consideration recited in the deed was $500 cash in hand paid and love and affection, the grantor and the grantee being brothers.

From the averments of the petition it appears that on the 4th day of July, 1896, the grantor, Talton B. Anglin, shot and wounded the appellee, Conley; that on the 30th day of that month the appellee instituted an action against him for maliciously shooting and wounding him; that subsequently he recovered a judgment against him for $850 and costs; that on the 14th day of August, 1898, this action was instituted in equity for the purpose heretofore stated. It is averred in the petition that the conveyance was made by the grantor to the grantee for the purpose of hindering and delaying the grantor's creditors in the collection of their debts, and that it was made without any good or valuable consideration. The appellant moved the court to compel the appellee to paraphrase his petition, upon the idea that it stated two causes of action: First, because it was averred the grantor executed it with fraudulent intent to cheat his creditors; second, because it was averred that the deed was made without consideration, hence a voluntary conveyance. To paraphrase the averments of the petition they simply amount to the charge that it was a voluntary conveyance without consideration, with the fraudulent intent to cheat the grantor's creditors. In our opinion there is but one cause of action attempted to be stated.

The first question which we will consider is whether or not the appellee was a creditor of Talton B. Anglin at the time the conveyance was made or had such claim as would enable him to have the conveyance set aside upon a proper showing. It is urged in behalf of the appellant that the appellee was not a creditor of the grantor because the liability had not been fixed by a judgment of the court. It was held in Lillard v. McGee, 4 Bibb., 165, that a person who recovers judgment in slander is a creditor within the meaning of the statute. In Slater v. Sherman, 5 Bush, 206, it was held that one who had a claim against another growing out of assault and battery had the right to have a fraudulent conveyance set aside, although made before the judgment was rendered in his favor. The doctrine in those cases settles the question here that the appellee was a creditor of the grantor. The facts are about these: The appellant knew of the assault which his brother had made upon the appellee; the brother intended to evade prosecution by leaving the State and obtained from the appellant $500, with the understanding that he was subsequently to convey to him his interest in the land, which was afterwards done by the deed in question. Before that was consummated the grantor returned to Kentucky and either surrendered himself or was arrested. The deed seems to have been drawn on that day, but not acknowledged until five days thereafter, and recorded at the time heretofore stated. The appellant knew the purpose which his brother had in view in obtaining the $500, which was to evade, for a time at least, a prosecution by the Commonwealth. After the grantor placed himself, or had been placed, in the custody of the law, the transaction was consummated by the execution of the deed. There is no evidence in the record that either the grantee or the grantor was aware of the fact that the appellee had a cause of action against the grantor for the injury which he had inflicted upon him, so that at the time the $500 was furnished it is certain that the only purpose to be accomplished was the evasion of prosecution by the Commonwealth.

Although the action of the appellant might have facilitated the grantor's effort to evade such prosecution, that unlawful act could not enure to the benefit of the appellee in this action. The rights of the appellee must be determined from the facts independent of the unlawful act of the appellant, if it was so, to show a willingness to facilitate the escape of his brother from a penal or criminal prosecution. The deed recites a payment of $500 by the appellant. The grantor and the appellant were introduced as witnesses by the appellee, and they both testified that $500 was paid, and that after the grantor was in custody of the officers of the law they made an additional agreement, before the deed was delivered, as to the consideration for the conveyance, to the effect that the appellant was to furnish money to pay the grantor's attorneys, the cost in defense of the prosecution and any fine that might be recovered against him. They stand uncontradicted upon these questions. The proof shows that the sums paid to lawyers, etc., amounted to about $1,200, in addition to the $500 which had already been paid. The mere fact that the appellant knew that the grantor had assaulted the appellee did not charge him with notice that a cause of action existed in his favor against the grantor, or that the grantor was making the conveyance with a fraudulent intent to evade the payment of such judgment as might be recovered thereon. If the grantor had a fraudulent intent in making the conveyance to cheat the appellee, that fact would not deprive the appellant of his right to assert his claim against the land for the sums paid for the consideration in the purchase of it unless he actually had knowledge of the fraudulent intent.

The appellant and his brother seem to have lived together with their grandmother on a part of the land which was conveyed, and they continued to so live after the conveyance, but this fact will not justify a court in treating the conveyance as fraudulent, and this court has frequently so held. Under all the circumstances, we are of the opinion that as the exact amount which was to be paid for the land could not be told and was not agreed upon, the deed should be considered as a mortgage to secure whatever sums of money the appellant paid the grantor and for him on account of the prosecution. As the appellee did not file a petition in equity before he obtained his judgment, this is no case for the application of section 1907a, Kentucky Statutes.

The case is reversed, with directions that the court adjudge the appellant a lien upon the land for the sums he paid to and for his brother, Talton B. Anglin, as consideration for the land, which is the $500, and the amounts paid the attorneys, costs and fines; that the appellee be awarded a lien for his debt, interests and costs, subordinate to that of the appellant, and that the interest conveyed by Talton B. Anglin in the property be sold to satisfy these claims and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RALEIGH v. CLARK.

(Filed February 6, 1903.)

Statute of Limitation—Contracts—Damages—This land of appellant lies adjoining a creek, the land of appellee lies adjoining it and is higher than the land of appellant. The land of M. is higher than the land of appellee, and the drainage from the lands of M. and appellee naturally passes over the lands of appellant. M. had several years ago, by consent of appellee, dug a ditch across appellee's land, which naturally increased the flow of water over the land of appellant. This was before appellant became the purchaser of the land. Afterwards an agreement between appellant and appellee was made, by which appellee agreed to extend the ditch of M. to the creek across appellant's land, and to keep it open, and appellant and appellee were to cut a ditch on appellee's land running at right angles with the other ditch, and connecting with it the line between appellant and appellee. After several years appellee failed to keep open the ditch over appellant's land leading to the creek and the other ditch also filled up, causing the water to again overflow appellant's land, injuring his crops. Appellant brought this action to recover damages for this injury. On the trial the court instructed the jury in substance that if M. and appellee had exercised the privilege of running the water from their farms over appellant's land for more than fifteen years before making the contract, that they should find for defendant. A verdict resulted in favor of defendant, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Held—That said instruction was erroneous. Appellee had waived any rights he might have had in appellant's land prior to making the contract, and he is liable for his failure to keep said ditch open for any damage which was the proximate cause of said failure. The court instructed the jury in substance that if they found for plaintiff the criterion of damages was the value of the crops lost by him by reason of the flooding of the land, or a fair compensation for the injury to the crops and the depreciation of the rental value of the land that was not in crop. The court should have modified this instruction, to the effect that appellant could not recover for any damages which he might have avoided by ordinary care, and that for appellee's failure to keep open the ditch on appellant's land the measure of damages would be the reasonable cost of opening the ditch and keeping it open, in so far as appellant might, by cleaning out the ditch, have avoided the damages complained of.

Ell H. Brown and Miller & Todd for appellant.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellee.

Appeal from Daviess Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant and appellee are farmers, living on Knob Lick creek in Daviess county. It is a flat country, and the stream seems to be a sluggish one. Appellant's land is lower than appellee's and lies north of it between appellee's farm and the creek; to the west of appellee's land is a tract known in the record as the Mattingly land. The drainage from the Clark and Mattingly tract is, by nature, over the land of Raleigh to the creek, but all of the Mattingly land does not drain this way. Many years ago Clark allowed Mattingly to cut a ditch through his land which turned down on the Raleigh place water that would not by nature flow there. This was before Raleigh bought it. The ditch seems to have run to a swag near the line and there stopped. The line between Raleigh and Clark runs east and west. The ditch referred to runs practically from the south to the north. Clark bedded up his land, as seems to be customary in that section, and also dug another ditch. The bed furrows and these ditches took the water down on Raleigh in greater quantities and more rapidly than it would flow on him by nature. In this condition of things, after he bought, an agreement was made between him and Clark by which Clark agreed to extend the Mattingly ditch from Raleigh's line to the creek, and to keep it open, and Clark and Raleigh each agreed to dig a ditch on Clark's land, running east and west on the line between them, to carry the water coming down off Clark's land into this ditch, which Clark was to cut out to the creek. Clark was to dig the ditch on the line on one side of the Mattingly ditch and Raleigh on the other side, and the dirt was to be thrown on the lower side of the ditch. Clark cut the ditch out to the creek, making it something like six feet wide and three feet deep. He and Raleigh also cut the ditch on the line leading into this ditch, making it four feet wide and two feet deep, and throwing the dirt on the lower side. Clark then set his fence on top of this dirt. This served as a barrier to protect Raleigh from the water above, and collect it in the ditches. Things went along very smoothly under this agreement for a number of years. Finally Clark failed to keep the ditch cleaned out across Raleigh's land, which took the water to the creek, and when this ditch filled up the east and west ditches also filled. Raleigh then brought this suit for damages against Clark for the flooding of his land. Clark defended on the ground that Raleigh would not let him clean out the ditch on his land. He also pleaded limitation, alleging that the Mattingly ditch had existed for more than fifteen years, and was in existence when Raleigh bought the place. The proof on the trial showed very clearly that a large amount of water was run over Raleigh's land, and that considerable damage had been done his crop, but the jury under the instructions of the court found for the defendant. The instruction which is chiefly complained of is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the ditch leading from the Mattingly land over the defendant's land to plaintiff's land had been constructed and maintained continually for a period of fifteen years or more next before the contract or agreement between plaintiff and defendant for a continuation of said ditch through the plaintiff's land to Knob Lick creek (if they believe from the evidence there was such an agreement) under a claim of right, then, in that event, the defendant is not liable to plaintiff for any damage that plaintiff may have sustained by water flowing through said ditch, though he failed to comply with the agreement to keep the ditch open on plaintiff's land."

This instruction was erroneous. The contract between Clark and Raleigh was admitted by both parties; it had been carried out by them for a number of years. After getting the benefit of this contract Clark must take it with the burden. He can not be permitted to say that he had a right to maintain the Mattingly ditch, for whatever his rights may have been, he waived them rather than take the chances of standing upon them, and after the lapse of many years, when necessarily the evidence as to whether the ditch was there by permission, or as a matter of right, has been obscured by time, he can not be allowed to go back now and insist upon a matter which he then deliberately waived. We understand the petition to be broad enough to recover for all water sent down upon Raleigh in violation of the agreement between Raleigh and Clark, by reason of Clark's failure to keep the ditch open as he agreed to do, and as under this instruction the verdict of the jury may, under the evidence, have been for Clark without regard to the other matters in controversy, appellant is entitled to a new trial.

As the case must go back for another trial, it is necessary for us to determine whether instruction No. 8, which is objected to, properly defines the measure of damages, for it is to the interest of the parties that on the next trial the case may be fairly submitted to the jury. The thing complained of here is Clark's failure to comply with his agreement and keep open the north and south ditch; also the east and west ditch which he dug on his own land. The rule is elementary that a party suing for damages from the breach of a contract can only recover such damages as naturally and proximately flow from the breach. When Clark failed to keep open the ditch across Raleigh's land, Raleigh might have opened it and recovered the cost of doing the work which Clark had agreed to do, but had not done. The measure of damages for the nonperformance of work of this sort is ordinarily the cost of the work and not the loss which may result to the other party as a consequence of the work's not being done. Thus in Miller v. Mariners' Church, 7 Greenleaf, 51, the court said: "The purchaser of perishable goods at auction fails to complete his contract. What shall be done? Shall the auctioneer leave the goods to perish, and throw the whole loss upon the purchaser? That would be to aggravate it unreasonably and unnecessarily. It is his duty to sell them a second time, and if they bring less, he may recover the difference, with commissions, and other expenses of resale, from the first purchaser.

"If the party entitled to the benefit of a contract, can protect himself from a loss, arising from a breach, at a trifling expense, or with reasonable exertions, he fails in social duty if he omits to do so, regardless of the increased amount of damages for which he may intend to hold the other contracting party liable. Qui non prohibet, cum prohibere possit, jubet. And he who has it in his power to prevent an injury to his neighbor, and does not exercise it, is often in a moral, if not in a legal, point of view accountable for it. The law will not permit him to throw a loss, resulting from a damage to himself, upon another, arising from causes for which the latter may be responsible, which the party sustaining the damage might, by common prudence, have prevented. For example, a party contracts for a quantity of bricks to build a house, to be delivered at a given time; and engages masons and carpenters to go on with the work. The bricks are not delivered. If other bricks of an equal quality, and for the stipulated price, can be at once purchased on the spot, it would be unreasonable, by neglecting to make the purchase, to claim and receive of the delinquent party damages for the workmen, and the amount of rent which might be obtained for the house if it had been built. The party, who is not chargeable with a violation of his contract, should do the best he can in such cases; and for any unavoidable loss occasioned by the failure of the other he is justly entitled to a liberal and complete indemnity."

In 1 Sutherland on Damages, 2d edition, section 88, it is said: "When, after a contract has been entered into between two parties, notice is given by one of them that the contract is rescinded on his part, he is liable for such damages and loss only as the other party has suffered by reason of such rescinding; and it is the duty of such other party, upon receiving such notice, to save the former, as far as it is in his power, all further damages, though the performance of his duty may call for affirmative action. If a person hired for service for a given term is wrongfully dismissed, he is entitled to the stipulated wages for the term of his engagement, if that is his loss. It is prima facie his loss; but the law imposes on him the duty to seek other employment, and to the extent that he obtains it and earns wages, or might have done so, his damages will be reduced. (Lewis v. Scott, 95 Ky., 484.) In an action for damages resulting from alleged defects in the construction of a building so that the roof leaked and injured the interior work or property therein, or for breach of a contract to repair a building from which similar injuries ensued, or for injury to crops through default of the defendant in not building or repairing a fence, or his tortious opening of the same, where the party suffering from the injury is aware of the fact and the cause, and by a little timely labor and expense the damage could be avoided, the law imposes the duty on him to stay the injury, when he is in a favorable situation to do it, and enforces the duty by confining his redress for the injury thus avoidable to compensation for the necessary and proper means of prevention. The duty in such cases is not arbitrarily imposed on the injured party and exacted of him in all cases, to do or amend the work of the other party, or to finish it; but only when in view of all the circumstances of the particular case it is a reasonable duty which he ought to perform instead of passively allowing a greater damage."

In 1 Sedgewick on Damages, the rule is similarly stated: "The same principle which refuses to take into consideration any but the direct consequences of the illegal act is applied to limit the damages where the plaintiff by using reasonable precaution could have reduced them. (Section 201.)

"It is frequently said that it is the duty of the plaintiff to reduce the damages as far as possible. It is more correct to say that by consequences, which the plaintiff acting as prudent men ordinarily do, can avoid, he is not legally damaged. Such consequences can hardly be the direct or natural consequence of the defendant's wrong, since it is at the plaintiff's option to suffer them. They are really excluded from the recovery as remote." (Section 202.)

In subsequent sections it is pointed out that the law requires of the party injured only ordinary care, and that he is not required to commit a trespass or go on the plaintiff's land. (Sections 221, 225.) The authorities on the subject as applied to a case like that before us seems uniform. By the third instruction the court in substance told the jury that if they found for the plaintiff the criterion of damages was the value of the crops lost by him by reason of the flooding of the land, or a fair compensation for the injury to the crops and the depreciation of the rental value of the land that was not in crop. The court should have modified this instruction to the effect that Raleigh could not recover for any damages which he might have avoided by ordinary care, and that for Clark's failure to keep open the north and south ditch on Raleigh's land the measure of damages would be the reasonable cost of opening the ditch and keeping it open, in so far as Raleigh might, by cleaning out the ditch, have avoided the damages complained of.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

WHINERY v. GARRETT, &c.

(Filed February 6, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Usury—Renewal of notes—C., as principal, and appellant, as surety, borrowed sums of money on notes from a bank which were renewed from time to time, the interest on each at the rate of 8 per cent. in advance being included in the renewals. C. having become insolvent, appellant gave his note for the full amount of said debts, which was renewed from time to time until the bank brought suit on said notes. In defense, appellant sought to purge the notes of all usury that had been paid. The court would not allow a recovery of usury prior to the execution of the note by him as surety, assuming payment of the debts. Held—That appellant having been surety on all the notes on which C. was principal, he can recover usury as well as if he had been sued on the note when he executed his own note in settlement of the debt.

Denton & Robinson for appellant.

O. H. Waddle for appellees.

Appeal from Pulaski Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

On March 24, 1891, A. J. Crawford, as principal, and appellant, as his surety, executed to the Somerset Banking Co. a note for $3,300, due two months after date. On this note Crawford paid at each renewal, from time to time, interest in advance at the rate of 8 per cent. until January 24, 1896. On September 26, 1891, they executed a like note for $600; also on December 31, 1894, a note for $783, on which like payments were made on the several renewals as on the larger note. On February 27, 1896, Crawford having become insolvent, Whinery executed his note to the Somerset Banking Co. for the sum of $4,683, the full amount of these three notes, and in lieu thereof. This note he renewed from time to time, making like payments in advance of interest by way of discount, just as Crawford had done, until March 18, 1899. He was then sued on the last renewal of the note, and pleaded usury. The court purged the usury paid after February 27, 1896, when the note for $4,683 was executed by Whinery, but refused to purge the usury paid up to that time by Crawford, and from this judgment Whinery appeals.

Crawford had made an assignment and Whinery proved his claim against the estate and received a small dividend, but that in nowise affects his liability to the bank. The defense of usury is allowed upon the idea that to the extent of the usury paid in the old note the renewal is without consideration, in so far as the usury is brought over into the new note.

In Kendall v. Crouch, 88 Ky., 199, the principal obligor in a note was dropped, but it was held that this was not such a novation as would deprive the surety of the plea of usury. The court said: "Any payments theretofore made will be treated as having been paid upon the principal and legal interest without regard as to how they were, in fact, made or received. They will be so treated at the election of the debtor, although they were paid as usury; and so far as the usury has been carried into the new note it is without consideration, and can not be recovered. A change of payee or of a part of the obligors will discharge those bound upon the obligation, because it is a new contract; but it is not a payment of usury: and if it be carried into the new obligation as a part of the sum to be paid upon it, it is to that extent tainted, and the usury will, upon plea, be extracted."

This case followed Fitzpatrick, &c. v. Apperson's Ex'or, 79 Ky., 272, and has since been followed in Neal v. Rouse, 93 Ky., 151; Hill v. Cornwall, 95 Ky., 512; Shirley v. Stephenson, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 770; Blakeley v. Adams, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 324, and a number of other cases. In support of the judgment we are referred to the cases of Mann v. Bank of Elkton, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1038; Ryan v. Logan County Bank, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1518, and Parker v. Sweigart, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 118, but none of these cases conflict in any respect with the rule that the entire usury may be purged as long as the debt remains, and that the dropping out of one or more of the obligors or the adding of one or more new parties in nowise affects the right to purge the transaction of usury from the beginning. In Mann v. Bank of Elkton the surety bought the land of his principal and agreed to pay the note as part of the purchase money. He then executed his own note to the bank, and when sued on this note attempted to plead usury. It was held that the rule referred to did not apply, because the principal in the note had paid the usury in the land transaction, and the right to recover the usury was in him and not in the purchaser of the land, who received the land as the consideration of his contract, and in paying his note only paid for the land as he had agreed to do. Parker v. Sweigart simply follows this case, but in both the general rule, that a mere change in the obligor would not affect the right to purge the usury, is distinctly recognized. The case of Ryan v. Logan County Bank is similar to the case of Mann v. Bank of Elkton, and was decided upon its authority.

In the case before us Whinery was the surety of Crawford on all three of the notes originally given and on each renewal of them up to the time that Crawford failed. When Crawford failed he had the right to demand a credit on the notes then held by the bank for all that had been paid upon them by Crawford, and if he had then been sued and had pleaded usury, unquestionably he would have been entitled to have the transaction purged and only the balance of the notes, with interest at 6 per cent., after deducting the amounts in fact paid, could have been demanded of him. The fact that the payments were made by Crawford in the way of discount on the several renewals did not affect the matter, for these payments were made for the use or forbearance of the money, and the court will look through the form of the transaction and not allow any mere subterfuge or change of form to defeat the statute. When Whinery gave his own note in place of the three notes which he and Crawford had given, there was no consideration for this note, except the amount due and collectible on the Crawford notes, on which he was surety and which he then took up. This want of consideration in the first note that Whinery gave went into each renewal of that note and affected the last renewal just as much as the first note. He can, therefore, plead this want of consideration when sued on the last renewal just as he might have plead it if he had failed to take up the Crawford notes and been sued for the face value of those notes.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a judgment as herein indicted.

BANKS v. COUNTY OF HENDERSON, &c.

(Filed February 10, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Damages—Location of smallpox hospital—Verdict—This action was instituted to recover damages for location of a smallpox pest house near appellant's land. A verdict resulted in favor of appellee. On appeal, Held—That the verdict is not contrary to the evidence, and was rendered under proper instructions.

S. A. Banks and Montgomery Merritt for appellant.

N. P. Taylor and John F. Lockett for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellant owns a valuable tract of land near the pesthouse of appellee. She filed this action to recover damages on account of the depreciation of her property by the location of the pesthouse near it. Under instructions of the court, which are not objected to, the jury found for the defendants. The only question made on the appeal is that the verdict is palpably against the evidence.

The proof showed that the pesthouse was nine hundred feet from appellant's line and twenty-one hundred feet from her house. It also showed that the contagion of smallpox can not be carried through the air more than three hundred feet.

A number of witnesses testified that appellant's land was depreciated in value by reason of the location of the pesthouse from ten to twenty-five per cent. or more. Perhaps half as many testified that it was worth as much with the pesthouse where it is as without it. The jury saw the witnesses; they were practical men peculiarly fitted to pass on a question of this sort; they heard the reasons given by the witnesses for their conclusions and were of the vicinage. There was a fair trial. The constitutional guaranty of a trial by jury is not an idle form. It rests upon the idea that one time with another the verdict of twelve practical men is more to be trusted than the conclusions of a judge, however learned he may be, as a means of reaching practical justice. Appellant's land has not depreciated any in rental value. According to the proof it is beyond the reach of contagion, and under all the facts we can not say that the verdict of the jury is so palpably against the evidence as to warrant us in disturbing it. (Barrett v. City of Henderson, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 771.)

Judgment affirmed.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO., &c. v. MILLER.

(Filed February 10, 1908.)

Malicious prosecution—Instructions—Appellee was an agent of the appellant insurance company, and upon quitting their employment gave his due bill to the company for what was then thought to be a balance due from him on collections, $9.84. Appellant afterwards claimed that the shortage amounted to $15.58, which appellee's security paid to the company. At the instance of the surety, and after consultation with an attorney, a warrant was issued, charging appellant with embezzlement, under which he was arrested and remained in custody about an hour, when he gave bond. The warrant was finally dismissed for want of prosecution. Appellant brought this action for malicious prosecution, and a trial resulted in a judgment for $1,800 damages, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The court properly instructed the jury as to the advice of counsel constituting probable cause, but it did not give any instruction on probable cause outside of the advice of counsel. The rule is that what facts constituted probable cause is a question of law for the court, and that the court must, by its instruction, inform the jury what these facts are, and let them determine from the evidence whether the facts exist where the evidence is conflicting. The instruction of the court, as given to the jury, gave them no light as to what constituted embezzlement or fraudulent conversion. In a proceeding of this kind there must be malice in fact. This is not necessarily ill-will to defendant, but it is any evil or unlawful purpose as distinguished from that of promoting justice. An instruction should have been given to the jury to the effect that there must be both malice and a want of probable cause to justify a recovery, although as a matter of fact plaintiff was innocent of the charge, for the question in this case is not the guilt or innocence of Miller of the crime of embezzlement, but whether the defendants, at the time they took out the warrant, had probable cause to believe him guilty. If they had such cause there can be no recovery, no matter how clearly the evidence may now show that Miller was innocent.

J. D. Macquot and James Campbell for appellants.

Hendrick & Miller for appellee.

Appeal from McCracken Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee Miller was agent for appellant, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and appellant, the National Surety Co., was surety on his bond. It was the duty of Miller to pay over to the company weekly all the money he collected, and his commissions were paid back to him by the company from the home office a few days later. The mode of doing the business was to collect the premiums from the policy holders weekly. The policy holder had a book, and in this his weekly payments were entered by the agent when made. The agent had a similar book in which the payments were also entered, and he settled weekly with the superintendent by his book. Once in three months the agent's book was compared with the policy holders' books to see if he had accounted to the company on his book for all the money that he had collected as shown by the policy holders' books. Miller left the service of the company in December, 1899. The superintendent then went around with Miller, comparing his book with the policy holders' books and found that Miller had not entered on his book some collections he had made, amounting to $9.84, and Miller executed to the company his due bill for the amount. Subsequent investigation showed that he was behind in a larger amount, and while he says that he did not agree as to the correctness of the settlement, the weight of the evidence is the other way. Still he paid nothing, and on January 25, 1900, his surety in his bond, the National Surety Co., wrote him a letter telling him that it had paid the insurance company $15.58 for a shortage in his account, and calling on him to reimburse it. To this letter he made no reply. On February 20 the surety company again wrote him in regard to the shortage it had paid, and to this letter he made no reply. The agents of the insurance company had some interviews with him near this time about settling the remainder of the shortage, but nothing came of it. Things ran along for some months, and then at the request of the surety company the insurance company directed its agent to institute a criminal proceeding against Miller for embezzlement. A consultation was held with an attorney, and on his advice a warrant was issued on July 14, 1900. Miller was arrested under the warrant, remained in custody about an hour before he gave bond. This was on Saturday; the case was called on Monday morning, and laid over until Thursday, one of the witnesses having left the State. On Thursday morning before the county attorney reached the courthouse the case was called again, and there being no witnesses present, and no one to prosecute, the case was dismissed. Miller then filed this suit to recover damages of the two corporations and their agents, taking the proceeding against him, on the ground that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $1,800, and the defendants have appealed.

The court properly instructed the jury as to the advice of counsel constituting probable cause, but he did not give any instruction on the probable cause outside of the advice of counsel. The rule is that what facts constitute probable cause is a question of law for the court, and that the court must by its instruction inform the jury what these facts are, and let them determine from the evidence whether the facts exist, where the evidence is conflicting. (Anderson v. Columbia Finance and Trust Co., 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1799; Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Co. v. Hoeher, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 299.)

Appellant was charged in the criminal proceeding with the crime of embezzlement, under section 1202, Kentucky Statutes, which provides, among other things, that if an agent of any corporation shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or the use of another, any money, property or effects of the corporation coming into his hands as such agent, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years.

Embezzlement is defined as the fraudulent appropriation or conversion of the property of another by one who is entrusted with the possession. (2 Bishop Criminal Law, section 325, 2; 10 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 978.) The words, therefore, "embezzle and fraudulently convert," are synonymous. To constitute the offense it is necessary there must be a criminal intent; but where the money of the principal is knowingly used by the agent in violation of the duty, it is none the less embezzlement because at the time he intended to restore it. (10 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 996-997, and notes.) The proof before the jury showed very clearly that Miller had collected the money of the insurance company, and had not charged himself with it, or accounted for it, and had failed to make good the amount after the default was discovered. It is true he testified that the balance against him did not arise in this way, but under the proof this was a question for the jury, and the court should have instructed them that if the agent or agents of the company in taking out the warrant believed, and had such grounds as would induce a man of ordinary prudence to believe, that Miller, while agent for the insurance company, had collected and received money belonging to the company, and had fraudulently kept the same, and had failed to pay it to the company or its authorized agent, then there was probable cause for taking out the warrant, and they should find for the defendants.

The instructions of the court as given to the jury gave them no light as to what constituted embezzlement or fraudulent conversion, and although the defendants may in the judgment of the jury have shown that they had reasonable cause to believe Miller in fact guilty as above defined, the jury were required by the instruction to find for the plaintiff. Instruction "F.," asked by the defendants, is not as favorable to them as the law warrants, in that the definition of malice therein is not as favorable to the defendants as that established by the authorities elsewhere and heretofore sanctioned by this court. In a proceeding of this kind there must be malice in fact. This is not necessarily ill-will to the defendant, but it is any evil or unlawful purpose as distinguished from that of promoting justice. (Ahrens & Ott v. Hoehner, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 299.) With this modification, instruction "F." should have been given, to the effect that there must be both malice and a want of probable cause to justify a recovery, although as a matter of fact plaintiff was innocent of the charge, for the question in this case is not the guilt or innocence of Miller of the crime of embezzlement, but whether the defendants, at the time they took out the warrant, had probable cause to believe him guilty. If they had such cause, there can be no recovery, no matter how clearly the evidence may now show that Miller was innocent.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to grant appellants a new trial.

CHINN, &c. v. CURTIS.

(Filed February 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

1. Assignment for benefit of creditors—Fraudulent conveyances—Jurisdiction—In 1896 A. made a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors to B. A short time thereafter C. obtained a judgment in the Harrison Circuit Court against A., and had a return of no property found, after which she brought this suit to set aside as fraudulent a deed of conveyance of a tract of land made by A. to his son, which was without any consideration, except $400 paid by the son. An attachment was levied on said land subject to an execution levy in favor of D., who was made a defendant in the action. D. answered, alleging that the conveyance of land from A. to his son was without consideration, and asked to set aside the deed as fraudulent. C. afterwards dismissed her petition, and the action having been tried on the issues raised by D. in her answer and cross petition, the court set aside the deed and subjected the land to the payment of the debt. This appeal is prosecuted from that judgment. It is urged that after the dismissal of the action by C., D. could not prosecute her claim; furthermore, it is urged that the Harrison Circuit Court has no jurisdiction of the action. Held—That the dismissal of the action by C. did not prejudice the claim of D. The judgment in favor of D. was rendered in the Harrison Circuit Court, and that court had jurisdiction to set aside the deed as fraudulent. The court properly set aside the deed as fraudulent.

2. Statute of limitation—Evidence—The action was not barred by the five years' statute of limitation as the proof shows that D. did not learn of the conveyance until within five years before bringing the action. The recording of the deed is not conclusive evidence of notice to D., although it is competent evidence on that issue. The other facts and circumstances prove that she had no notice of the execution of the deed until within five years before the institution of her action, and as her debt existed at the time of the conveyance she had the right to subject the land to the payment of it.

Ward & Lafferty, B. D. Berry and J. I. Blanton for appellants.

W. S. Pryor and Swinford & Osborne for appellee.

Appeal from Harrison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

In January, 1896, appellant, H. C. Chinn, made a general deed of assignment of all his property to P. P. Cummins for the benefit of his creditors. On February 28 thereafter Mary E. Holliday recovered a judgment against him in the Harrison Circuit Court, on which she took out execution that was regularly returned by the sheriff "no property found." She then filed on March 18, 1896, this suit against H. C. Chinn, his son, Harry C. Chinn, and P. P. Cummins, as his assignee, in which she took out an attachment, charging that Chinn, in the year 1890, had made a deed to sixty-three acres of land owned by him to his son, Harry C. Chinn, which was voluntary, except to the extent of $400 paid by the son. She sought to set aside the deed and subject the land to her debt. She alleged that the assignee refused to sue, and for that reason he was made defendant. The attachment was levied on the land by the sheriff subject to the execution lien of appellee, Sarah E. Curtis. The plaintiff then filed an amended petition, making Mrs. Curtis a defendant, and calling on her to set up her lien. Mrs. Curtis, on September 19, 1896, filed her answer and cross petition, in which she set up her execution levy on the land, and charged in substance that the land was conveyed to the son by his father without any consideration. At the June term, 1897, Mrs. Holliday dismissed her petition without prejudice. Mrs. Curtis amended her cross petition so as to put in it in substance all the allegations that Mrs. Holliday had made. The defendants answered, denying all the allegations and pleading limitation, after their objection to the jurisdiction of the court had been overruled. On final hearing the court subjected the land to the debt.

By section 62 of the Code an action for the sale of real property must be brought in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated. A part of the land lay in Harrison county. By section 70 of the Code an action upon a return of no property found must be brought in the county in which the judgment is rendered, or in which the defendant resides or is summoned. Mrs. Holliday's judgment was recovered in the Harrison Circuit Court. It does not appear that the defendants were not summoned in that county, and the presumption is in favor of the jurisdiction of the circuit court. Mrs. Holliday's action was, therefore, properly brought in the Harrison Circuit Court. While section 84, Kentucky Statutes, gives the assignee the right to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, there is nothing in it to modify the sections of the Code above referred to. Mrs. Holliday's action having been properly brought in Harrison county after Mrs. Curtis had filed her answer and cross petition therein, the action of Mrs. Holliday could not be dismissed on her motion so as to deprive Mrs. Curtis of the right to prosecute her claim in that forum. The court, therefore, did not err in overruling the special demurrer.

The deed which H. C. Chinn made to his son was made and recorded in the year 1890, or more than five years before the action was brought. By section 2519, Kentucky Statutes, the cause of action for relief for fraud shall not be deemed to have accrued until its discovery, but the action can not be brought after ten years from the perpetration of the fraud. Appellee, Mrs. Curtis, aptly pleaded and introduced proof tending to show that she did not discover, and could not by ordinary diligence have discovered, the fraud until within five years before her suit was brought. In Ward v. Thomas, 81 Ky., 452, the court held that constructive notice arising from the recording of the deed was insufficient to set the statute in motion. It said: "The recording of such conveyance is important in establishing the time of the perpetration of the fraud, but it throws but little light of itself upon the question of discovery. It is admissible evidence on that question; and when the manner of its execution and registration and other facts and circumstances in the case would be sufficient to put a person or prudent mind upon inquiry, the law declares this to be notice because he should have made the inquiry, and will be held to have done so whether he did or not." (McGehee v. Cox, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 619.)

In the case before us the father and son lived together; there was no change in the possession of the property so far as appearances went; the son did not give it in for taxation in his own name, and there was nothing in the way in which the property was held and used to put a creditor on notice. Mrs. Curtis lived in an adjoining county, and had in fact no notice of the deed until about the time she filed her suit. Under all the circumstances we do not think the court erred in refusing to apply the bar of the statute. It is true Mrs. Curtis had a relative in the county who made the loan for her, but it does not appear from the evidence that he was thereafter her agent. He only acted for accommodation in making the loan, and even he, though living in the county and well acquainted with the parties, did not learn of the deed until within five years before the bringing of the action. The evidence satisfies us that the deed must be treated as fraudulent as to the existing creditors of H. C. Chinn, although it might not have been fraudulent as to debts thereafter created. The fact that his wife had many years before let him have money, which he was to pay back to her, and for which afterwards he agreed to convey this land to the son, would not make the deed any less void as to his creditors. The deed recites on its face that it is made in consideration of love and affection and $400 paid by the son. The court adjudged the son a lien for the $400. He properly refused to allow him anything for his improvements, offsetting the use of the land against the improvements. The son stated, after the deed was made to him, that his father had given him the land. The stale transaction with the wife, had when the son was four years old, can not be upheld as a valid consideration for this deed, made after the debts sued for were created and after the husband was involved far beyond his ability to pay.

P. P. Cummins, the assignee, does not appeal from the judgment. H. C. Chinn is the only appellant. The words "&c.," after his name in the statement of parties are insufficient to make any one else a party to the appeal. (Board of Councilmen v. Farmers Bank, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 1738; Brodie v. Parsons, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 831.) H. C. Chinn can not complain of the judgment as he is not prejudiced by the money being adjudged to the appellee instead of to all his creditors ratably, for by this he is not prejudiced. The assignee has not appealed, and it is unnecessary, therefore, for us to pass on his rights, as he is not before the court. The same is true of the objection in regard to Mrs. Chinn's right of dower in the land. She was not a party to the action in the circuit court, and is not a party here. Her rights are in nowise affected.

On the whole case we see no substantial error in the proceeding. The judgment complained of is, therefore, affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. LOGSDON.

(Filed February 10, 1903.)

Railroads—Negligence—Measure of damages—Appellee was engaged in assisting his father in loading lumber into a car which he had hired from appellant company, when the employee in switching cars jerked a car onto the side track against the car in which appellee was at work with such violence as to throw the lumber against appellee's leg and ankle, inflicting severe and permanent injuries, for which he recovered a judgment for damages, from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is urged that the court erred in giving instructions to the prejudice of appellant. Held—That the court should have told the jury that if they found for the plaintiff, the measure of damages was the reasonable expenses of his cure, including any expense that it was reasonably certain he would thereafter necessarily incur; the fair value of the time lost by him, or which it was reasonably certain he would thereafter lose, and a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering endured by him, or which it was reasonably certain he would endure as well as for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money by reason of his injuries. The court correctly defined the word negligence as meaning the failure to use ordinary care. The court should have defined ordinary care as being such care as a man of ordinary prudence might reasonably be expected to exercise under like circumstances. The court properly instructed the jury as to gross negligence.

B. D. Warfield, E. W. Hines and J. A. Mitchell for appellant.

W. S. Pryor and S. M. Payton for appellee.

Appeal from Hart Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee Logsdon, who is twenty-two years of age, was helping his father load a car with lumber at Munfordville, Ky., in April, 1901, on a side track of appellant's road at that point. While they were in the car loading it a freight train pulled in on the main line, about opposite to them. The engine then went up to the switch with a flat car loaded with rock, and sent it down on the side track on which the car stood in which they were working. A brakeman was on the rock car and undertook to stop it before it reached the car in which they were working; but, either from the force with which it was sent in or its weight, or the fault of the brake or of the brakeman, the car was not stopped and collided with the other car with great force. The brakeman jumped off just before the collision; appellee's father also jumped off their car and called to appellee to jump, but he did not understand, and before he could get out the collision occurred, jamming the lumber against his ankle, breaking one of the bones and painfully injuring it. The freight car had been set there by the company for them to load, and the trainmen saw it there before they jerked the rock car in. By jerking a car in is meant giving it a jerk with the engine, and letting it run without the engine being attached to it. The jury found for appellee, and fixed his damages at $8,000. Instruction 1, given by the court, is in these words: "If you shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff came upon the premises of the defendant at the request of his father, and at his request engaged in loading a car with lumber that had been engaged by his father from the defendant for the shipment of his lumber over the road of the defendant, and that while plaintiff was so there and so engaged the defendant, its agents or employes in control and management of its engine and cars, did negligently push, shove or throw one of its said cars against the one which had been let to his father, and in which plaintiff was located in loading said car, if he was so located, and thereby catch and injure him in said lumber and car, you should find for the plaintiff the damages which he sustained thereby, taking into your consideration the time he has lost, or may hereafter lose, if any, the pain and suffering he has endured, or may hereafter endure, if any, the disability to labor, move about and enjoy life which he has suffered, or may hereafter suffer, if any, directly resulting to him from said injuries and the expense he has incurred, or may hereafter necessarily incur, if any, in the treatment of his said injuries, not to exceed in all the amount sued for herein, which is $20,000."

This instruction did not correctly define the measure of damages. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Case's Adm'r, 72 Ky., 786, this court said: "The term compensation when applied to damages has a fixed legal signification much more restricted than its common or general acceptation. In actions for personal injuries where death does not ensue it is confined to the expense of cure, the value of time lost, a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, and for any permanent reduction of the power to earn money."

This was followed in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Fox, 74 Ky., 509; Muldraugh's Hill, &c., Turnpike Co. v. Maupin, 79 Ky., 101; Kentucky Central R. R. Co. v. Ackly, 87 Ky., 278; Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney, 92 Ky., 367, and many subsequent cases. The authorities elsewhere are uniform to the same effect. (2 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 758.) The case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 87 Ky., 327, does not conflict with this rule, as the question was not considered there by the court, or, so far as appears, made by counsel. The case went off on other grounds. The court here should have told the jury that if they found for the plaintiff, the measure of damages was the reasonable expenses of his cure, including any expense that it was reasonably certain he would thereafter necessarily incur; the fair value of the time lost by him, or which it was reasonably certain he would thereafter lose, and a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering endured by him, or which it was reasonably certain he would endure, as well as for any permanent reduction of his power to earn money by reason of his injuries. The court defined the word "negligence" as meaning the failure to use ordinary care, and with this definition we see no objection to the use of the word "negligently" in this instruction. The question of contributory negligence was aptly submitted to the jury by another instruction.

The definition of ordinary care should have been such care as a man of ordinary prudence might reasonably be expected to exercise under like circumstances. The question of gross negligence was properly left to the jury under the evidence, in view of the violence of the collision and the fact that the car was jerked in by the crew with the knowledge that the other car in which the men were working was standing on the side track and so near the switch. Rule 117a and 117b should not have been read to the jury, as they do not illustrate anything in the case. Rule 203 was properly allowed to be read.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

CITY OF LEXINGTON, &c. v. KENTUCKY CHAUTAUQUA ASSEMBLY.

(Filed February 10, 1903.)

Municipal taxation—Purchase of park—This appeal involves the question as to the authority of a city of the second class to issue bonds and levy taxes for the purchase of grounds for a public park. By section 3038, Kentucky Statutes, such cities are created bodies-politic and corporate, with the usual powers of buying and holding property for corporate purposes, and by subsection 16, section 3058, Kentucky Statutes, such cities are authorized to acquire and use property as it may deem proper for the public welfare. Held—That the purchase and dedication of a public park for the benefit and use of its citizens is properly within the scope of the powers of the council for the public welfare as it conduces to the preservation of public health, and the council may properly issue bonds to pay for same after the proper steps as to passage of the necessary ordinances and submission to the people has been had with a favorable result.

W. S. Bronston for appellants.

Morton, Darnall & Wilson and J. H. Beauchamp for appellee.

Appeal from Fayette Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant, the city of Lexington, has appealed in this case from a judgment of the Fayette Circuit Court overruling a general demurrer to the petition of appellee in a suit brought to require the defendant, H. T. Duncan, as mayor, to carry out a contract made with the city council of Lexington for the purchase of Woodland Park. The facts alleged in the petition, and conceded by the demurrer to be true, are that the Kentucky Chautauqua Assembly, a corporation, through its president, proposed in writing to H. T. Duncan, mayor of the city, on the — day of September, 1902, to sell to the city the grounds of the company, known as Woodland Park, for the purpose of a public park for the sum of $38,000, which was to be paid within a reasonable time after the city of Lexington should be authorized to make the purchase under the provisions of the charter of the city, but not later than February 1, 1903; that this proposition was duly submitted by the mayor to the council of the city, who, on the 11th of September, by an ordinance authorized the mayor to submit to the voters of the city of Lexington, at an election to be held for that purpose, the question of accepting the proposition, and issuing bonds sufficient to pay therefor the sum of $38,000; that pursuant to the ordinance an election was duly held, after giving the notice required by the statute, on the 4th of November, 1902, the same being the day on which the regular annual election was held; and that at this election 1,601 voters voted in favor of the purchase, and 688 against it. More than two-thirds of the entire number of votes so cast were in favor of the proposition, which vote was duly ascertained by the board of election commissioners of Fayette county, on or about the 10th day of November, 1902, and so certified to the general council of the city of Lexington, and to H. T. Duncan, mayor of the city; that the general council thereupon authorized the city solicitor of the city to institute legal proceedings to test the validity of the bonds authorized by the vote before placing them upon the market; and plaintiff, in conformity with their proposition to sell, executed and tendered to the city, through its mayor, a sufficient deed to the land and demanded the payment of the contract price. It is further alleged that the assessed value of the taxable property of the city, previous to incurring the indebtedness, was $17,635,916.32; that the rate of taxation fixed by the city for the fiscal year in which the indebtedness was incurred was $1.16½. All steps looking to the consummation of the agreement by the city to purchase the property seem to be in strict conformity with the constitutional and statutory provisions applying thereto. The whole question, at last, is one of power in the council to make the purchase, for if they had the power, it will not be contended that their discretion, judgment or prudence in making it, if honestly exercised, can be controlled or revised by the courts. Section 2038 of the Kentucky Statutes reads as follows: "The cities of Covington, Newport and Lexington are hereby declared to be cities of the second class, and the inhabitants thereof, and such other cities as may hereafter be declared cities of the second class, respectively, are created and continued bodies-corporate and politic, within their respective limits, with perpetual power to govern themselves in all fiscal, prudential and municipal concerns, by such ordinances and resolutions as they may deem proper, not in conflict with this act or the Constitution of the State of Kentucky, or the Constitution of the United States; to acquire property for municipal purpose, by purchase or otherwise, within their corporate limits or elsewhere; to hold the same and all property and effects now belonging to said cities, held either in their own name or in the name of other, for the use of each of said cities, for the purpose and interest for which the same were granted or dedicated; to use, manage, improve, sell, convey, rent or lease the same; and to have like power over property hereafter acquired, and as such, by their respective names, shall be capable in law of contracting and being contracted with, of suing and being sued, of pleading and being pleaded, answering and being answered, in all courts and places, and in all matters whatsoever; and shall have and use, respectively, a corporate seal, and make, change, alter and renew the same at pleasure."

And by subsection 16 of section 3058 they are given power "to purchase or lease within the limits of the city, or elsewhere, any real or personal property for the use of the city, to control, manage, improve, sell or lease, or otherwise dispose of the same for such purpose and consideration as it may deem proper for the public welfare."

So far as we are able to find in the charter this authority to purchase land for the public welfare is subject to no restriction or limitation, except that a limitation is placed upon the amount of indebtedness which the city may incur, and the amount which shall burden the city in any one year. These limitations in nowise affect any question involved in this appeal. The authority to buy is granted in express terms; the obligation incurred is within the limitation, and the only question which remains is, was the authority exercised for a city purpose?

It seems to us that there can be no doubt that the acquirement of lands for the purpose of a public park is a city purpose. The health and comfort of the inhabitants of a city is necessarily one of the chief concerns of municipal government. No one at this late date would for a moment question the power of a city to furnish pure water, light, clean streets and proper sewerage, and the obligation to furnish pure air and a place for healthful exercise and recreation stands upon the same footing, and is a city purpose. In re Mayor, &c., to acquire parks, 99 N. Y., 569, the words "city purpose" are defined and held to include the purchase of lands adjoining a city, but beyond its boundaries, for a park. The court said: "It is impossible to formulate a proper definition of what is meant by a 'city purpose.' Yet two characteristics it must have. The purpose must be primarily the benefit, use and convenience of the city, as distinguished from that of the public outside of it, although they may be incidentally benefited, and the work be of such a character as to show plainly the predominance of that purpose, and then the thing to be done must be within the original range of municipal action. Acquiring and maintaining parks is within that range."

In Murphy v. Kelly, 76 N. Y., 487, the court says: "The acquirement of land for purposes of a city park is a city purpose."

An analogous question was before the court in the City of Owensboro v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1281. The question in that case was as to the power of the Commonwealth to compel the city to pay taxes on a public park belonging to the city. It was held exempt from taxation as public property used for public purposes. The court said: "The municipal authorities are charged with the duty to maintain the public health, and in the judgment of scientific men it is essential to the public health that cities have and maintain parks where the people can have pure, wholesome air. They are just as much public property, used for public purposes, as are the streets and trees planted therein, and it would be just as proper and reasonable to tax the one as the other. In our opinion the public park is public property used for a public purpose, and necessary to the proper government of a city."

Dense populations require these breathing places. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the acquirement of Woodland Park by the city authorities of Lexington is a city purpose, and within the provisions of the charter. It, therefore, follows that the demurrer was properly overruled, and the defendant, Duncan, as mayor of the city required to carry out the provisions of the ordinance, and sell in pursuance thereof the bonds provided for, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay to the appellee, the Kentucky Chautauqua Assembly, the sum of $38,000, as agreed to be paid for the park property.

Judgment affirmed.

PATTERSON v. T. J. MOSS TIE CO., &c.

(Filed February 10, 1903—Not to be reported.)

1. Title—Trespass—Instructions—This action of trespass involves the proper location of the boundary line between lands claimed by appellant and appellee, and the instructions of the jury should have been confined to that question. The court erred in giving an instruction as to adverse holding, as there was no proof authorizing such instruction.

2. Jurisdiction—Although the action of trespass was brought to recover $100 for timber removed from the land, the defense was a denial of title of plaintiff to the land. This court properly has jurisdiction of the case.

Glenn & Ringo and Neal & Barnes for appellant.

M. L. Heaverin for appellees.

Appeal from Ohio Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is an action in trespass quare clausum fregit brought by the appellant against the appellees, T. J. Moss Tie Co. and Eliza J. Taylor. The appellee, Eliza J. Taylor sold certain timber to her co-appellee, and the trespass complained of was committed by it in removing the timber which it had purchased. The defendant pleaded liberum tenementum, and the jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

The sum sought to be recovered is $100, and the first question to be disposed of is as to the jurisdiction of this court of the appeal. The plaintiff claimed that he was the owner and in possession of the land when the trespass was committed. The defendants denied this and pleaded that Mrs. Taylor was the owner and in possession of it, hence the title was directly involved in the action, and the court has jurisdiction of it. (Stillwell v. Duncan, 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1701.)

The next question to be determined is as to the instructions of the court. In order to determine that it is well to state briefly some of the facts as they appear from this record. The land claimed by Mrs. Taylor is situated within the William May patent for 5,000 acres granted June 28, 1787, though she does not seem to have connected her title with that patent. The land claimed by appellant is situated in the John Adair patent granted July 8, 1796. It calls to run with the William May survey. The appellant claims his 100 acres under the Adair patent and connects his title therewith. The land claimed by Mrs. Taylor was conveyed to her by title bond more than fifty years ago, but was not deeded to her until some years afterwards. To run the courses and distances called for in her deed it does not embrace any of the land claimed by the appellant. To run appellant's boundary as called for by his deed it does not embrace any part of the land embraced in the deed of Mrs. Taylor. The controversy is really over the location of the boundary line between the two pieces of land. There is no conflict between the May and Adair patents. There is but one point upon which the testimony agrees and that is the location of the southwest corner of Mrs. Taylor's land, which is the northwest corner of the appellant's. This corner is the corner to four tracts of land, being what is commonly called in this record the Austin corner.

The court gave the following instructions, both of which are erroneous, although the appellee is not complaining:

"1st. The court instructs the jury that they should find for the plaintiff the damage he sustained by reason of the cutting and appropriation of the timber, described in his petition, by defendants, not exceeding the amount claimed by plaintiff, $100.

"2d. Unless they believe from the evidence that the defendant, Eliza J. Taylor, was, and had for a period of fifteen years or more next before this suit was brought, been in the continuous, actual possession and occupancy of said land, openly and notoriously claiming it as her own to a well defined and marked boundary, including the land from which the said timber was cut, adversely to all others, in which case they shall find for the defendants."

No. 1 is prejudicial to the appellees and No. 2 to the appellant. No. 1 is prejudicial to the appellees in this: Although the appellant may have shown a legal title to the boundary embraced in his deed, still it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not that boundary embraced the land in controversy. There does not seem to be any question of adverse possession in this case.

Mrs. Taylor has never been in actual possession of the boundary claimed by her, nor has any tenant of hers been in actual possession of it, except that at one time there was a small field within the boundary, upon which there was a cabin, but the fences that enclosed it seem to have disappeared as well as the cabin, and there is no evidence to show for what length of time it was occupied. That clearing does not seem to have embraced any part of the land in controversy in this action. It is true that Mrs. Taylor, for a time, lived with a brother on an adjoining tract of land, but the fact that she lived upon an adjoining tract in the possession of another could not give her actual possession of the land which she claims. Had she been in the actual possession of the boundary claimed by her she would not have been in actual possession of the strip in controversy; if the title to it was in appellant's vendors, because the constructive, if not the actual, possession would have been in them.

There was no testimony upon which to predicate the second instruction as to an adverse holding of the land by Mrs. Taylor. The occasional removal of timber from the disputed strip did not give her an adverse holding of the land. From the facts shown the only question to be submitted to the jury is as to whether the plaintiff's boundary embraced the land in dispute. Of course, upon the return of the case, if the appellees can present a different state of facts with reference to possession, the court then can determine whether the question of adverse holding should be submitted to the jury.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HALE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 10, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Judgment—Revivor—Striking case from the docket—This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of the circuit court assessing a fine of $51 against the appellant. Appellant died pending the appeal, and a motion was made to abate the action. The court overruled this motion. More than a year after the death of defendant appellee moved to dismiss the appeal on account of no revivor having been had. Held—That the court properly overruled the motion. Had it prevailed it would have been an injustice to defendant as his estate would have been liable for the debt. The motion to dismiss for want of a revivor is equivalent to a motion to strike the action from the docket. Under sections 509 and 510, Civil Code of Practice, the action should be stricken from the docket for want of revivor, as it is too late to revive same unless by consent of the personal representative, and no consent has been given.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellant.

C. J. Pratt and Hays & Wells for appellee.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of the circuit court assessing a fine of $51 against the appellant. Pending the appeal appellant died, and the Commonwealth moved the court to abate the action for that reason, which motion was overruled.

Had the action been abated then the estate of decedent would have been liable for the judgment and costs, although the record had shown that the judgment should be reversed. This would have worked such an intolerable hardship that the court could not give its sanction to it. The death of the appellant was suggested April 8, 1901. No steps have been taken to revive the action in the name of the personal representative of the decedent. On January 5, 1908, more than one year thereafter, a motion was entered by the appellee to dismiss the action because it had not been revived. This motion is equivalent to a motion to strike the action from the docket. The question is, should it prevail?

The provisions of the Civil Code apply to this case. Section 767 reads as follows: "The provisions of title 11 shall, so far as applicable, regulate cases in the Court of Appeals." Sections 509 and 510 are parts of title 11. They read as follows:

"An order to revive an action in the name of the representative or successor of a plaintiff may be made forthwith, but shall not be made without the consent of the defendant after the expiration of one year from the time the order might have been first made, except that if the defendant shall also have died, or his powers have ceased, in the meantime the order of revivor on both sides may be made in the period limited in the last section.

"If it appear to the court, by affidavit, that either party to an action has been dead, or, if he sue or be sued as a personal representative, that his powers have ceased, for a period so long that the action can not be revived in the name of his representative or successor without the consent of both parties, it shall order the action to be stricken from the docket."

More than one year had elapsed since the order of revivor might have been made, and under section 509 the right to have it revived is barred. The appellee not consenting to the revivor, the case must be stricken from the docket as provided by section 510.

The clerk will enter an order to that effect.

MURPHY, ASSESSOR v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Filed February 10, 1908.)

Municipal taxation—Construction of statutes—Franchises—Constitutional law—The question presented on this appeal is whether the revenue law of 1902 repeals the act of 1898, which expressly confers on assessors of cities of the first and second classes the authority to assess the franchises and intangible property of corporations; also the act authorizing assessors of cities of the third class to assess franchises of certain corporations for taxation. The title of the revenue law of 1902 is a long one, and recites the revenue act of 1892; also numerous acts amending same, but omits mentioning either the act of 1898, relative to assessment of franchises in cities of the second class, or the act relative to assessment of franchises in cities of the third class. Held—That it is a familiar rule of construction, both in England and America, that a statute can only be repealed by an express provision of a subsequent law or by necessary implication. There must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the statutes that they can not stand together or be consistently reconciled. This rule applies when both statutes are of a general nature, but when one is local in its nature or application, or relates to particular places or persons, and the other is general, they will both be upheld and construed as forming one consistent whole. Under this rule of interpretation the court should hold the act of 1898 was not repealed, but the title to the act furnishes an additional reason for so holding, because it manifests an intention to only substitute the new for the previous acts to which reference is made in the title and kindred acts of a general nature. The general repealing clause of the act can only apply to any purely general law affected by the act, and not to laws of local application. It is urged that article 3, section 8 of the act of 1902, used substantially the same language as was contained in the act of 1898, which authorized the board of valuation and assessment to assess franchises in question for taxation. The language so used was to embrace the cities other than those of the first, second and third classes. It was not necessary to attempt to except these cities from the operation of the act because that had been done by the previous acts. By the act of 1902 the legislature was dealing with the act of 1898 as it found it, with the cities of the first, second and third classes excluded from its provisions with reference to the assessment of certain franchises. It is, therefore, possible to uphold the act of 1898 and the act of 1902, as amended by the act of 1902, and to construe them as forming one consistent whole. The act of 1898 does not violate section 51 of the Constitution, as the title to the act concerns the assessment and valuation for taxation of corporate franchises and intangible property by cities of the first and second classes. There is but one subject to the title, and that is the assessment and valuation for taxation of corporate franchises and intangible property. The mere fact that it applies to cities of different classes can not make the act relate to more than one subject. The act of 1898 does not violate section 156 of the Constitution, requiring cities and towns to be classified and all laws applied to cities of a given class. The act of 1898 is not invalid as an attempt to revise or amend the general law in regard to revenue. Section 60 of the Constitution was not violated by the act of 1898. The act of 1898 did not indirectly, but directly, repeal part of the act of 1892. That section does not mean that a general law can not be passed in reference alone to cities of two classes. If a general law applies to cities of all classes, it necessarily must apply to cities of the same class.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellant.

Henry L. Stone, John F. Lockett, J. G. Covington, G. W. Jolly, W. S. Bronston, W. H. Julian and F. J. Hanlon for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The question involved is, shall the city assessor of Louisville, a city of the first class, assess the franchises of certain public service corporations for taxation for city purposes, or the board of valuation and assessment?

The solution of this question depends upon whether the general revenue act of 1902, Session Acts 1902, pages 281 to 392, inclusive, repeals the act of March 19, 1898, Session Acts 1898, pages 96 to 102, inclusive. The latter is an act concerning the assessment and valuation for taxes of corporate franchises and intangible property by cities of the first and second classes. This act expressly confers upon the city assessor the authority to assess the franchises and intangible property of the corporations in question, but franchises of railroads are not included in this list. Previous to that time, under the general revenue law which went into effect November 11, 1892, such franchises were assessed by the board of valuation and assessment, composed of the auditor, treasurer and secretary of state.

It is admitted that the act of 1898, if constitutional, repeals so much of the act of 1892 as authorized the board of valuation and assessment to assess these franchises, and that it was in force when the act of 1902 was passed. The act of 1902 is a general revenue act, the title of which is extraordinary, in that it purports to be an amendment to the revenue law approved Novenember 11, 1892, as amended by twelve acts specifically enumerated in the title. Each of these amendments were general laws, and amendatory of the act of 1892. The title concludes: "That such act of November 11, 1892, and as amended by the above stated subsequent acts and amendments thereto as now amended and re-enacted will read as follows." It would appear from the title of this act that the legislature intended that there should be no mistake as to the purpose intended to be accomplished by the new enactment, and that there could be no question but what it was intended to be a substitute for the acts to which reference is made in the title.

The act of March 19, 1898, applied only to cities of the first and second classes, and does not purport to be an amendment to the revenue act of 1892 or amendatory to any of the amendments thereto. If the legislature had intended that the act of 1902 should also be substituted in lieu of the act of 1898, it seems extremely strange that in its enumeration of the acts it would have failed to refer to it as one of the acts proposed to be changed.

In 1900 an act was passed authorizing the city assessors of cities of the third class to assess the franchises of certain corporations for taxation, and no reference is made to that act. When there were two acts, which in a certain sense were general, but in application purely local, that were not mentioned or referred to in the act of 1902. These acts were only general in the sense that they referred to all cities of the classes mentioned therein, but they are local in the sense that they apply alone to certain cities.

In construing an act the important thing is the ascertainment of the intention of the legislature. To do this we must consider the title of the act, its context and the purpose of its enactment. It is well to bear in mind that the universal rule is that repeals by implication are not favored; and further, that when an act is local in its nature or application, or relates to particular places or persons, and the other a general one, they will both be upheld and considered as forming one consistent whole.

It is said in Cope v. Cope, 137 U. S., 682, that "nothing is better settled than that repeals, and the same may be said of annulments, by implication are not favored by the courts, and that no statute will be construed as repealing a prior one unless so clearly repugnant thereto as to admit of no other reasonable construction." The same rule was recognized in McChord v. L. & N. R. R. Co. 188 U. S., 483.

If under this rule it could not be held that the acts of 1898 was not repealed, it is certain that the rule for the interpretation of statutes with relation to the effect of a general upon a local law does control. The legislature evidently did not have its attention directed to the subject of the act of 1898, and did not intend to derogate from that act when it made no special mention of its intention to do so. This court has universally recognized this rule of interpretation. In Commonwealth v. Cain, 14 Bush, 583, the court said: "It is a familiar rule of construction, both in England and America, that a statute can only be repealed by an express provision of a subsequent law or by necessary implication. There must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the statutes that they can not stand together or be consistently reconciled. This rule applies when both statutes are of a general nature, but when one is local in its nature or application, or relates to particular places or persons, and the other is general, they will both be upheld and construed as forming one consistent whole."

Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes recognizes the same rule, as section 223 reads as follows: "It is but a particular application of the general presumption against an intention to alter the law beyond the immediate scope of the statute to say that a general act is to be construed as not repealing a particular one, that is, one directed towards a special object or a special class of objects. A general later (affirmative) law does not abrogate any earlier special one by mere implication. Generalia specialibus non derogant. The law does not allow the exposition to revoke or alter, by construction of general words, any particular statute, where the words (of the two acts, as compared with each other, are not so glaringly repugnant and irreconcilable as to indicate a legislative intent to repeal), but may have their proper operation without it. It is usually presumed to have only general cases in view, and not particular cases which have been already otherwise provided for by the special act, or, what is the same thing, by a local custom. Having already given its attention to the particular subject, and provided for it, the legislature is reasonably presumed not to intend to alter that special provision by a subsequent general enactment, unless that intention is manifested in explicit language, or there be something which shows that the attention of the legislature had been turned to the special act, and that the general one was intended to embrace the special cases within the previous one; or something in the nature of the general one making it unlikely that an exception was intended as regards the special act. The general statute is read as silently excluding from its operations the cases which have been provided for by the special one (for as was said of the relation of a general act to a local one applying to a single county of the State, 'it is against reason to suppose that the legislature in framing a general system for the State intended to repeal a special act which the local circumstances of one county had made necessary. The fact that the general act contains a clause repealing acts inconsistent with it does not diminish the force of this rule of construction')."

Independent of the unusual title of the act, under this rule of interpretation, we should hold the act of 1898 was not repealed; but the title to the act furnishes an additional reason for so holding, because it manifests an intention to only substitute the new for the previous acts to which reference is made in the title and kindred acts of a general nature. The general repealing clause of the act can only apply to any purely general law affected by the act, not to laws of local application.

On behalf of the appellee much importance is attached to the fact that article 3, section 8 of the act of 1902, used substantially the same language as was contained in the act of 1892, which authorized the board of valuation and assessment to assess franchises in question for taxation, but this language is used because all the cities, other than the first, second and third classes, were affected by the act, and the franchises therein were to be assessed by the board of valuation and assessment. The language used in the section and article referred to was to embrace the cities other than those of the first, second and third classes. It was not necessary to attempt to except these cities from the operation of the act, because that had been done by the previous acts. Besides, to have employed such language, making such exceptions, might have invited criticism to the effect that it was in conflict with section 60 of the Constitution, which provides that the "general assembly shall not indirectly enact any special or local act by the repeal of any part of a general act, or by exempting from the operation of the general act any city, town, district or county, but laws repealing local or special acts may be enacted." It must be understood that the court is not expressing an opinion on that question, as it is not here.

By the act of 1903 the legislature was dealing with the act of 1892 as it found it, with the cities of the first, second and third classes excluded from its provisions with reference to the assessment of certain franchises. It is, therefore, possible to uphold the act of 1898 and the act of 1892 as amended by the act of 1902, and to construe them as forming one consistent whole. It is insisted upon behalf of the appellee that the act of 1898 is violative of sections 51 and 156 of the Constitution. Section 51 of the Constitution reads as follows: "No law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title, and no law shall be revised, amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revised, amended, extended or conferred shall be re enacted and published at length."

The title to the act of 1898 concerns the assessment and valuation for taxation of corporate franchises and intangible property by cities of the first and second classes. There is but one subject to the title, and that is the assessment and valuation for taxation of corporate franchises and intangible property. The mere fact that it applies to cities of different classes can not make the act relate to more than one subject.

Section 156 of the Constitution requires cities and towns to be classified, and the same law applies to all the cities of a given class. This does not mean that a general law could not be made applicable to all the cities and towns of the Commonwealth.

The proposition is urged that the act of 1898 is invalid because it is an attempt to revise or amend the general law in regard to revenue. This proposition is answered in Purnell v. Mann, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1146. In that case the court said: "There is no direct reference made in the act in question to any particular section of the general election law amended or repealed by it, nor do we think section 51 expressly or impliedly requires it done. The act as passed and published is full and specific enough, as to all subjects embraced by it, to show for what part of the general election law it is substituted, and those parts are in both terms and by implication repealed, leaving the residue unaffected and in full force. Manifestly neither members of the general assembly nor the people could misunderstand or be deceived as to the purview, purport or effect of the act."

Section 60 of the Constitution was not violated by the act of 1898. The act of 1898 did not indirectly, but directly, repeal part of the act of 1892. That section does not mean that a general law can not be passed in reference alone to cities of two classes. If a general law applies to cities of all classes, it necessarily must apply alike to the cities of the same class. Such a law would not be violative of the provisions of the Constitution. As illustrative of this, counsel for appellant suggest section 1486 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides that "in all cities and towns of the first, second, third and fourth classes there shall be registration of all the qualified voters of the respective cities and towns, which registration shall be held and conducted as herein provided." This section is certainly constitutional. We are of the opinion that the act of 1898 is constitutional, and that the act of 1902 did not repeal it.

Judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Whole court sitting.

Judges Hobson and Nunn dissenting.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion:

The act of November 11, 1892, provided a system for the taxation of the franchises of public service corporations by the State and the several counties, cities, towns and taxing districts. It vested the power of assessing these franchises in the board of valuation and assessment. Their assessment was the basis of taxation by the State and by all the counties, cities, towns and taxing districts where the franchises were exercised. (Session Acts, 1891-2 3, 981-1002.) On March 19, 1898, an act, entitled "An act concerning the assessment and valuation for taxation of corporate franchises and intangible property by cities of the first and second class," was passed, providing for the assessment of these franchises by the city assessor for the purposes of city taxation. (Session Acts, 1898, page 96-102.) On March 29, 1902, the legislature enacted a general revenue act. (Session Acts, 1902, pages 281-392.) The question in this case is whether the last act repealed the act of March 19, 1898, by which the city assessor was authorized to assess for taxation in cities of the first and second class the franchises of these corporations.

Article 3, subdivision 1 of the act, provides for the taxation of the franchises of these corporations. (Pages 305-318.) In section 1 the corporations to be assessed are specified; the auditor, treasurer and secretary of state are constituted a board of valuation and assessment for fixing the value of the franchises, and where more than one jurisdiction is entitled to a share of the taxes the board is authorized to determine how the tax shall be apportioned. By section 2 reports are to be made to the auditor of a number of facts necessary to an intelligent assessment of the franchises. By sections 3, 4 and 5 rules as to the apportionment of taxes are given "in each county, incorporated city, town or taxing district." And in section 5 these words are used: "Such corporate franchise shall be liable to taxation in each county, incorporated city, town or district through or into which such lines pass or are operated in the same proportion that the length of the line in such county, city, town or district bears to the whole length of lines in this State."

Section 6 provides for a like system of taxation of any association not incorporated engaged in the business mentioned in the first article. Section 7 provides for a hearing before the board by any of the companies as to the valuation. Section 8 then follows in these words: "The auditor shall, at the expiration of thirty days after the final determination of such values, certify to the county clerk of the counties, when any portion of the corporate franchise of any such corporation, company or association shall be liable to local taxation as herein provided, the amount thereof liable for county, city, town or district tax; and such certificate shall be by each county clerk filed in his office, and be by him certified to the proper collecting officer of the county, city, town or taxing district for collection, and all county, city, municipal and other taxes shall be due and payable thirty days after the notice of the amount of such tax is given by the officer whose duty it is to collect the same."

Sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 make provisions in regard to the reports required of these corporations designed to secure the making of the reports. Section 15, after setting out that "all county, municipal, school and other taxes shall be due and payable thirty days after notice of the amount of the tax is given, adds: "Every such corporation, company or association failing to pay its taxes, receiving thirty days' notice, shall be deemed delinquent, and a penalty of 10 per cent. on the amount of the tax shall attach, and thereafter such tax shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum; any such corporation or association failing to pay its taxes, penalty and interest after becoming delinquent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be fined $50 for each day the same remains unpaid, to be recovered by indictment or civil action, of which the Franklin Circuit Court shall have jurisdiction." (Page 311.)

The last section of that act is in these words: "All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are to the extent of such conflict repealed."

It will be observed that the act creates a board to make the assessment of the franchises of these companies, and authorizes that board to apportion the taxes between the several counties, cities, towns and taxing districts entitled thereto, expressly providing that all county, city, municipal, school and other taxes shall be due and payable thirty days after the certificate of this board is filed in the clerk's office in the county, and notice of the amount of the tax is given by the officer whose duty it is to collect it. It will also be observed that the act provides a 10 per cent. penalty, as well as the payment of interest at 10 per cent., upon all county, municipal, school and other taxes which are not paid when due as above provided. And then, finally, it is provided that all acts or parts of acts in conflict therewith are to the extent of such conflict repealed.

The act of 1898 authorizing the assessment of the franchise of these corporations in cities of the first and second class by the city assessor for municipal taxation is clearly inconsistent with these provisions, for they require the assessment to be made by the board created thereby, not only for State purposes, but for "taxation in each county, incorporated city, town or district through or into which such lines pass or are operated in the same proportion that the length of the line in such county, city, town or district bears to the whole length of lines in this State." They necessarily regulate the entire subject of the assessment of the franchises of these corporations for State and municipal purposes, for nothing is excepted out of their operation, and, on the contrary, all acts or parts of acts in conflict with them are expressly repealed. Can it be believed that section 15, regulating the penalty and the interest to be paid on these taxes, if delinquent, was not intended by the legislature to apply to all cities of the Commonwealth?

And if section 15 applies to cities of the first and second classes, why does not section 1 of section 8?

That the legislature intended the act as a general revenue law is apparent from other provisions in it. The next subdivision of article 3 provides for the assessment of the stock of national banks, and manifestly applies to the "State, county, city, town and district." The next subdivision regulates building and loan associations; the next turnpikes. Article 4 regulates railroads, and is applicable by its express terms not only to State taxes, but to "all county, city, municipal, school and other taxes." Article 5 regulates the distillery bonded warehouses, and by its terms covers the taxes due the county, city, town or taxing district as well as the State. When it is conceded that as to railroads, distilleries and the like the act applies to all cities, how can it be maintained that it does not as to franchises of the public service corporations, where precisely the same words are used, and by the express terms of the act all laws in conflict with it are to the extent of such conflict repealed?

"It is not in accordance with settled rules of construction to ascribe to the law-making power an intention to establish conflicting and hostile systems upon the same subject, or to leave in force provisions of law, by which the later will of the legislature may be thwarted or overthrown. Such a result would render legislation a useless and idle ceremony, and subject the law to the reproach of uncertainty and unintelligibility." (Lyddy v. Long Island City, 104 N. Y., 218.)

In Payne v. Connor, 6 Ky., 108, this court had before it the effect of a repealing clause, which was in these words: "All acts or parts of acts coming within the purview hereof shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed." Speaking of the meaning of the word "purview," the court said: "The meaning usually attached to this term by writers on law seems to be the enacting part of a statute in contradistinction to the preamble, and we think the provision of the act repealing all acts or parts of acts coming within its purview should be understood as repealing all acts in relation to all cases which are provided for by the repealing act."

In the case before us the words of the repealing clause are broader. All acts in conflict with the last act are to the extent of such conflict repealed; and the case we have before us is in express terms provided for by the repealing act. The statute before us being a general revenue law, must be held to repeal all other statutes inconsistent with it then in force. In the Encyclopædia of Law, volume 23, page 477, the rule is thus stated: "Where an act is passed covering the whole of a particular subject or field of legislation it is customary to insert a general clause repealing all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith. Such a clause is effective in repealing inconsistent enactments."

In Patterson v. Caldwell, 1 Met., 489, this rule was enforced by this court, where it was held that section 875 of the Code of Practice, repealing all laws inconsistent with its provisions or applicable in any case provided for by the Code, abrogated certain provisions of the Revised Statutes as to taking out an attachment. This was followed in Grigsby v. Barr, 77 Ky., 330.

The authorities elsewhere are uniform to the same effect. (U. S. v. Cheeseman, 8 Sawy., 424; McRoberts v. Washburn, 10 Minn., 23; Ogden v. Wither- spoon, 2 Hayw., N. C., 227; Prince George County v. Laurel, 21 Md., 464.)

Two grounds are relied on to distinguish this case from those cited:

1st. The title of the act is very unusual. It is entitled "An act to amend the act of November 11, 1892," as amended by twelve subsequent acts, each entitled "An act to amend the act referred to," and after setting out all these in the title, it concludes with these words: "So that said act of November 11, 1892, and as amended by the above stated subsequent acts and amendments thereto, as now amended and re-enacted, will read as follows."

The title of an act may properly be looked to in construing the language of the act. But where there is no ambiguity in the terms used, the title can not be allowed to override the express provisions of the act itself. Everything in the act in question is germane to the subject expressed in the title. The fact that the act of 1898 was not referred to in the title is wholly immaterial. The only unusual thing is that so many amendments of the act of 1892 were set out in the title. If all the acts intended to be affected had been set out in the title, then it would have been entirely superfluous to have added the section repealing all laws in conflict with the act, for if there was nothing for this section to operate on, why was it inserted? There were many learned lawyers in the general assembly who were acquainted with the previous legislation and if all acts, so far as they were in conflict with this act, were not intended to be repealed by it, are we to assume that the legislature meant nothing by the repealing clause? All acts similar to the act of 1898, which had been passed since November 11, 1892, were not set out in the title. Act, entitled "An act to regulate the sale and assessment of lands for taxation owned by nonresidents of this Commonwealth" (Acts 1894, page 199); also an act extending the same (Acts 1894, page 212); also an act, entitled "An act regulating the mode of assessing building associations." (Acts 1894, page 342.)

Are all these acts, so far as they are inconsistent with the act of 1902, still in force? If not, how is the act of 1898 to be distinguished from the other inconsistent acts which are repealed to the extent they are inconsistent?

Besides all this, the legislative purpose seems plain enough. There had been a number of amendments to the act of 1892, so that the real law on the subject had to be spelled out from a number of inconsistent enactments. The legislature desired to make further changes and to show that the act it now passed superseded not only the original act, but all the amendments to it, placed in the title of the act all the acts intended to be blotted out, so that it would be understood that the law of the State was not to be spelled out in part from these acts and in part from the act which they passed. The act of 1898 was not one of those thus consolidated in the new act, and, therefore, was not mentioned in the title. But it was one of the acts coming within the purview of the repealing clause, because inconsistent with the provisions of the act.

2d. The rule is invoked that a general law does not repeal a special law on the same subject, and that both will be read together where this is practicable.

The rule is admitted, but it is not perceived that it has any application to the case before us. It rests upon the presumption that the legislature in making a law for the entire State did not have in mind the question of changing a special act applicable to a single town or county. But the act in question is not of this character. It applies to all cities of the State, of the first and second class. All cities having a population of twenty thousand or more must belong to one of these classes. So that the act applied to all cities in the State having a population of as much as twenty thousand. (Constitution, section 156.) By amendment it was made applicable to cities of third class having a population of eight thousand. The court knows judicially that this embraces all the more important cities in the State, and that in these cities the public service corporations are mainly located. Banks, trust companies, guaranty companies, gas companies, water companies, street railway companies, electric light companies, and the like, in the main have their headquarters at the centers of capital, and to exempt all of them in cities of the first, second and third classes from the operation of the bill would have been to exempt most of this capital from municipal taxation in the manner provided by the statute. It is incredible that the legislature could have overlooked such an exception, if it had intended to make it, for the reason that as to municipal taxes the exception would have been larger than what was left in the act. To apply the rule referred to in such a case would be to ignore the reason for the rule and to refuse proper effect to the express terms of the statute, repealing all other acts inconsistent therewith.

The general rule is that a statute revising the entire subject-matter of a previous act repeals it by implication. (Bartlett v. King, 7 Am. D., 99; State v. Wilson, 82 Am. D., 163; Rogers v. Watrous, 58 Am. D., 100; 7 Lawson on Rights and Remedies, section 3779.) The argument for appellant which is adopted by the court treats the case as dependent on the question whether that rule should be applied here. But that is not the case we have. Here the statute does not leave to implication what was meant, but in express terms declares that all inconsistent acts are, so far as they conflict with this act, repealed. In Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, after stating the rule as to implied repeals, in section 206 it is said: "Yet where a statute contemplates in express terms that its enactments will repeal earlier acts by their inconsistency with them, the chief argument or objection against repeal by implication is removed, and the earlier acts may be more readily treated as repealed. * * * Thus a declaration in a general law that all acts or parts of acts, whether local or special, or otherwise inconsistent with its provisions, are to be deemed repealed, will repeal inconsistent provisions, even in special acts."

If there had been no repealing clause in the act in question it would have been a matter of construction for the court on the whole act, how far the provisions of the statute were intended to supersede other acts not named in the title covering the same subject-matter. But when the legislature went further, and repealed all inconsistent acts, there is no room for the doctrine of implied repeal, and the only question is whether the former act is consistent with the latter. The acts set out in the title are by its express terms reduced to one, and embraced in the act in question. The repealing clause can not have reference to these acts, for by the terms of the act the new act is substituted for them; and if the repealing clause does not apply to other acts than those named in the title it was merely surplusage. No rule is better settled than that the court must presume that the legislature meant something by a section of the bill, else it would not have been added to it. If in the title the bill had been designated merely as an act to amend the act of November 11, 1892, would there be any doubt that the section repealing all other acts inconsistent with it, would have embraced the act of 1898? But if the title had so read other amendments to the act of 1892, so far as they were not inconsistent with this act, would have been left in force. To avoid this and incorporate in one act these various amendments, the title of these acts was inserted in the caption, and to reach other inconsistent acts, so far as they were in conflict with the act in question, the last section was added, repealing them so far as they conflicted with this act.

If the repealing clause of this act had provided that all acts, special or general, in conflict therewith were to the extent of said conflict repealed, then under all the authorities this would have included the act of 1898. But the legislature of this State is by the Constitution forbidden to enact special or local laws. The subjects embraced in the act of 1902 must, under the Constitution, be regulated by general laws. The authorities from other States where general legislation is prohibited, to the effect that a general repealing clause does not include special acts, has no place in this State. It would never occur to any one to insert now in a bill, covering a subject which must be regulated by general laws, words repealing special acts inconsistent therewith, and it can not be expected the legislature should do a vain thing. To say that the act of 1902 could have contemplated that it was only to apply to the cities and towns of the State other than those of the first, second and third classes as to municipal taxation of franchises is to presume that the legislature, when it used general words including all the cities intended to exempt from this mode of municipal taxation at least three-fourths of this class of capital in the State. If the statement of the proposition is not a sufficient answer to it, then it is submitted that the presumption no longer exists that the legislature acts intelligently, and uses words in its enactments advisedly.

I, therefore, dissent from the opinion of the court.

THACKER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 11, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Instructions—Self-defense and defense of another—Evidence—Appellant was convicted and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for life under an indictment for the murder of G. On the trial he claimed that the killing was done in self-defense and in defense of his son, R. Errors in the instructions and admission of incompetent evidence are urged as grounds for reversal. Held—That the court erred to the prejudice of appellant in giving instructions to the jury on the right to kill in self-defense; also on the right to kill in defense of another, as fully set out in the opinion. The court erred in admitting testimony as to the particulars of a difficulty which occurred between appellant and W. a short time before the arrival of deceased on the grounds, as there was no connection between these difficulties. Evidence as to previous acts and conversation of appellant at another place was improperly admitted without admonition to the jury that said evidence was competent only to show the intent or state of mind of appellant at the time he fired the shot that killed deceased.

L. F. Johnson and W. G. Dearing for appellant.

C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for appellee.

Appeal from Fleming Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant, W. J. Thacker, was tried at the January, 1902, term of the Fleming Circuit Court on a charge of murder and convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

Near Foxport, in Fleming county, on July 30, 1900, the appellant shot and killed John Gordon. At the trial, as shown by the record, the appellee claimed it was a case of willful murder, and appellant that it was a case of self-defense and defense of his son, Robert Thacker. There was evidence introduced to sustain both these contentions. Appellant claims that the lower court erred to his prejudice in its instructions to the jury and in admitting incompetent evidence.

We have carefully examined all the instructions given, and find that the court gave the law of the case, except instructions 2, 4 and 6. No. 2 was prejudicial in this, "and not in his necessary self-defense, or reasonably apparent necessary self-defense." The court should, instead, have used these words, "and not in his or his son, Robert's, necessary, or apparently necessary, self-defense, and under provocation ordinarily calculated to excite passion beyond control."

No. 4 was erroneous in this: "Defendant believed and had reasonable grounds to believe that he was in danger." The court should have used these words: "Defendant had reasonable grounds to believe, either real or apparent, and did in good faith believe, that he was then in imminent danger of losing his life or suffering great bodily harm at the hands of said Gordon, and there were no other apparently safe means of escape from the impending, or to him apparent impending, danger, then the defendant had the right, etc."

No. 6 was very prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused. Under this instruction, before he could act in the defense of his son, Robert, or before the jury could acquit him on that ground, the jury was required to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that his son was not in fault or the aggressor, and that defendant must have believed beyond a reasonable doubt that it was necessary to kill Gordon to save his son, and that Gordon was not acting in his self-defense when he was about to kill his son. In other words, the instruction required the jury to convict defendant unless the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that he killed Gordon in defense of his son.

Instead of the 6th instruction the court should, in substance, have said this to the jury: "If the jury believe from the evidence that when the defendant shot and killed John Gordon, if he did so, he had reasonable grounds to believe, either real or apparent, and did in good faith believe, that his son, Robert Thacker, was then in imminent danger of losing his life or suffering great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased, John Gordon, and there were no other apparently safe means of escape by Robert Thacker from the impending danger, then the defendant had the right, and it was lawful for him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to use such force as was reasonably necessary, or apparently necessary, to save and protect his son," Robert Thacker's, life or his person from great bodily harm, even to the taking of the life of said Gordon. On such grounds, and under such circumstances, the defendant is excusable under the law of defense of another. The danger to one's life or great bodily harm to his person which authorized defendant to act in his defense, or in the defense of his son as herein indicated, may be real danger or apparent danger."

And the court should have further instructed the jury in substance: "That if they believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant's son, Robert Thacker, made a demonstration to assault John Gordon with a knife, for the purpose of killing the said Gordon or inflicting upon him great bodily harm, then the jury can not acquit the defendant upon the ground that he acted in the defense of his son Robert. But if the jury believe from the evidence that Robert Thacker approached Gordon, if he did so, not for the purpose of assaulting him and killing him, or inflicting upon him great bodily harm, and that Gordon first made a demonstration to strike Robert Thacker with a deadly weapon, if he did so, and then the defendant believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that Gordon was then and there about to kill his son Robert or inflict great bodily harm upon him, then the defendant had the right to use such means in defense of his son as in the exercise of a reasonable judgment were apparently necessary for his safety, as set out in the instruction, on defense of his son."

It was also error for the court to allow the particulars of the difficulty between defendant and Wycoff, that occurred before Gordon arrived at the place of the killing, to be detailed to the jury, as there was no connection between these difficulties. This had a tendency to draw off the minds of the jury from the real issue, the killing of Gordon, and possibly may have caused the jury to fix the punishment of defendant greater, if they believed from the detailed statement of the facts of that difficulty that Wycoff was innocent of any wrong, and that defendant had imposed on him. It was proper that evidence be introduced that the trouble between them took place and in view of Gordon and Earls, who were about three hundred yards away, as a reason why they went to the scene of the difficulty.

The court should have admonished the jury that they should only consider the evidence as to the conversation and acts of the defendant at Foxport some time prior to the killing as tending, if it tended in any way, to show the intent or state of mind of the defendant at the time he fired the shot that killed Gordon.

For these reasons the case is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

VAUGHT, &c. v. MURRAY, &c.

(Filed February 11, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Pleading—Fraud and surprise—P. sold to S. a tract of sixty-four acres of land, for which he paid the purchase money except $852.65, for which he executed his note. Five years later S. sold said land, also another tract containing 142 acres, for $4,993.80 to M., who paid $3,000 and executed his two notes for $996.90 each, which were transferred, one to V. and the other to C. A., the administrator of P., filed a suit to enforce his lien for the payment of the purchase-money note on the sixty-four-acre tract of land. S. filed his answer, setting up an indebtedness to him from P. of $3,500, and that on a settlement made between him and the administrator it was agreed that the note for $852.65 should be cancelled, and that the administrator should pay him $400, and he prayed judgment for this amount. The administrator, after considerable delay, offered to file a reply to this answer, but the court refused to permit him to do so and rendered judgment in favor of S. for $400. On appeal that judgment was reversed. After this suit was instituted V. and C. instituted their actions to enforce the collection of the two purchase-money notes held by them. A judgment was finally rendered in favor of V. and C., and the land was ordered sold to pay same. The land was sold to pay said debts, leaving M. owning forty-one acres, and it was ordered that V. and C. should receive said money upon executing refunding bonds to pay the amount of any judgment in favor of P.'s administrator against S., then pending in the Court of Appeals. After the return of the former case from the Court of Appeals S. filed an amended answer, and the administrator filed a reply. S. offered to file a rejoinder, but objection was made thereto. This case had, by order of court, been consolidated with the latter case, and the next step taken was by P.'s administrator, who took two depositions on his behalf five days before the court convened, at which term the court rendered a judgment adjudging to the administrator the amount of the note, and directed V. and C. to refund $674.19 each to pay said judgment as they had agreed to do. V. and C. have prosecuted an appeal, contending that the court erred in refusing to permit the rejoinder to be filed; also that as they were parties to the consolidated actions they were entitled to notice of the taking of depositions, and that by a fraudulent agreement between the administrator and S., S. would not resist said claim and permit judgment to go against him, and that this agreement was a fraud upon their rights; that S. had a valid defense and that his abandonment of said defense was a surprise to them, and that they should have been granted a continuance in order to enable them to make defense. Held—That the court erred in refusing to grant V. and C. a continuance on the ground of surprise, as they were parties to the action and interested in the result and entitled to make defense and to have notice of the taking of depositions. If the claim of the administrator was correct the court did not err in requiring V. and C. to refund an amount sufficient to pay same. While this note was a lien on the sixty-four acres of land, V. and C. had agreed to protect said land from the payment of the note, and they should not complain.

J. A. Sullivan for appellants.

W. J. Williams for appellees.

Appeal from Madison Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

In the year 1889 Alva Pullins sold and conveyed to one John W. Smith a tract of land, containing sixty-four acres, in Madison county, Kentucky, for the price of $1,945. Smith at the time paid all the purchase price, except $852.65, for which he executed his note to Pullins.

In the year 1894 said J. W. Smith sold this tract of land, together with another survey adjoining it, both pieces containing 142 acres, to the defendant, James P. Murray, for the price of $4,993.80, and Murray paid at the time $3,000, and executed to Smith his two notes, in equal amounts, $996.90 each, for the balance, due in one and two years. J. W. Smith sold and transferred one of said notes to one Price, and by him it was assigned to appellant Vaught; and the other one was assigned by Smith to the appellant, Citizens National Bank of Lancaster, Ky. But before Price and the bank became the owners of these notes, or at least before James P. Murray had any notice thereof, he (Murray) made another payment to Smith of $410.

In the early part of the year 1896 Jack Adams, as the administrator of Alva Pullins, filed suit on the said $852.65 note against J. W. Smith, and sought a personal judgment and the enforcement of a vendor's lien on the sixty-four acre tract of land. Smith filed an answer, claiming that the estate of Pullins was indebted to him in the sum of $3,500 for services rendered Alva Pullins as his agent in transacting his business for him; and further, that after the death of Pullins he had a settlement with his administrator, Jack Adams, and it was agreed that the said $852.65 note should be cancelled, and the administrator was to pay him $400, and prayed judgment therefor. The administrator delayed filing a reply to said answer, and when he offered to file same the court refused to allow him to file it, and rendered judgment in favor of Smith, the defendant, for $400, and cancelled said note, from which judgment the administrator appealed to this court, and the same was reversed. (20 Ky. Law Rep., 1898.)

In the latter part of 1896 the appellants, Vaught and the bank, commenced proceedings against James P. Murray on the two notes referred to, seeking a personal judgment and the enforcement of their liens on the 142-acre tract of land. Murray answered, setting up the payment of the said $410, and also setting up the prior lien of $852.65 claimed by Pullins' administrator, and that the case was pending in the Court of Appeals and undetermined, and that J. W. Smith, his vendor, was insolvent. The court rendered a judgment directing a sale of Murray's land to pay said two debts, interest and costs, and the commissioner made a report that he had sold 101 acres of said land to defendant, James P. Murray, to pay said amount, about $2,600, leaving forty-one acres of the whole tract unsold, the forty-one acres being a part of the tract sold to Smith by said Alva Pullins.

On the 14th day of December, 1900, the appellants, Vaught and the bank, filed an agreed judgment, in which it is stated that the master commissioner will credit each of Murray's sale bonds with $205 and collect the balance of the bonds from Murray, with interest, "and pay over to C. H. Vaught and Citizens National Bank of Lancaster the amount of their judgments, and upon their executing to him a bond to refund or repay to the commissioner, under the orders of this court, the amount respectively paid to them, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy a judgment in favor of Alva Pullins' Adm'r v. J. W. Smith as a lien on the land in controversy, or any part thereof, in the event such judgment is rendered."

Under this agreed order the money was paid by Murray and the refunding bond executed.

On January 30, 1900, the mandate of this court in the case of Alva Pullins v. J. W. Smith was filed in the lower court, and on the 5th day of March thereafter Smith filed an amended answer, and on the 6th of April Alva Pullins' administrator filed reply to said answer and amended answer. On the 12th day of December, 1900, defendant Smith offered to file a rejoinder, to which objection was made, and the court at that term did not pass on said objection. This case had, by order of court, been consolidated with the Vaught and bank case against Murray, from 1897 to the judgment appealed from. The next step taken in the case was by plaintiff, Alva Pullins' administrator, who took two depositions in his behalf on the 30th of March, 1901, in Garrard county, about five days before the court convened, at which term the judgment complained of was rendered.

The appellants complain and ask a reversal of this judgment because the court refused to allow the rejoinder of defendant Smith to be filed, and refused to allow them to file pleadings controverting the plaintiff's claim, and also they were parties to the consolidated actions and were interested in the result of the claim of Pullins, and they were not served with any notice of the time and place of the taking of said depositions, and asked that they be suppressed. The court overruled their objections and permitted them to be read. They filed affidavits, setting forth the above statements, and also stated that they had just been informed for the first time, and charged it as true, "that Alva Pullins' administrator and the defendant, John W. Smith, had recently entered into a fraudulent agreement, by which the said Smith was not to resist said claim and was to permit judgment to go against him at that term of the court, and that said agreement was a fraud upon their rights; that said Smith had a good defense to said claim; that he did not owe any part of it, and that his abandonment of his defense was a great surprise to them and they asked a continuance. The court refused same and rendered judgment for the full amount of said claim, interest and costs, and directed Vaught and the bank to refund $674.19 each to pay said judgment, as they had agreed to do by their said refunding bonds.

Appellants contend that they ought, under the circumstances of the case, to have had notice of the taking of the said depositions. We think that they were correct, for after the execution of the said refunding bonds they were real parties in interest on the question as to whether Pullins' claim was a just one. The actions were consolidated and it appeared that J. W. Smith was insolvent, and the court, at appellants' instance, should have granted them a continuance on their affidavits charging collusion between Pullins' administrator and J. W. Smith, and their recent knowledge thereof and great surprise in Smith abandoning his defense to said claim. They also contend that the court erred in directing them to refund, and say that the court should have directed a sale of the forty-one acres of land to pay this debt, and then directed them to refund the balance, if any of the debt was left unpaid. The appellants are in error on this proposition. They overlook the fact that James P. Murray had paid every dollar that he contracted to pay for the whole 142 acres of land, and more in the way of costs, and that Murray would have retained in his hands enough of the purchase price to have paid the Pullins' claim but for the fact that the appellants induced him to pay to them by the execution of the refunding bond, and by said agreed order they promised to refund the money when ordered by the court.

It is true that Pullins' claim, if just, is a lien, and a prior lien, on the sixty-four acre tract of land, but as appellants agreed with James P. Murray to protect him against it, the lower court did right in ordering them to refund instead of incurring the expense of a sale of the land and then requiring James P. Murray to proceed against appellants to reimburse himself.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded to the lower court for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LITHGOW MANUFACTURING CO. v. SAMUEL.

(Filed February 11, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Ratification—Master and servant—This appeal involves the question of liability of appellant for the services of a surgeon who attended an employe who was severely injured while in the discharge of his duties. Held—That while there is no legal obligation resting on a master to pay for medical attention to his servant who may be injured while in the discharge of his duties, yet if he authorizes the employment of a surgeon, or ratifies such employment after the services are rendered, he will be liable for same. In this case both the question of employment and ratification were submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and the evidence being conflicting, their finding will not be disturbed. Where a party offers no instruction on a given point, his objection to an instruction given on that point will not be considered on appeal. Objections to instructions will not be considered on appeal unless same were made grounds for a new trial.

W. W. & J. R. Watts for appellant.

Simrall & Doolan for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

This suit was brought by appellee, Dr. F. W. Samuel, a surgeon, against the appellant corporation to recover for his services rendered to one of appellant's employes, who had been seriously injured in an accident in their foundry.

The issue was made up to whether appellee had been employed by any one authorized to represent appellant in that matter. The question was submitted to the jury. A number of witnesses were heard. Whilst the evidence is not as clear and conclusive as is desirable, yet it presents about such a state of case as might not unreasonably be expected under the circumstances attending a sudden and horrible accident, endangering probably the life of one to whom the corporation owed certain peculiar duties as master. At such a time it is not expected that parties should stop to negotiate a formal contract. There is evidence to the effect that appellant's superintendent and general manager authorized the employment of appellee, and that subsequently, with full knowledge of the fact that he had rendered the services to the injured man, and was continuing to do so, and was expected to continue, he ratified that employment.

It is true that is now denied by appellant's superintendent. It is one of the cases that is peculiarly within the province of the jury to decide. We adhere to the doctrine stated in Godshaw v. Struck, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 820, that an unauthorized employment of a physician or surgeon to wait upon an injured servant can not bind the master for payment of the surgeon's services, although the master may have been aware that the surgeon was rendering the services. In such case ordinarily the master is not bound to employ a surgeon to wait upon one in his employment who may be injured while engaged in his work. However, if the cause of the injury is such that the master would be liable to the servant for damages, including medical bills, because of the master's negligence in any particular, and where the master recognizes this liability, and does employ medical attention, or ratifies the employment made in his name, with full knowledge of the fact that it has been so made, we perceive no sound reason why he should not pay for them.

The question of ratification was, we think, fairly presented by the pleadings, and the instructions to the jury submitted simply the two propositions for determination: First, whether the employment was authorized by appellant; and, second, if not authorized at the time, was it subsequently ratified? The complaint that the court did not define to the jury by a further instruction the legal meaning of "ratification" can not be available to appellant on this appeal, because it offered no instruction on that point nor did its grounds for new trial make the giving of instructions by the court one of the reasons on which a retrial was asked. (McLain v. Dibble, 18 Bush, 298; Alexander v. Humber, 86 Ky., 569; Bailey v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 19 Ky. Law Rep., 1617.)

The judgment in favor of appellee for the value of his services as fixed by the jury must be affirmed.

SIMS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 11, 1903.)

Insurance agents—Foreign insurance companies—Criminal law—Appellant was convicted of the offense of soliciting life insurance as agent of a foreign company without first having procured a license and authority to conduct such business from the insurance commissioner. The defense interposed is that the company represented by appellant is not an insurance company, but a fraternal society. Held—That said company is a foreign insurance company within the meaning of section 641, Kentucky Statutes. No lodges were established in this State by said company until after 250 policies had been written. Filing articles of incorporation in Jefferson county by said company did not constitute it a domestic corporation as no copy thereof was ever filed in the office of the secretary of state, as required by section 880, Kentucky Statutes. The conviction of appellant was proper.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellant.

LaVega, Clements and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellee.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellant was convicted and fined in the lower court for the offense of soliciting life insurance, as the agent of a foreign company, without first having procured a license and authority to conduct such business from the insurance commissioner.

The defense interposed was that the company represented by the appellant is not an insurance company, but merely a fraternal society, and though the contract it makes with its members is a contract of insurance, it is claimed that the insurance is only incidental to such fraternal society, and that the corporation is exempt from the jurisdiction of the State insurance department, because it does not transact its business through soliciting agents, but only such as undertake the work of organizing and supervising local unions and lodges.

Section 641, Kentucky Statutes, declares that the words " 'insurance company' or 'insurance corporation' shall include any association, individual, company, corporation, partnership or stock company engaged in or carrying on in any manner the business of insurance in this State, except that the provisions of this chapter or article shall not apply to secret or fraternal societies, lodges or councils which are under the supervision of a grand or supreme body and secure members through the lodge system exclusively, and pay no commission nor employ any agent except in the work of local subordinate lodges or councils." So the question presented for the consideration of this court is, is the appellant the agent of a corporation whose business is that of insurance or benevolence?

We know of no better definition of an insurance contract than is found in Commonwealth v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. Rep., 160, wherein it is said: "A contract of insurance is an agreement by which one party for a consideration (which is usually paid in money either in one sum or at different times during the continuance of the risk) promises to make certain payments of money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest. All that is requisite to constitute such a contract is the payment of the consideration by the one and the promise of the other to pay the amount of the insurance upon the happening of an injury to the subject by a contingency contemplated in the contract."

Tested by the foregoing definition, we find that the certificate of membership contained in the record (which is the form of contract used between the corporation represented by appellant and its members) is neither more nor less than a contract of insurance, for it recites that in consideration of the payment by one Wm. Smith, named therein, of a certain sum of money each and every week, during the existence of the contract, the corporation would pay him a certain sum of $3 per week in case of sickness or accident, and in case of his death the sum of $55 to the beneficiaries or assigns named in the contract, upon satisfactory proof of death filed in the office of the corporation.

The certificate or policy further provides that the insured must have been in good health and free from disease at the time of application for membership. It declares that "no invalids of any kind can hold a policy in this company." It also provides that if a member shall fail to pay his "premiums" for thirty days he forfeits all money paid to the company, and that members in arrears receive no benefits while sick. A medical examination is required of all applicants for membership. The application is made a part of the contract, and it will be found to contain the questions that appear in all other applications for life insurance, such as the usual inquiries as to age, birth, health, family and personal history, habits, etc.

In Supreme Commandery of the United Order of the Golden Cross v. Hughes, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 984, it was decided by this court that such a society or company as is represented by appellant is an "assessment or co-operative company," declared by section 664 of the statute to be an insurance company engaged in the business of life insurance on the co operative or assessment plan.

Between April 1 and July 1, 1901, 250 members were insured by this company in Owensboro, and these members did not attach themselves to a lodge to become insured, but were secured by employed agents of the company through whom they received certificates or contracts of insurance. The lodge so called, which seems to have been organized by those claiming membership in the company, was not established until after this prosecution was commenced against appellant. It must, therefore, have been a mere after-thought. It is apparent, too, that the filing of articles of incorporation in Jefferson county by the company represented by appellant did not constitute it a domestic corporation, as no copy thereof was ever filed in the office of the secretary of state as required by section 880, Kentucky Statutes. Upon the other hand, it is shown beyond question that the company is a foreign corporation, for it styles itself The National Industrial Benefit Endowment Co. of Lynchburg, Va., and was originally incorporated at Lynchburg, Va., where its chief office is yet located. All the contracts of insurance are made in that city, all moneys that are collected and all reports that are made are sent there.

Although appellant's company may be deemed an assessment or co-operative insurance company, as defined in section 664 of the statute, that fact will not relieve him from the penalty imposed by the judgment of the lower court, for as it is beyond doubt a foreign corporation, and in law and in fact an insurance company, he was required by section 633 of the statute supra to obtain of the State commissioner of insurance a license to represent it as agent before transacting any business for the company in this State.

As it was admitted on the trial that appellant had not procured a license of the insurance commissioner the judgment of conviction is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed February 11, 1903.)

Railroads—Long and short hauls—Constitutional law—Construction of statutes—Railroad commission—Appellant was indicted for a violation of section 820, Kentucky Statutes, commonly known as the long and short haul statute. A trial was had and a motion was made for a peremptory instruction for defendant on the ground that the railroad commission had made no charges that appellant had violated that statute, and recommended an indictment, which motion was refused. The legality of the action of the court is involved on this appeal. Held—That the lower court erred to the prejudice of appellant in refusing said peremptory instruction. It was the evident intent of the people of the State in adopting section 218 of the Constitution providing for the creation of a railroad commission to authorize them to investigate all charges for a violation of the rules for charges for hauling freight long and short distances. This was also the object of the legislature in the adoption of the statute in question. The railroad commission being composed of men of ability, with peculiar means of information as to all questions of competition and management of railroads, was thought to be better suited to investigate these charges than the grand jury. As the guilt or innocence of the corporation depends on the existence or nonexistence of facts which are, or at least may be, ever varying, it follows as a logical sequence that if the corporation is to have the benefit of these ever varying conditions before it is indicted, that such investigation must be had in every case as a prerequisite to an indictment. The investigation of the railroad commission, and an adverse decision by it against the railroad, is necessary in every case before an indictment can be had under the statute, and this statute is not unconstitutional. Section 820, Kentucky Statutes, gives the remedy for violation of section 218 of the Constitution, and it comes within the familiar rule of construction, that when a statute gives a remedy it is usually exclusive, and it is not a cumulative remedy. It is no answer to the argument in favor of this previous investigation by the railroad commission to say that four years before the indictment in question was found the commission had decided other cases under this statute involving freight rates between the same localities against the railroad, and recommended its indictment and punishment therefor.

Concurring opinion by Paynter, Judge:

The legislature in the enactment of section 820 had gone further than it was authorized to go by section 218 of the Constitution. The decision of this court in the case of the Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth is the law of this case; it should be respected by this court and the court should not allow a punishment to be inflicted upon a carrier in disregard of the law as adjudicated therein. This provision of the Constitution authorizing the railroad commission to consider special cases, etc., is not for the purpose of allowing it to determine whether the carrier shall be indicted for past offenses, but is for the purpose of allowing it to determine whether or not it shall be entitled to charge less for the longer than for the shorter distance for the transportation of passengers, property, etc., and to determine to what extent the common carrier should be relieved from the operation of the section. This section does not attempt to confer upon the railroad commission the right to relieve against previous acts, but to give it the authority to make it lawful for the carrier to charge more for the short than for the long haul. Section 820, Kentucky Statutes, has reference to past acts, while section 218 of the Constitution is dealing with future ones.

W. C. McChord, E. W. Hines, T. B. Harrison, Jr., and B. D. Warfield for appellant.

H. W. Rives for appellee.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

The appellant was indicted by the grand jury of the Marion Circuit Court at its January term, 1899, for a violation of section 820 of the Kentucky Statutes, commonly known as the long and short haul statute. It will not be necessary in this case to examine the indictment further than to say that

Its allegations are sufficient, and that it contains, among other things, a statement that it was found upon the recommendation of the railroad commission. The case came on for trial in the Marion Circuit Court in 1902, and the only evidence introduced by the Commonwealth in support of the allegation, that the indictment was found upon the recommendation of the railroad commission, was a report of the commission to the Marion Circuit Court and grand jury, made in 1895, charging the appellant with violations of section 820 of the statute, and recommending its indictment in some fifteen specially named cases, none of which was the case at bar. The appellant, at the close of the Commonwealth's testimony, moved the court for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find it not guilty. This motion was overruled. The court then gave written instructions to the jury, and the case having been submitted, a verdict of guilty was returned, and a penalty of $300 imposed upon appellant. The motion for a new trial having been overruled the case is here on appeal.

The conclusion which we have reached regarding the law of this case makes it unnecessary to examine or discuss any other questions than such as are involved in the proposition as to whether or not the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction. In order to obtain the meaning and intent of section 820 of the Kentucky Statutes it is necessary to take a brief survey of the history of its enactment.

There had been much complaint, of long standing, throughout the Commonwealth that the railroads were habitually engaged in the business of discriminating between localities in the matter of freight rates; that cities and communities were being pushed forward in the march of material progress by friendly discrimination on the part of the railroads at the expense of other cities and communities, which were being retarded and repressed by unfriendly discriminating rates. Whether or not this was true is immaterial; it was believed to be true, and this belief on the part of the people of the State was crystallized in section 218 of the Constitution, and in the subsequent enactment of section 820, providing a remedial procedure to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution on this subject.

But while there was ardent desire on the part of the people and their representatives to repress the offense of unjust discrimination by railroad corporations, there was also a wholesome fear of unjustly and wantonly injuring these great and necessary agencies of the material prosperity of the Commonwealth, by hasty and ill-informed zeal, in the matter of applying the remedy to the supposed wrong. It was recognized that the subject of transportation in railroad business involves one of the most profound and abstruse problems with which the railroad managers have to deal. It was seen that with this problem the average jurymen, whether grand or petit, would be helpless and impotent; that he would neither have the trained power nor the necessary data to enable him to understand the difficult subject involved in the expression "substantially similar circumstances and conditions;" and that a jury, organized in a community smarting under the exasperation of a supposed invidious discrimination of rates against it, would be unable to take any but a narrow and sectional view of the acts, from the effects of which they were suffering. Therefore, it was deemed wise to take the whole subject out of the danger of sectional bias and place it in the hands of a commission, representing not one community, but the whole State; a commission which should be elected, in the aggregate, by all of the people of the Commonwealth, and which, for this reason, would represent the interest of the whole State, and not the interest of any single city or locality; a commission which would take into consideration the needs of the manufacturer, the miner the lumberman and the railroads, as well as the interest of the people at large; and which would lift the subject out of the realm of sectionalism, and place it in the realm of commercial statesmanship. In order that the commission should do this they were to be elected for a term of years, that they might have ample time to study all of the questions involved in their duty; they were given a salary adequate to warrant the devotion of their whole time to the questions of railroad management; and it was made the duty of every railroad corporation in the State to make an annual report to them, embracing every fact concerning the affairs of the corporation which were presumed by the framers of the law to be necessary to a proper understanding of the whole problem of regulating the railroad corporations of the Commonwealth; and for fear that the statutory report required had overlooked some data necessary or useful to this end, it was provided that the corporation should answer any other questions propounded to them by the commissioners. The commissioners were invested with the power to summon any person or persons they pleased, and to examine them, under oath, touching any subject connected with the affairs of the operation of a railroad in the State.

It is impossible to read the whole law, the substance of which is here sketched, without being impressed with the fact that the commissioners were to be prepared to grapple with problems which no grand or petit jury of the Commonwealth could successfully compass, and that the duty of making the investigation, which involved the exercise of all this knowledge, so laboriously acquired, lies at the very root of, and is precedent to, an indictment by a grand jury for an offense which could only be properly investigated by an intelligent and well-informed commission.

It would, indeed, be a vain and useless thing to establish a railroad commission, to be elected by the people of the whole State, and put into their hands all the data concerning railroads which the owners and managers thereof possessed, if the problems to be solved were such as an average jury would be competent to grasp and understand. If there was nothing in the problem but the respective distances of the localities, and the respective rates charged thereto, the proposition would, instead of being profound and abstruse, be reduced to the simplicity of the equation that two plus two equals four. But there was recognized to be far more in the problem than the distance of the two localities from the point of shipment and the respective rates imposed; the question of competition was to be considered, and was recognized as being involved in the problem of "substantially similar circumstances and conditions;" and this being a subject with which the commission could, and the jury could not, deal, it was required, as a condition precedent to an indictment in any particular case, that the commission should first decide whether or not the circumstances and conditions were substantially similar. If, after examination, this question was decided adversely to the railroad, then the remaining facts necessary to be es-

Established, to constitute its guilt, were peculiarly within the province of the jury. If this question was decided in favor of the railroad, then there was nothing for the jury to do in the premises.

In the case of the Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 28 Ky. Law Rep., 1159, it was held by this court that an investigation by the railroad commission was a condition precedent to an indictment by a grand jury for a violation of the provisions of section 820 of the Kentucky Statutes. In the case cited the court said: "In the construction of statutes the cardinal aim of the court is to arrive at the intention of the legislature. The court will presume that the legislature meant something by all the provisions of the statute, and will endeavor to give them all a fair effect. If the legislature had intended indictments to be found for each offense regardless of action by the railroad commission, we see no reason why the section might not have stopped with the first sentence defining the offense and providing for its punishment, for by the next section (Kentucky Statutes, section 891) it is made the duty of the commission 'to see that the laws relating to all railroads, except street, are faithfully executed;' and under this provision it would be the duty of the commission to see to violations of the preceding section. Not only so, but it provided in section 820 that if the commission deems it proper to exonerate a carrier from the operation of its provisions, an order to that effect shall be made, and after such order the carrier shall not be prosecuted for that matter. To indict the carrier, in the first place, without action by the railroad commission would be to deprive it of all benefit of this provision. If the commission had only power to pass on the same facts as the grand jury, it might, perhaps, be maintained that the legislature intended to provide a cumulative remedy, and that a preliminary hearing before the commission was not essential. But such is not the fact."

The court, then, after discussing various decisions of this court on kindred propositions, goes on to say: "It will be observed that the constitutional convention did not adopt a hard and fast rule, making the charge of more for the short than for the long haul unlawful, but expressly empowered the commission to authorize the railroad to charge less for longer than for shorter distances, and to prescribe from time to time the extent to which the carrier might be relieved from the operation of the section. There were many industries in the State whose interests required this. More than one coal famine had occurred. The only security against a recurrence of this trouble was our domestic coal; but this could not be available unless given lower rates so that it could compete in the market with the coal shipped by water. If it could not thus compete, it could not be relied on as a supply in an emergency. The low rate in this case was given on coal shipped to Louisville, because it there came in competition with coal brought down the Ohio river. The railroad commission was the only tribunal authorized to relieve appellant from the operation of the section. No such power was vested in the courts. The question of competition could not be examined there, nor could it be shown that a proper case existed for exoneration from the section. The legislature, therefore, provided for the preliminary hearing before the railroad commission, not as a cumulative remedy, but that it might determine whether the carrier should be exonerated or not, and, therefore, it was provided that if the commission relieved the carrier from the operation of the section no prosecution should be had on account of the matter complained of. It also further provided that if the commission failed to exonerate the carrier it should make an order in writing to that effect, and furnish 'a statement of the facts, together with a copy of its order to the grand jury of any county, the circuit court of which has jurisdiction, in order that the railroad company or carrier may be indicted for the offense.' The requirement that the commission should furnish the grand jury a copy of its order, in order that the railroad company might be indicted for the offense, must be read in connection with the previous clause, that if the company was exonerated the railroad company should not be prosecuted. The plain meaning of the two together is that the railroad company may be indicted for the offense if not exonerated, and may not be indicted if it is exonerated, and the copy of the order of the commission refusing to exonerate it is required to be furnished to the grand jury in order that the company may be indicted."

It is no answer to this reasoning to say that four years before the indictment in question was found the commission had decided other cases under section 820, involving freight rates between the same localities, against the railroad, and recommended its indictment and punishment therefor.

The problem of competition in railroad traffic is an ever varying one, and the decision of the commission at any given time could, of necessity, only determine the condition of the question at the time of its promulgation, and prior thereto. Of the future, unless they possessed the gift of prophecy, they could not determine. The same necessity for a thorough examination of the circumstances and conditions of competition would exist at any subsequent time as at the original investigation unless we are to suppose that there are never any changes in the status of railroad competition. On the contrary, common experience teaches us that what would be a righteous decision on the question of competition of freights between localities at any given time, might be iniquitously unjust at a subsequent time, and, therefore, it is impossible to suppose that the law-making power meant that the declaration of the commission in refusing to exonerate appellant from the provisions of section 820, at any given time, was to act as a formal declaration of war on it, under which letters of marque and reprisal were to be issued and enforced by the grand jury along its line until such time as peace might be declared by a new edict of the commission. Such a conclusion would be crude and unscientific, and does violence to the plain letter of the statute.

Section 820 gives the remedy for violation of section 218 of the Constitution, and it comes within the familiar rule of construction, that when a statute gives a remedy, it is usually exclusive, or, as said in the Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, supra, "the legislature provided, therefore, for the preliminary hearing before the railroad commission, not as a cumulative remedy, but that it might determine whether the carrier should be exonerated or not."

There is nothing in the principles enunciated in the cases of the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky., 226; the Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 106 Ky., 633, or the Louis- ville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 239, inimical to the views herein expressed. In each of these cases a trial was had before the railroad commission, and a judgment refusing to exonerate the railroad rendered as a prerequisite to the indictment by the grand jury. In each case the indictment was returned on the advice, or suggestion, of the commission.

So far as these cases illustrate anything in the case at bar they tend to bear out the necessity for an investigation by the commission as a condition precedent to an indictment in every case; they certainly do not militate against this view, as the slightest examination will show.

The question of the necessity for an investigation by the commission as a prerequisite to an indictment never arose in this court until the I. C. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, supra. The principle announced in the case at bar is the principle of the I. C. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth carried to its natural and legitimate conclusion. The guilt of the railroad in any given case does not depend on the commission, or on its rules or regulations, but on the question whether the corporation has or has not violated the provisions of section 218 of the Constitution. The investigation of the commission only establishes the fact as to whether it has, or has not, violated said section. In reaching their conclusion as to whether the corporation is guilty or innocent, the commission examines into the question as to whether or not the conditions and circumstances are substantially similar. If so, the corporation is guilty; if not, it is innocent.

As the guilt or innocence of the corporation depends on the existence or nonexistence of facts, which are, or at least, may be, ever varying, it follows, as a legal and logical sequence, that if the corporation is to have the benefit of these ever-varying conditions before it is indicted, that such investigation must be had in each and every case as a prerequisite to an indictment.

We conclude, therefore, that the investigation of the railroad commission, and an adverse decision by it against the railroad, is necessary, in every case, before an indictment can be had under section 820 of the statutes; that no declaration of the commission on the subject of competition in freights can be projected into the future, but must act alone on the present and the past.

This construction, we think, is in harmony with the act in question. We believe that it puts into the hands of a brave, intelligent and zealous commission ample power to repress the wrongs of the railroads sought to be remedied, and yet relieves these corporations from the wanton assaults of narrow sectionalism, or of greedy cupidity; it gives opportunity for the development of the mines and the manufactories of the State, for the expansion of its commerce, and affords to every locality such protection against invidious discrimination as is consistent with the general uplift and prosperity of the State, and uplift and prosperity whose reflex benefit, it is believed, will more than repay the given locality for any sacrifice it makes in favor of the common good.

The court below should have sustained the motion of appellant for a peremptory instruction.

Wherefore, the case is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.
Whole court sitting.

Judges Hobson, Nunn and Settle dissenting.

Judge Paynter separate concurring opinion.

Judge Hobson dissenting opinion in which Judge Settle concurs.

Judge Paynter delivered the following concurring opinion :

The only part of this opinion in which I concur is that the case of the Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1159, controls in this case, and that, therefore, the peremptory instruction should have been given to find for the appellant. I do not assent to some of the statements and expressions in the opinion, nor do I agree with any statements therein which are, or seem to be, in conflict with previous opinions of this court, construing section 218 of the Constitution.

I dissented from the opinion of the court in the Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1159, upon the idea that the legislature in the enactment of section 820 had gone further than it was authorized to go by section 218 of the Constitution. Section 218 of the Constitution reads as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person or corporation owning or operating a railroad in this State, or any common carrier, to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of property of like kind, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier, or person or corporation, owning or operating a railroad in this State, to receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the railroad commission such common carrier, or person or corporation, owning or operating a railroad in this State, may in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such common carrier, or person or corporation, owning or operating a railroad in this State, may be relieved from the operation of this section."

Section 820, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "If any person owning or operating a railroad in this State, or any common carrier, shall charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or property of like kind, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance, over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, such person shall, for each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, to be recovered by indictment in the Franklin Circuit Court, or the circuit court of any county into or through which the railroad or common carrier so violating runs or carries on its business. Upon complaint made to the railroad commission that any railroad or common carrier has violated the provisions of this section it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the grounds of complaint, and if, after such investigation, the commission deems it proper to exonerate the railroad or common carrier from the operation of the provisions of this section, an order in writing to that effect shall be made by the commission, and a copy thereof delivered to the complainant and the railroad or common carrier, and the same shall be published as a part of the report of the commission, and after such order the railroad or carrier shall not be prosecuted or fined on account of the complaint made. If the commission, after investigation, fails to exonerate the railroad or carrier from the operation of the provisions of this section, an order in writing to that effect shall be made by the commission and a copy thereof delivered to the complainant and the railroad or common carrier, and the same shall be published as a part of the report of the commission; and after such order it shall be the duty of the commission to furnish a statement of the facts, together with a copy of its order, to the grand jury of any county, the circuit court of which has jurisdiction, in order that the railroad company or carrier may be indicted for the offense; and the commission shall use proper efforts to see that such company or carrier is indicted and prosecuted."

In Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth the question before the court, as stated by it, was "whether, under the statute, the carrier may be indicted by the grand jury before the railroad commission has refused to exonerate it." In that case complaint had not been made to the railroad commission before the indictment was found, and the court decided that it was necessary that the railroad commission should act upon a complaint and refuse to exonerate the carrier before an indictment could be found. In discussing the matter the court said: "If the legislature had intended an indictment to be found for each offense regardless of action by the railroad commission, we see no reason why this section might not have stopped with the first sentence, defining the offense and providing for its punishment. * * * To indict the carrier, in the first place, without the action of the railroad commission would be to deprive it of all benefit of this provision. * * * The legislature, therefore, provided for the preliminary hearing before the railroad commission, not as a cumulative remedy, but that it might determine whether the carrier should be exonerated or not, and, therefore, it was provided that if the commission relieved the carrier from the operation of the section, no prosecution could be had on account of the matter complained of." Again the court said: "To allow the carrier to be indicted in advance of any action by the railroad commission under this section would be to deprive it of all opportunity for exoneration."

As I understand the facts, no complaint was ever made to the railroad commission that the appellant had been guilty of the unlawful act for which it was indicted. The railroad commission, therefore, never had an opportunity to determine whether or not an indictment should be found against it. The court refusing to recede from its position in that case, the question then arises, should a member of this court disregard that opinion in order to sustain this prosecution? I am unwilling to do so. It appears that complaints in other cases were filed with the railroad commission, to the effect that the appellant had violated section 840 of the Kentucky Statutes, in the matter of the transportation of coal to Lebanon, and as the railroad commission refused to exonerate in those cases, therefore, it must be held as having refused to exonerate the railroad company from its unlawful act here in question.

The court in the Illinois Central case held that section 820 of the statute was constitutional. This act denounces a penalty for any violation of it. It means to make a carrier liable to prosecution for any violation of it in the transportation of the property of any individual, corporation, etc. It is contemplated by the section that some one shall make complaint to the railroad commission so that it shall act upon the complaint. It is called upon under that section to determine whether the carrier shall be exonerated from the act of which complaint is made. It is provided in the section that if the commission refuses to exonerate the carrier, an order in writing to that effect shall be made, and a copy thereof made and delivered to the complainant and the carrier, and it is further the duty of the commission to make a statement of the facts and furnish that, together with its order, to the grand jury of the county, etc.

If the opinion of the court is correct in the Illinois Central case, then the carrier is entitled to a hearing before the railroad commission on any complaint that is made of its violation of the section of the statute, and the grand jury can not return an indictment until the railroad commission has passed upon the question and refused to exonerate.

Section 218 of the Constitution authorizes the railroad commission in special cases, after investigation, to allow carriers to charge less for the long than the short distance, etc., and may prescribe the extent to which such common carrier may be relieved from the operation of that section of the Constitution. A "special case" referred to in that section might embrace a case for all the coal hauled to Lebanon from some point south of there, or it might embrace a case for the transportation of all wheat that might be transported there. It was not intended to restrict it simply to permission to some carrier to make a single shipment and charge less for the long than for the short haul.

This provision of the Constitution authorizing the railroad commission to consider special cases, etc., is not for the purpose of allowing it to determine whether the carrier shall be indicted for past offenses, but is for the purpose of allowing it to determine whether or not it shall be entitled to charge less for the longer than for the shorter distance for the transportation of passengers, property, etc., and to determine to what extent the common carrier should be relieved from the operation of the section. This section does not attempt to confer upon the railroad commission the right to relieve against previous acts, but to give it the authority to make it lawful for the carrier to charge more for the short than for the long haul.

If the carrier charges more for the short than for the long haul under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, under section 218 of the Constitution it is guilty; it can only be guiltless under that section for such acts when the railroad commission has authorized it to charge less for the longer than for the short distance, or it has been relieved from the operation of the section. This section is dealing with the future, not the past, acts of the carrier.

Section 820 of the statute allows the commission to exonerate the carrier from a single act which it has done in violation of the statute, although the carrier had not previously been authorized to charge less for the long than for the short haul. This section is predicated upon the idea that the railroad commission has not given the carrier the right to charge less for the long than the short haul; that the carrier for that reason may have violated section 218 of the Constitution. Section 820, Kentucky Statutes, has reference to past acts, while section 218 of the Constitution is dealing with future ones.

My opinion is that section 820 of the statute did not conform to the requirements of the Constitution for reasons in part above indicated, hence I dissented in the Illinois Central case. The pardoning power is not vested in the railroad commission by the Constitution, but in the governor. However, as that opinion is the law, it should be respected by this court, and the court should not allow a punishment to be inflicted upon a carrier in disregard of the law as adjudicated therein. If this court refuses to follow the law as determined by it, such refusal is not calculated to beget respect for its opinion.

Being of the opinion that, under the rule of the Illinois Central case, the appellant was entitled to peremptory instruction, I concur in the opinion in this case to that extent only, as the opinion in that case is as binding upon me as if I had originally agreed to it.

Judge Hobson delivered the following dissenting opinion:

To properly understand the questions before us in this case it is necessary to review the previous decisions of this court construing the section of the statute in controversy, and the provision of the Constitution it was designed to carry into effect. In the first case, Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky., 226, it was insisted that the existence of competition at the terminus of the longer haul of itself took the case out of the operation of the statute and the constitutional provision, but it was held that the difference of circumstances and conditions contemplated by these provisions did not include extrinsic facts not connected with the carriage in any way, such as existence of competition at one point and not at another. In that case it was also contended that the special case from which the carrier might be exonerated meant a special shipment, and that, therefore, it was necessary to be averred in the indictment the amount charged and received for the longer haul, and the name of the person thus favored. The court held otherwise, on the ground that the gravamen of the offense is charging for the shorter haul a greater rate than the prevailing rate for the longer haul. The court said: "Nor was it necessary to designate any particular person or persons, probably numerous, than whom Shreve had been charged and required to pay greater compensation, for section 218 was intended to prevent discrimination rather between localities than between persons. So in order to convict of an offense like the present, it suffices to state in the indictment that the specified amount charged or received for the shorter distance was greater than that charged or received from persons generally or usually for the longer distance, and to support the allegation by the carrier's published schedule of rates or other competent evidence of the fact."

In the next case, Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 106 Ky., 633, the preceding case was adhered to. But that case had been prepared with a view to an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, and the question was again raised as to what was the special case referred to in section 218 of the Constitution, and what was the meaning of the words complaint and exoneration in section 820 of the statutes. The question before the court was whether these words referred to each shipment of freight, or to discrimination in rates between localities. In other words, could the carrier be exonerated as a special case on certain class of freight between given points, or must he be exonerated on each shipment to any individual, whether a barrel of pork, a box of dry goods or a car of coal. If the latter, it was said that the statute gave the carrier no practical protection at all because he could not be exonerated on any shipment until it was made and his exoneration on that shipment was of no effect on any other shipment, so that he could never know how to conduct his business, and, therefore, the statute was not in accord with the Constitution because it afforded no practical means of exoneration from the section. In answer to all this the court said: "It was the aim of the Constitution to require the railroads in the State to treat all localities fairly and with equality; but as differences of condition ever varying would constantly arise, it prescribed no fixed rule, but created a tribunal to act as umpire between the railroads and the people, and decide when, and to what extent, a greater charge might be made for a short than for a long haul under like circumstances and conditions, with full power in special cases, from time to time, to prescribe the extent to which such common carrier or person or corporation owning or operating a railroad in this State may be relieved from the operation of this section. It is not confined in its power to each shipment as it may be made, but may prescribe from time to time a suspension of the section on freight of a given character between given points, as the public interest and the ends of justice may require."

In the third case, Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 239, the question was made by the railroad company that the order of the railroad commission was improperly admitted in evidence against it. On the other hand, it was insisted by the Commonwealth that the order of the commission was properly admitted in evidence as it was the basis of the proceeding. Although there had been some differences in the court on the other questions, on this question the whole court concurred in the judgment, that the order of the commission was properly admitted in evidence. This question had been made by the railroad company before in the first case, which had been affirmed, but in that case the railroad company insisted that the averments of the indictment were not sufficient to show that the railroad commission had refused to exonerate it. The court held the indictment sufficient. Of course it was not claimed by the court or by counsel that the order of the railroad commission was competent to be read to the jury, unless it was a prerequisite to the prosecution and the basis of it, for it could not be competent on any other ground, and the admission of it was very prejudicial, if it was incompetent, for it served to put the defendant in a bad light before the jury, and in that case the jury had inflicted a very heavy fine.

Taking these three cases, in which all the court concurred, so far as the questions now before the court go, what do they establish?

1st. That section 218 of the Constitution, and the statute made to enforce it, were "intended to prevent discrimination rather between localities than between persons; that it was the aim of the Constitution to require the railroads of the State to treat all localities fairly and with equality."

2d. That in special cases the commission might exonerate the carrier, but it was not confined in its power to each shipment as it might be made, but might prescribe, from time to time, a suspension of the section on freight of a given character between given points, as the public interest and the ends of justice required.

3d. That the order of the railroad commission refusing to exonerate the carrier was the basis of the prosecution.

After all this had been settled, the case of Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1159, arose, and in it the court was urged, notwithstanding what it had previously decided, to hold that the order of the railroad commission was not the basis of the proceeding, and that a prosecution might be maintained before any order had been made by the railroad commission refusing to exonerate the carrier. The court refused to recede from its previous opinion, and this is all that was decided in that case.

No question was made in that case by court or counsel as to the necessity of an exoneration of the carrier or a refusal to exonerate him for the shipment of a particular car load of coal, or a shipment to a particular person. The court had previously held unanimously, so far as that question went, that the exoneration need not be on each shipment, but might be on a given character of freight between given localities. In the opinion of the court the precise question that was in the mind of the court is shown by its statement of the case in these words: "Appellant was indicted in the Hardin Circuit Court and fined $200 for charging more for hauling a car load of coal from Deanfield, Ky., to Stephensburg, Ky., than from Deanfield through Stephensburg to Louisville. The indictment was returned June 10, 1898. At that time the railroad commission had not determined whether appellant should be exonerated as provided by statute. The first question to be determined on the appeal is whether under the statute the carrier may be indicted by the grand jury before the railroad commission had refused to exonerate it."

When the court used the word "exonerate," and "exoneration," it used them in the sense in which those words had, after the fullest deliberation, been defined by the entire court as not referring to a particular shipment, but to a difference of rate between localities. This case merely adhered to the rule that had been before laid down, changing it in no particular, and with the preceding cases made out what seems to be a reasonable construction for both the carrier and the shipper, giving both some practicable protection from the statute. When it was decided the railroad commission pursuant to the rule before laid down had made general orders exonerating carrier on coal between certain points, but the Illinois Central Co. was indicted before action was taken as to it. The carrier need not be exonerated from each shipment that he makes, but may be exonerated on the rate of a given class of freight between certain points, and this exoneration remains in force until changed by the railroad commission. So that the carrier, when his rights have thus been defined, can safely carry on his business without incurring criminal liability until the commission makes some further order, and after that is made he must conform to it. On the other hand, the shipper, when the commission has refused to exonerate the carrier, may appeal for his protection to the grand jury of his county to indict the carrier for extorting money from him, which it has no right to charge. In this way obedience to the orders of the commission is secured, shippers are protected, and at the same time the carrier can not be put to the cost of criminal prosecution without action by the railroad commission determining that a state of facts does not exist justifying the exoneration of the carrier from the operation of the long and short haul clause; nor can he be deprived of a hearing on this question as he would be if he might be indicted in advance of action by the railroad commission, for the evidence on this subject can not be introduced before the jury, as only the railroad commission has power to exonerate from the section.

In the majority opinion, as well as in the separate concurring opinion, none of the three first cases decided by the court are criticised or overruled, and it must be assumed from this that the court does not mean to overrule those cases. Putting those cases by the side of the opinion which is now delivered, the court places itself in a very anomalous position. It is thus held on the one hand that the word "complaint," and the word "exonerate," in the statute, where the carrier is exonerated, do not refer to the particular shipment by a particular shipper, but to a discrimination between localities in giving a less rate for the long than for the short haul. And it is at the same time held that the same words in the same statute, where the carrier is not exonerated, do refer to the particular shipper, and not to the discrimination between localities by the giving of a lower rate for the long than for the short haul. Certainly the court can not maintain such a position, that the same words in the same statute have one meaning in favor of the carrier and a different meaning against the carrier.

But if the court's decision in this case is to be taken as overruling the previous cases and determining that the words "complaint" and "exonerate" in the statute refer to the particular shipper, either in favor of the carrier or against it, then it will follow that the exoneration of the carrier is of no service to it, except as to the particular shipment in controversy, and he can be indicted for the next shipment, and will never know in advance how intelligently to carry on his business. If such had been the legislative intent, there was no need in the statute to require action by the railroad commission before the carrier could be indicted, nor reasonably would such a heavy penalty have been imposed. The court's opinion construing the statute to mean that the carrier could not be indicted before the commission had declined to exonerate it, rests in the end upon the construction of the statute made in the previous cases, that the exoneration was not from a particular shipment, but as to the rate on the article in question between the localities.

Much has been said in the case about the hardship of it, but when the court of last resort is influenced by such considerations as this in the construction of a statute, who shall stand up for the sanctity of the law, which, after all, is the protecting axis of life, liberty and property? But there is no such hardship as supposed. If the commission exonerates the carrier, this order continues in force until revoked by the commission, and until then both the carrier and the shipper know how to order their affairs. It is the duty of the carrier to conform to the order of the commission, where it refuses to exonerate. If a change of circumstances arises, either the carrier or the shipper can bring this matter to the attention of the commission, and have the question reinvestigated. In the first case it was objected to the statute, among other things, that it gave the carrier no right to complain, and was, therefore, inconsistent with the Constitution, but the court held that the provision of the Constitution was to this extent self executing, and that either the carrier or the shipper could complain. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky., 232.) If after the commission refuses to exonerate the carrier he, in disobedience of its order, continues his discrimination, the state of case arises which the legislature contemplated in section 820, and which it, by its severe penalties, undertook to prevent. To construe the statute to mean that the carrier can not be indicted without action by the railroad commission, and that it can only be indicted then as to the particular shipment it has investigated, is to deny the people of the State all reasonable protection from the statute. It seems to me that there is no reason for departing now from the conservative middle line, which the court has heretofore laid down, to which the business of the State has been adjusted, and which gives a reasonable protection to both the shipper and the carrier.

The separate concurring opinion is devoted mainly to showing that the court was wrong in the case of the I. C. R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth. Space does not permit a re-argument of the question then decided. Suffice it to say that if the statute is unconstitutional, it is the only authority of the court for inflicting criminal punishment. The penalties therein denounced are the punishment of the acts therein provided for, and it does not follow by any means that the legislature would have provided these penalties for a greater charge for the short than for the longer haul unless it had provided for an exoneration of the carrier, for the plain purpose of the section was to provide a modus for carrying into effect the provisions of the Constitution, and to provide an adequate penalty to secure respect for the orders of the commission. It is not one of those cases, therefore, where the court could reject part of the statute as unconstitutional and enforce the remainder.

The case of Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Commonwealth was written upon the idea that this court had settled that the exoneration of the carrier was not as to each shipment, but as to the rate between localities, and that an exoneration once made thereon protected the carrier until this order of the commission was revoked. The court then merely followed its previous ruling; it did not decide that there must be a refusal to exonerate on each shipment before an indictment of the carrier could be had. The doctrine now announced is not warranted by anything in that opinion, but, on the contrary, is a departure from the principles on which that opinion is based.

The ground of that decision was simply that as the exoneration or refusal to exonerate went to the rate between the localities, the commission was to pass on the rate before the carrier could be indicted. If the commission approved the rate there could be no indictment. If it refused to exonerate the carrier, he might be indicted, not only for what he had done, but for what he might do thereafter in violation of the ruling of the commission. One reason which the legislature probably had in mind in framing the statute as it did was that emergencies might arise when immediate action by the carrier might be necessary before the commission could decide, and it was allowed, at its peril, to trust to the commission giving an exoneration if it saw fit, where the public necessities demanded it, as in the case of a coal famine or the burning of a town or the like. The commission was given general supervision over the matter as it had been before, and it was supposed that no great harm in this way could be done as complaint might be made any time to the commission. As heretofore construed by the court the carrier can not suffer unduly, and may safely carry on his business after the commission has once acted; and, on the other hand, the shippers are adequately protected by the power to indict and punish the carrier, not only for all violations of the order of the board, but for his previous acts, if he is not exonerated.

The order of the board made in 1899 in this case, by its terms following the decision of this court, exonerated the carrier from that time and for the future, and until the further order of the board. It does not purport on its face to have any retroactive effect. The commission did not assume to exercise condoning power. It has no such power. It has only the power of exoneration, and when it refuses to exonerate its order must be obeyed while in force, and if it is not obeyed the carrier can only appeal for pardon to the executive as to acts done in violation of the orders of the commission.

I, therefore, dissent from the judgment of the court.

Judge Settle concurs in this dissent.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. EBLEN, &c.

(Filed February 11, 1908.)

Common carriers—Negligence in transporting live stock—Evidence—Appellees entered into a contract with appellant for the shipment of horses from Omaha, Neb., to Henderson, Ky., by which it was stipulated that said horses were to be shipped from Omaha to Decatur, Ill., within not less than thirty-two hours, and that at that point they should remain not less than twelve hours, with ample opportunity to unload, feed, water and rest them, and it was further agreed that said horses should then be delivered at Henderson within twenty-four hours. This action was instituted to recover damages for a breach of said contract, in which it was alleged that plaintiffs' horses were kept in the cars between Omaha and Decatur for forty-six hours without food, water or rest, and after leaving Decatur were kept for more than thirty hours without food, water or rest, and that by reason of this treatment on the part of defendant their horses were famished and starved to such an extent that they lost flesh rapidly, and in their extreme hunger and thirst devoured their manes and tails; and that when they landed in Henderson they presented a gaunt and famished condition, which materially depreciated their usefulness and saleable value; that two of them died on the road, and altogether they were damaged in the sum of $600. Issue having been made and a trial had, a verdict for $600 in favor of appellees resulted, from which this appeal is prosecuted. It is insisted that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and that the court erred in the admission of evidence. Held—That the statements and representations made to the plaintiffs by the agents of the defendant at Omaha as an inducement to ship over their line was competent testimony, as it did not tend to vary the contract or alter the terms of the bill of lading. The statutes of the United States fixing the limit of twenty-eight hours for continuous travel in transportation of live stock without food, water or rest is competent only as evidence upon the question of defendant's negligence in keeping the horses in transit for forty-six hours between Omaha and Decatur and thirty hours between Decatur and Henderson. No errors in instructions are urged, and as the proof is sufficient to support the verdict the judgment is affirmed.

Lockett & Lockett, S. B. & R. D. Vance, Pirtle & Trabue and J. M. Dickinson for appellant.

Yeaman & Yeaman and A. O. Stanley for appellees.

Appeal from Henderson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnham.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Henderson Circuit Court in an action instituted by the appellees, Frank Eblen, &c. v. The Illinois Central

R. R. Co., for damages alleged to have been done to two car loads of horses while being transported over the defendant's line of road from Omaha, Nebraska, to Henderson, Ky. As their cause of action the plaintiffs allege in their petition that at the time of making the contract for the shipment of their horses the defendant, through its authorized agents, agreed to deliver the horses at Decatur, Ill., in not less than thirty-two hours after leaving Omaha; and that they would furnish at that point ample opportunity for unloading, feeding and watering the horses; and that the horses should remain at Decatur not less than twelve hours in the pens of the company for feeding, watering and resting; and that thereafter they would be transported to Henderson, Ky., in not less than twenty-four hours after leaving Decatur; and that the defendants failed to perform their agreement to deliver the horses at Decatur in thirty-two hours, and also failed to furnish sufficient means for feeding and watering them at that point, or to afford facilities for their remaining at that point twelve hours, and that they also failed to transport them to Henderson within twenty-four hours after leaving Decatur; and that by reason of this breach of contract on the part of the defendant their horses were kept in the cars between Omaha and Decatur for forty-six hours without food or water or rest, and after leaving Decatur were kept for more than thirty hours without food, water or rest; and that by reason of this treatment on the part of the defendant their horses were famished and starved to such an extent that they lost flesh rapidly, and in their extreme hunger and thirst devoured their manes and tails; and that when they landed in Henderson they presented a gaunt and famished condition which materially depreciated their usefulness and salable value; that two of them died on the road, and altogether they were damaged in at least the sum of $600.

The railway company, by way of answer, alleged that it was expressly provided in the contract of shipment that the cars containing the stock were to be in charge of the shipper or his agent while in transit; that the railroad company should not be liable for any injury the animals might do to each other, or loss not resulting from the gross negligence of the railroad company; that the shipper should at all times feed, water and take care of said stock at his own expenses and risks; that the railroad company should not be liable for damages resulting from the delay of trains unless the same was caused by their gross negligence, and put in issue all the affirmative allegations of the petition for relief tending to show a breach of the contract of shipment. The issues were made up by reply and rejoinder, and a trial before a petit jury resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $600, and the defendant appeals.

The chief grounds relied on for reversal are that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of the statements of the agent of defendant at Omaha as to what the company would do in the way of furnishing facilities for watering and feeding the stock while en route, and the time that would be required for the journey; and that the verdict is flagrantly against the weight of evidence and contrary to the instructions.

The testimony for the plaintiff is to the effect that the horses were shipped from Baker City, Oregon, to Omaha, Neb., a distance of about 1,700 miles in eight days; that during the journey they were stopped and unloaded three times, and allowed to rest and feed each time about twenty-four hours; that they arrived at Omaha in good condition; that the agent of the defendant company at Omaha represented to the plaintiff that they would deliver the cars in Decatur, Ill., in thirty-two hours, where abundant facilities for feeding and watering them would be furnished, and where they would be allowed to remain in the pens for rest and exercise, after being unloaded, twelve hours, and would then reach their destination at Henderson, Ky., in twenty-four hours after leaving Decatur; that as a matter of fact the horses left Omaha at 11.30 Tuesday night and arrived at Decatur at 9.30 p. m. Thursday, having been on the road about forty-six hours; that when they arrived at Decatur they were directed by the agents of the company to unload their stock in a lot of about thirty-five feet square, which contained no mangers or water troughs; that although they had ordered six hundred pounds of hay before they got to Decatur the company only furnished about one hundred and fifty pounds, which was scattered around the edges of the lot; that the only facilities for watering the horses were two washing tubs; that the water was carried in two buckets from an engine and poured into the tubs; that the horses soon broke down one of the tubs, also one side of the pen fences, compelling them to remain to prevent their escape; that only a part of the horses got any water at all; that the lot was so crowded that many of them got no hay; that after remaining in Decatur about four hours they were directed to load their horses; that they left Decatur at 1.30 a. m., on Friday morning, and arrived at Henderson at 7.30 on Sunday morning; that when they arrived at Henderson two of the horses were dead and that all were poor, gaunt and famished, and had eaten off each others manes and tails. The testimony for the plaintiff also fixes the depreciation in their value at from $10 to $20 per head.

Whilst the testimony of the defendants is to the effect that plaintiffs were notified at the time they shipped their horses that the schedule time between Council Bluffs and Evansville, Ind., a point in transit to Henderson, was sixty-one hours; and that they were also informed that they could feed and water at Decatur, Ill., that being about half the distance, and that this was satisfactory to the plaintiffs. The testimony of their employes at Decatur is to the effect that the horses were given six hundred pounds of hay and all the water needed; and that plaintiffs were given the privilege of remaining at that point for twenty-four hours, if they desired. But it is perfectly apparent, even from the testimony of the defendants, that the lot in which the horses were turned at Decatur was wholly insufficient, and that there were really no facilities for taking care of stock at that point.

We are of the opinion that the statements and representations made to the plaintiffs by the agents of the defendant at Omaha as an inducement to ship over their line was competent testimony, as it did not tend to vary the contract or alter the terms of the bill of lading. It is not denied that the horses were on the car in transit between Omaha and Decatur about forty-six hours without food or rest; and that they were more than thirty hours in transit from Decatur to Henderson without being fed or watered.

The Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows:

"Section 4866. No railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or master of steam, sailing or other vessels of any description, for longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water and feeding, for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes. In estimating such confinement the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest on connecting roads from which they are received shall be included, it being the intent of this section to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon contingencies hereinbefore stated.

"Section 4387. Animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad company or owners or master of the boats or vessels transporting the same, at the expense of the owner or person in custody thereof; and such company, owners or masters shall in such cases have a lien upon such animals for food, care and custody furnished, and shall not be liable for any detention of such animals.

"Section 4388. Any company, owner or custodian of such animals who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections shall for every such failure be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500. But when animals are carried in cars, boats or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space and opportunity for rest, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

"Section 4389. The penalty created by the preceding sections shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States, in the circuit or district court of the United States, holden within the district where the violation may have been committed, or the person or corporation resides or carries on its business; and it shall be the duty of the United States marshals, their deputies and subordinates to prosecute all violations which come to their notice or knowledge."

This prohibition against the confinement of stock transported for more than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading for food and water and rest, and prescribing a penalty therefor, and for the recovery of damages was intended to prevent cruelty to animals in interstate commerce as well as danger to the public from diseases in animals which are to be used for food. (Brook v. The American Express Co., 168 Mass., 259.) So rigorously has the statute been enforced in some jurisdictions that the fact that the stockyards of the railroad company at a station were on fire when the train arrived is not held a sufficient excuse for not furnishing to a person in charge of the animals being transported thereon proper facilities for unloading them for food, rest and water, and for not stopping the cars for five hours in accordance with the provisions of the act. (N. C. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Heggie, 86 Ga., 210.)

And a carrier will not be relieved from liability for a violation of the statute by the mere fact that a special contract existed under which the shipper assumed the duty of feeding such stock unless the railroad company in fact furnished the necessary facilities to enable the shipper to do so, as the negligence belongs to that class against which a common carrier is not permitted to contract. (C. & O. R. R. Co. v. The American Exchange Bank, & Co., 93 Va., 492, and Commer v. Columbia, N. & L. R. R. Co., 53 S. C., 36.)

In the Virginia case, it was held that while the penal features of the Federal statute could not be enforced in a State court, this did not prevent one who had been specially injured by its violation from recovering damages therefor. And in support of their conclusion cited Cooley on Torts (1st edition), 654; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, section 3; Dennish v. Central R. R. Co., 10; U. S., N. C. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Heggie, 86 Ga., 210; Gray v. Mobile Trade Co., 55 Ala., 387, and numerous other authorities. The common law rule on this subject is stated by Mr. Ray in his work on Imposed Duties in these words: "The carrier is liable for injuries to stock delivered it for transportation, arising from a failure to furnish proper facilities for feeding and watering them, though the shipper has agreed to accompany his stock and feed and water them at his own risk." (Hutchinson on Carriers, 222a, and Wood on Railroads (Minor), section 452b, are to the same effect.)

Whilst we entertain no doubt that a civil action for damages for injuries resulting from a violation of the Federal statute by a railroad can be maintained in a State court, plaintiffs have not sought to do so in this proceeding. On the contrary, they admit in their petition that they consented to a thirty-two hour run from Omaha to Decatur without stopping for water or food. And the statute is only considered in this proceeding as evidence upon the question of defendant's negligence in keeping the horses in transit for forty-six hours between Omaha and Decatur, and thirty hours between Decatur and Henderson, and in failing to provide suitable and convenient facilities for feeding and watering them while at Decatur. There is no conflict in the proof that the horses were in good condition when they started from Omaha, or that they were in very bad condition when they arrived at Henderson, and that this was due to appellant's negligence is clear.

The jury, under our system, are the sole judges of the weight and credibility of the testimony; our duty is performed when we see that there is sufficient evidence to support their finding. We do not feel that we would be justified in disturbing the verdict on the ground that it was not supported by the proof, and appellant has failed to point out any error in the instructions in the case. In fact they seem to state the law as favorably to appellant as the facts warrant.

Judgment affirmed.

HOLBURN v. PFANMILLER'S ADM'R.

(Filed February 11, 1903.)

Homestead—Claim for support of lunatic—Personal representatives—P. died intestate an inmate of a State insane asylum in December, 1899, having been admitted after an inquest held on May 4, 1897. At that time he had a family, his wife and one infant child. There were other children who were grown and had left home. The old folk were unable to provide for themselves and were extremely poor. P. owned a small piece of real property in Louisville, worth about $700 or $800. He was admitted into the asylum as a pauper patient, and properly so, under section 256, Kentucky Statutes. After his death, on motion of the asylum, appellee was appointed his administrator, and brought this action against the heirs of P. to subject the house and lot to the payment of his debts. The wife had died before P. The only debt asserted or claimed against the estate was for $515 by the asylum for board of P. until his death, at $200 per annum. In defense it is claimed that the property is not subject to the payment of the claim as it was the homestead of P., and can not be subjected under section 257, Kentucky Statutes. Held—That said property is not subject to said claim, as it was the homestead of P. until his death, although he had been removed from it on account of being a lunatic, and the law does not authorize the sale of a lunatic's homestead during his lifetime to pay this claim, nor does it subject it in the hands of his heirs to such payment. The claim of the asylum is not a debt. It is true it is a charge provided by law against certain estate of the lunatic, not against him, to be enforced in rem in the contingency and manner only prescribed by the statute. There was no necessity for the appointment of an administrator of P., as there was no debts to be paid, and no personal property whatever. The claim for taxes was not a debt; it was not due, and no suit against the land should have been brought before there had been a default by those legally chargeable therewith. It was improper for the parties to subject the estate to costs of attorneys and other costs when there was no necessity for same. Although the court had authority to appoint an administrator, it does not mean that an administrator is necessarily to be appointed in the case of every one who dies intestate. The opinion contains a full discussion of the necessity of appointment of administrators, their powers and responsibilities.

O'Neal & O'Neal for appellant.

N. R. & H. M. Peckinpaugh for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Lawrence Pfanmiller died intestate, an inmate of the Central Lunatic Asylum for the Insane of this State, on the 2d of December, 1899. He had been admitted under a verdict and judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court (Criminal division) May 4, 1897. At that time he had a family, his wife and one infant child. There were a number of children who were grown and had left home. Pfanmiller owned a small piece of real property in the city of Louisville, worth about $700 or $800. He had owned it for a number of years and occupied it as a homestead. A short while before he was found to be a lunatic he and his wife, because of their old age and infirmities, induced one of their married daughters to move into the house with them, and to assume its expense and care. The old folks were unable to provide for themselves, and were extremely poor. After Lawrence Pfanmiller was adjudged a lunatic and sent to the asylum his wife continued to live at the home until her death, February 18, 1898. Something over three months after the death of Lawrence Pfanmiller appellee was appointed his administrator by the Jefferson County Court upon the motion of the Central Lunatic Asylum for the Insane, and within a few days afterwards brought this suit against the heirs of Pfanmiller to subject the house and lot to the payment of the debts of the decedent. The only claim asserted or filed against his estate was one for $515 by the Central Lunatic Asylum, being the charge at the rate of $200 per annum for the board and support of Pfanmiller for the period during which he was confined there.

Formal and somewhat elaborate preparation of the action was had, in which the above claim was allowed, as a result of which the commissioner reported costs incurred in the action to the extent of $261.65, $150 of which was a fee to the administrator's attorney, and $25 to the administrator for his services. The court allowed $100 only for attorney's fee, but allowed the remainder of the costs and subjected the property to sale for the payment of the claim of the asylum and the costs above named.

The State has provided these charitable institutions at its expense for the care of those unfortunates whose mental condition requires them to be forcibly restrained. The system provides that those who are, or whose parents are, able financially to support them must pay to the asylum the same charge for their keeping as is allowed by the State for the maintenance of pauper lunatics kept there.

Section 256, Kentucky Statutes, reads as follows: "An insane person shall be held to be a pauper if unable to pay six months' board in advance, or, if married, be unable to pay said board besides providing for others naturally dependent; or, if a minor, the parent of said persons are unable to pay board besides supporting others naturally dependent on them. The court holding the inquest shall require the jury to return a finding on this subject, and this verdict shall be binding upon the superintendent."

Lawrence Pfanmiller was admitted under this section as a pauper, and properly so. The jury had found, and the judgment of the circuit court had adjudged, him to be a pauper. He was manifestly unable to pay the board besides providing for the others naturally dependent upon him, namely, his wife and minor child.

Section 257 of Kentucky Statutes is: "Where patients, who have been or may be supported in either of said asylums, have or shall acquire estate which can be subjected to debt, the board of commissioners of such asylum, when reliably informed of the fact, is authorized and directed, in every such case, to sue for, in the name of the asylum, and recover the amount of said patient's board, at the rate of $200 per year, or so much thereof as such estate will suffice to pay for the time they shall have been respectively kept and maintained therein, and not otherwise paid for, and by proper proceedings to subject their estates, respectively, to the payment thereof," etc.

In this action it is claimed by the asylum, and by counsel for appellee, that under the section last above quoted the property of the decedent is liable for this claim. It is not contended that Pfanmiller had acquired this property after his commitment to the asylum. It is admitted that the property sought to be subjected was owned by Pfanmiller at the time of his commitment. The question then is, did Pfanmiller have an estate which could be subjected to debt?

The court is of opinion, under the facts stated in this case, that Pfanmiller was a housekeeper with a family, so as to entitle him to the benefit of the homestead exemption provided by the laws of this State, and that notwithstanding the death of his wife, and of his enforced absence from his home by reason of his commitment to the asylum, he did not lose the character of homesteader, nor any of its rights. We, therefore, conclude that there was no period during the life of Lawrence Pfanmiller, and since his commitment to the asylum, when he owned any "estate that could be subjected to debt." It is true that our statute (section 1707) allows the homestead of a decedent to be sold subject to the occupancy of his widow and infant children, if a sale is necessary to pay his debts. But, strictly speaking, the claim of the asylum is not a debt. It is true it is a charge provided by law against certain estate of the lunatic, not against him, to be enforced in rein in the contingency and manner only prescribed by the statute. (Central Lunatic Asylum v. Penick, 102 Ky., 538; Schroer v. Central Lunatic Asylum, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 150; Central Lunatic Asylum v. Drane, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 176.) The court declined to enlarge by the process of construction the terms of this statute intended primarily as a regulation of the State's charitable purposes toward this class of unfortunates so as to make it include estates not clearly and specifically subjected by its terms. If the legislature should hereafter deem it wise and just to subject the homesteads of deceased pauper lunatics to the payment of the charge for their support while kept in the asylum, they will probably do so as explicitly as they have allowed all homesteads to be subjected to the payment of the debts contracted by the deceased himself, i. e., after his death, subject to the right of occupancy by the widow and his infant children.

Without noticing certain features of the improper charge embraced in this claim of the asylum, the court is of opinion that it should have been rejected in toto. This brings us to the consideration of another feature of this suit, that is, the right of the administrator to maintain this action under the circumstances, and especially of the liability of decedent's real estate to the rather extraordinary bill of costs brought about by this suit. No one could have died with less of personal estate than Lawrence Pfanmiller had, for he had none. The record shows that he had not even a rag, nor was it supposed that he had. He had been admitted to the asylum as a pauper. It knew that fact, and had so entered it upon its books. It procured the appointment of the administrator, and doubtless apprised him of the condition of the decedent's estate so far as it had information. Nor is there a suggestion in the record, save as to the item of taxes, which we will notice presently, that the decedent owed anything besides the claim to the asylum. Indeed there does not appear to have been the slightest necessity for an administrator to this estate. Under this state of facts appellant contends that the appointment of the administrator was void. In this we can not concur. Unless the statutes so require, and except in the case of nonresident decedents, the possession of an estate by the decedent is not a prerequisite to the jurisdiction for the appointment of an administrator. (Section 93, Schouler on Executors and Administrators, and cases collated at page 762; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 2d edition.)

Our statutes on this subject are as follows:

"Section 3894. When any person shall die intestate, that court shall have jurisdiction to grant administration on his estate that would have jurisdiction to probate his will, had he made one.

"Section 4849. Wills shall be proved before, and admitted to record by, the county court of the county of the testator's residence; if he had no known place of residence in this Commonwealth, and land is devised, then in the county where the land, or part thereof, lies; if no land is devised, then in the county where he died, or that wherein his estate, or part thereof, shall be, or where there may be any debt or demand owing to him."

The decedent's place of residence in this Commonwealth was Jefferson county. Therefore, under these statutes, that court had jurisdiction to appoint an administrator. Jurisdiction to appoint an administrator, however, does not mean that an administrator is necessarily to be appointed in the case of every one who dies intestate. If the court deem it proper, or probable, even, if it have doubts about the propriety of the appointment, it should be made. The rights and duties of such administrator are another question. His right is to have the possession and custody of the personal property of the decedent not exempt under the statute from distribution and sale; to collect the debts and demands due the decedent; to pay same to the creditors and distributees, and to represent his estate in litigations against it seeking to charge it with a personal liability. Under section 428 of the Civil Code "a representative, legatee, distributee or creditor of a deceased person may bring an action in equity for the settlement of his estate."

If personal estate has come to the hands of the administrator which is insufficient to satisfy all of the debts of the decedent, and if there is real estate descended, the personal representative is authorized by this section to institute an action for the settlement of the estate, for he is interested therein; his own accounts, the priority of claimants to the funds in his hands for distribution, the extent of the pro rata that may be adjudged against the personal estate in favor of creditors, are matters about which he is entitled to have the conclusive judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction for his own protection. For simplicity, and to avoid numerous suits, he is permitted to bring in the heirs at law, and have the real estate subjected in so far as the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts. But where there is no personalty, when nothing has come or can come to the hands of the administrator (in this State he having neither right nor duty to take charge of the realty of the decedent or rents accruing after his death), it is doubted if he should bring a suit for a settlement of the estate. The Code authorizes any creditor or distributee of a deceased person to bring such an action in their own behalf. In the case at bar there is no excuse for the intermeddling of an administrator. He has no accounts for settlement, no liabilities from which to be discharged, no interest to be protected. The sole apparent purpose of such a litigation can be only either to aid at the extraordinary expense of the heirs at law some claimant in the litigation against the decedent's estate, or to get for the administrator or his counsel certain fees for their services.

In the absence of some tangible personal estate, choses in action, or debts owing to the decedent, the administrator may properly refrain from bringing such an action; but if he should have doubts as to his duties in the premises, and as to the assets and liabilities of his intestate, the action will be brought subject to the relief finally granted, that is, if it should be finally adjudged that the decedent owed nothing, and there was nothing that came, or could come, to the hands of the personal representative for administration, the action should be dismissed as to the defendants with a judgment to them for their costs. If the administrator fails to make good the allegations of his petition he should not be allowed to burden the heirs at law with an onerous bill of costs, but should be turned out of court upon the same terms as other unsuccessful litigants.

An effort was made to show that the decedent owed taxes to the city of Louisville when the suit was brought. The taxes had been assessed, it is true, on the first of September, but were not due until some time after this suit was brought. The city did not present a claim, and is not claiming in this action that decedent owed it anything for taxes or otherwise. The tax was against the real property and a lien thereon, it is true, but it is not a debt, and, at any rate, there was no excuse for this premature suit to have the property subjected to its payment by a suit in chancery before there had been default by those legally chargeable therewith.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition as well as the cross petition of the Central Lunatic Asylum for the Insane.

BAXTER, &c. v. ISAACS, &c.

(Filed February 11, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Wills—Fee-simple title—B., by the terms of his will, bequeathed to his wife 210 acres of land during her life or widowhood. By a subsequent clause of the will he devised this tract of land, subject to the life estate given to his wife, to his son, J., and in a still later clause of the will he provides that if either of his children, naming them, should die without issue living at their death, the portion above devised to them respectively should go and pass to the survivors equally. After the death of the wife J. sold and conveyed the land, and this appeal involves the validity of the title conveyed by J. Held—That J. took under his father's will a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated by his death without living issue before his mother. As he survived her he became invested with the complete fee-simple title, which passed under his deed to his vendee.

Thompson & Spaulding for appellees.

Appeal from Marion Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Marion Circuit Court construing certain clauses of the will of William Baxter. By the first clause in his will he bequeathed to his wife, Elizabeth Baxter, a tract consisting of 210 acres, on which they resided at the date of the execution of the will, during her life or widowhood. By a subsequent clause of the will he devised this tract of land, subject to the life estate given to his wife, to his son, James H. Baxter, and in a still later clause of the will he provides that if either of his children, Lafayette, Edward B. W. A., James H. or Elizabeth Baxter, should die without issue living at their death, the portion above devised to them respectively should go and pass to the survivors equally. The will was probated in the Marion County Court in 1857. The wife of deceased died in 1859. In June, 1865, J. H. Baxter conveyed his interest in the tract of land devised to him by general warranty deed to his brother, Lafayette Baxter. During the same year Lafe Baxter executed a note to the Marion National Bank for $4,660, which his brother, W. A. Baxter, signed as his security, and to protect him from loss on account of his suretyship upon this note, and to secure the payment thereof, Lafe Baxter mortgaged to him this 210 acres of land, which had been conveyed to him by his brother, J. H. Baxter. W. A. Baxter died in April, 1889, leaving the note to the bank unpaid, and it was renewed by Lafe Baxter, with his brother, E. B. Baxter, as surety, and Lafe Baxter executed to him also a mortgage on the same tract of land to protect him as surety. In November, 1890, Lafe and E. B. Baxter made a general assignment of all their property to J. Q. Brown for the benefit of their creditors, including this 210 acres. On the 9th of February, 1891, Brown sold it as assignee at public outcry to Mat Isaacs for $6,230.88, and conveyed it to Isaacs by general warranty deed, in which Lafe Baxter and E. B. Baxter and his wife united. The clerk's office of Marion county, and all the records and documents filed therein were burned in 1863. In January, 1901, the appellants, children of W. A. Baxter and grandchildren of William Baxter, procured what purported to be a certified copy of the will of William Baxter, from their uncle, Lafe Baxter, and again put it on record, just forty-four years after the death of their grandfather. They then instituted this suit, in which they claim that under the will of their grandfather their father, W. A. Baxter, inherited one-fourth of the 210 acres of land devised to their uncle, J. H. Baxter, who they allege died childless and unmarried in 1872; and that their father, W. A. Baxter, did not dispose of this interest during his lifetime; and that as his heirs at law they are entitled to be put in possession of it.

Four distinct issues are raised by the pleadings in the case: First, it is denied that the alleged copy of the will of William Baxter put on record in 1901 was ever duly probated; second, that J. H. Baxter, under the will, took a defeasible fee which ripened into a fee simple at the death of his mother in 1859, which passed to his brother, Lafe, under the deed made to him by J. H. Baxter in 1865; third, they rely upon an estoppel; fourth, they interpose a plea of limitation. But our view of the law only makes it necessary for us to determine what interest J. H. Baxter took under the will of his father in the 210 acres of land, one-fourth of which appellants seek to recover.

As this court has so frequently considered clauses in wills similar, if not identical, with those in the will at bar, we deem it unnecessary to enter into an elaborate discussion of the question. In the early case of Birney v. Richardson, &c., 35 Ky., 424, the language of the will construed is in these words: "I lend unto my beloved wife, Mary Richardson, all my estate, both real and personal, during her widowhood, and if she marries, at her marriage my whole estate, as above mentioned, to be taken out of her hands by my executors hereinafter mentioned and equally divided among my children (naming children). * * * If any or either of the above-mentioned children die without lawful heirs begotten of their body, then his or her part of the estate to be equally divided among my surviving children."

Chief Justice Robertson, in construing this clause of the will, said: "The testator directed and seemed to contemplate but one division, and that was on the marriage of his widow. In directing his executors in that event to take his whole estate and divide it equally among his five children, he added, in effect, that if any of them should in the meantime die without issue, the division should be made among the others, that is, the division directed to be made upon the marriage of his widow for, after such division, he directed no other distribution. The dying without issue seems to have been intended not as a qualification of the right of each legatee after actual distribution among them, but as an explanation merely as to the mode of division, and a restriction upon the preceding and legatory sentence as to the persons who should be entitled to participate in the division directed to be made on the widow's marriage; in other words, the dying without issue was to affect that division, but not the right of the legatees after distribution, according to the will."

In the very recent case of Forsythe v. Lansing, Ex'or, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 1064, the devise was to the husband for life, and at his death to the three sons of testatrix. In the seventh clause of her will she provided that: "If either of my sons die childless, then in that event, his interest in my estate, and the above devises, is to go to the other living brothers, and in the event two of my sons should die childless, then their interest is to go to the others."

It was held that under this will the three sons of testatrix were devised a defeasible fee, which ripened into a fee simple at the death of the father. In more recent case of Lewis v. Shropshire's Trustee, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 332, the clause of the will construed was as follows: "I bequeath to my beloved wife, Katherine Darnaby, the whole of my estate, both real and personal, during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided among my children. * * * If any of my children should die leaving no heir or heirs of their body begotten, then I desire that their portion of my estate be equally divided between my surviving children; but should any of my children die leaving heirs, then my grandchildren to have their parent's portion of such child dying without issue."

In that case it was held that the children took a fee simple subject to be defeated only in the event of their death prior to that of the mother. This rule of construction is in harmony with section 2343 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "Unless a different purpose appear from express words or necessary inference, every estate in lands created by deed or will, without words of inheritance, shall be deemed a fee simple, or such estate as the grantor has power to dispose of." And is supported by numerous other decisions. (Pol v. Benning, 48 Ky., 623; Trakton v. Woodson, 84 Ky., 206; Duncan v. Kennedy, 72 Ky., 582; Furgerson v. Thompson, 87 Ky., 519; Wills v. Wills, 85 Ky., 486; Dickerson v. Odgen's Ex'or, 89 Ky., 162; Prewitt v. Holland, 92 Ky., 641; Banks v. Ballard's Ass'ee, 83 Ky., 481; Aultman Co. v. Gibson's Guardian, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2296.)

We are, therefore, of the opinion that J. H. Baxter took under his father's will a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated by his death without living issue before his mother. As he survived her, he became invested with the complete fee-simple title, which passed under his deed to Lafe Baxter in 1866.

Judgment affirmed.

ROSS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Filed November 22, 1900—Not to be reported.)

Criminal law—Continuance—Evidence—Instructions—Conspiracy—Appellant prosecutes this appeal from a conviction for murder, and insists that the court erred to his prejudice in refusing to grant him a continuance on account of absence of a witness for him, but permitted said deposition to be read as evidence instead of requiring the attorney for the Commonwealth to admit the truth of the statements. Held—That under amendment to section 189, Criminal Code of Practice, the court at a term subsequent to that at which the indictment was found may permit the affidavit as to the statements of an absent witness to be read as the deposition of said witness, and while the court may, in order to promote the ends of justice, require that the statements shall be admitted as the truth, the court did not, in this case, abuse its discretion in refusing to require said statements to be read as true. This court is not disposed to reverse the lower court on this point unless its abuse was flagrant. The Commonwealth was properly permitted to introduce a witness to prove that a witness introduced by the defendant had, previous to the trial, admitted that she was not present at the difficulty about which she had testified. It was not error for the court to admit this contradictory testimony without admonishing the jury that it was competent merely for the purpose of contradiction. It was not prejudicial for the court to use the language "that there were no other safe means of escape." As the evidence tended to show that appellant inflicted the fatal wound, it was not error to refuse to give an instruction defining conspiracy.

John K. Hendrick, J. W. Bush, C. W. Watts and J. C. Hodge for appellant.

Robt. J. Breckinridge for appellee.

Appeal from Livingston Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

This is the second appeal in this case. (Ross v. Commonwealth, 21 Ky. Law Rep., 1344.) The appellant filed an affidavit, and moved the court for a continuance of the case because of the absence of Haggard Nickell, whose testimony, as stated in the affidavit, would have had the effect of contradicting one Howell, who was a witness for the Commonwealth. The indictment had been returned several terms before the one during which the motion for a continuance was made, and the court ruled that the affidavit could be read as the deposition of the absent witness. Section 1 of the act (Act May 15, 1886) amendatory of section 189 of the Criminal Code of Practice reads as follows: "That whenever, in any criminal or penal action pending in any of the courts of this Commonwealth, an application shall be made by the defendant for a continuance, based upon affidavits stating the absence of one or more material witnesses, and the facts which such absent witness or witnesses would, if present, prove, the attorney for the Commonwealth shall not be compelled, in order to prevent a continuance, to admit the truth of the matter which it is alleged in the affidavit such absent witness or witnesses would prove, but only that such absent witness or witnesses would, if present, testify as alleged in the affidavit. In which event the defendant may, on the trial, read such affidavit as the deposition of such absent witness or witnesses, subject, however, to exception for irrelevancy or incompetency; and the attorney for the Commonwealth shall be permitted to controvert the statement of such affidavit so read by other evidence, and to impeach such absent witness or witnesses to the same extent as if he were personally present: Provided, however, the court may, when, from the nature of the case, it shall be of the opinion that the ends of justice require it, grant a continuance, unless the attorney for the Commonwealth will admit the truth of the matter which it is alleged in the affidavit such absent witness or witnesses would testify to." The attorneys for the appellant certified that it was important to have the absent witness present in court to testify, so the accused might get the full benefit of his testimony. Section 1 provides that the court may, when it shall be of the opinion that the ends of justice require it, grant a continuance, unless the attorney for the Commonwealth will admit the truth of the matter which it is alleged in the affidavit such absent witness or witnesses would testify to. This section places it within the discretion of the trial court to determine whether or not the ends of justice require the granting of a continuance unless the attorney for the Commonwealth will admit the truth of the matter alleged in the affidavit. This court would not reverse the court below in the exercise of the discretion authorized by the section unless its abuse was flagrant. It was intended that the trial judge should have a very large discretion in the matter, because the peace of the Commonwealth requires a speedy trial of those who are charged as being guilty of offenses against the criminal and penal laws of the State. In this case the court properly exercised the discretion conferred upon it. Other witnesses testified to substantially the same thing to which it was stated in the affidavit that Nickell would testify.

Nola Miller was introduced as a witness for the defendant, who testified that she saw some part of the difficulty in which the deceased lost his life. The Commonwealth introduced witnesses to prove that she told them that she had not seen any of the difficulty. It is insisted that the court erred in permitting this to be done, without instructing the jury that this evidence could only be considered by it for the purpose of affecting her credibility. If she had testified to facts beneficial to the defense, and the Commonwealth had introduced testimony to prove that she had made other statements with reference to the occurrence, which, if testified to by her, would have tended to establish the guilt of the accused, then it would have been the duty of the court to have told the jury that the statements which the Commonwealth proved she had made, tending to establish the guilt of the accused, could not be taken as evidence against him, except for the purpose of contradicting her. In other words, it would not have been substantive testimony. The rule sought to be applied here has no application, because the statements which the Commonwealth proved that she made did not tend to establish the guilt of the accused, but were offered simply to impeach her testimony by showing that she had admitted a lack of knowledge as to the circumstances attending the difficulty.

Without going into a discussion of the question as to whether instruction No. 5 was erroneous, it is sufficient to say that it embodies the exact language suggested by this court on the former appeal as being appropriate to be used in the instruction. It is the law of this case, whether it was erroneous or not. Even if it had been error to use the language, to wit, "that there were no other apparently safe means of escape, it was not prejudicial to the rights of the accused."

From the testimony in the case the Ross boys brought on the difficulty, and did not retire from it until after the fatal wound was inflicted. The indictment charges that the appellant and his brother Tom conspired to murder Walter Hooks by stabbing him with a knife, etc. It is insisted that the court should have given an instruction defining conspiracy. It was unnecessary to do so, because it was admitted on the trial that the appellant inflicted the wound which resulted in Hook's death, and the jury found that he did not do it in his own or his brother's defense. Whether he did or did not conspire with another to slay the deceased, if he did it, not in an affray or sudden heat of passion, or in his necessary self-defense, or that of his brother, he was guilty of murder. We do not think the court erred in failing to give an instruction defining conspiracy.

The appellant is under twenty-one years of age, and established a good character; and while the penalty fixed by the jury is heavier than that fixed by some juries in similar cases, we can not say that the defendant has not had a fair trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. R. CO. v. MASON.

(Filed February 11, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—Pleading—Appellee brought this action for damages for injuries sustained by him by reason of having been jerked or thrown from the train as he was about to alight therefrom at his destination as a passenger. A judgment was rendered in his favor, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The complaint is urged as to the instruction defining the measure of damages. The first point made is that it submitted to the jury the right to assess damages for loss of time suffered by appellee. Held—That the claim for loss of time is not specially pleaded, therefore, neither proof can be heard nor a recovery allowed therefor. The instruction fixing the measure of damages is erroneous in that it uses the following words: "And all such further injury, if any, temporary or permanent, which they may believe from all the evidence has accrued, or is reasonably certain to accrue, as the direct result of said injury. Said words should have been omitted, as it leaves the jury no guide except their conjecture in fixing the other damages. The permanent damages to which appellee is entitled is a permanent reduction of appellee's power to earn money resulting from the injury. As appellant was a man of middle age and for some years had been in feeble health and not able to do more than half a man's work, the jury should have been told that in estimating the amount of damages they should take into consideration the age and situation of the plaintiff and his earning capacity sustained to the injured limb. Appellant complains because the court refused to give an instruction, to the effect that appellee was not entitled to recover any sum for damage resulting from improper treatment of the injury. Held—That said instruction was properly refused as the pleading was insufficient to authorize a finding on this issue. Upon a return of the case the plaintiff should be allowed to amend his petition concerning the loss of time, and defendant should be allowed to amend its answer concerning the special matter of contributory negligence, the neglect of treatment of the injury after it was inflicted.

E. M. Dickson, E. W. Hines and B. D. Warfield for appellant.

Kennedy & Williamson for appellee.

Appeal from Nicholas Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellee, a passenger on one of appellant's trains, sues for an injury done to him by reason of having been jerked or thrown from the train as he was about to alight therefrom at his destination. He alleges that he sustained a serious injury to his hip, inflicting great and constant pain, and permanently impairing that member, so as to destroy, or at least materially affect, his ability to work.

Appellee claims that after the station had been announced the train had stopped, and that he was in the act of going down the steps when it suddenly started again with a violent jerk, and without warning, whereby he was thrown to the ground and caught between the steps of the moving train and the platform and dragged some distance, inflicting the injury complained of. A number of witnesses testify to having seen the accident, substantially corroborating appellee's version of it. An equal or possibly greater number, with apparently equal opportunities for seeing the occurrence, testify that the train had not stopped when appellee stepped from it, still holding to the iron railing at the steps, and that he was thereby thrown to the ground and injured. This question, however, was properly submitted to the jury for its determination, and they have found in favor of appellee. We can not say that there is not sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding, or that it is palpably against the weight of the evidence.

The following instruction was given to the jury:

"1st. It is admitted by the pleadings that on the 11th day of August, 1900, the defendant received plaintiff as a passenger on one of its trains, and agreed to carry him from Carlisle, Ky., to Pleasant Valley, Ky., both of said places being regular stations on the line of defendant's road, and if the jury believe from all the evidence that the defendant, by its agents and employes, cried out, 'all off for Pleasant Valley,' as said train was slowing up for said station, and that plaintiff then immediately left the car in which he was riding, as soon as the train stopped, and immediately proceeded to go down the steps leading from said car to the place where passengers usually alight at said point, but that before plaintiff had reasonable time to get off said steps the defendant, by its agents and employes, carelessly and negligently caused said train to start forward with a jerk, and that said forward movement of the train threw plaintiff forward and off of said steps to the ground, whereby he was injured, they ought to find for the plaintiff in damages in such a sum as will reasonably compensate him for his physical and mental suffering, if any, and loss of time, if any, and all such further injury, if any, temporary or permanent, which they may believe from all the evidence has accrued, or is reasonably certain to accrue, as the direct result of said injury; and if the jury further believe from all the evidence that said injury was the result of gross carelessness and negligence on the part of the defendant, they may in addition to such compensatory damages as above indicated, award, in their discretion, punitive damages, not exceeding in all $5,000, the amount claimed in plaintiff's petition."

The complaint is against that part of the instruction defining the measure of damages. The first point made against the instruction is that it submitted to the jury the right to assess damages for loss of time suffered by appellee. The petition contains this allegation only on this subject: "That in addition to his (plaintiff's) suffering he has been unable since he received said injury to do ordinary farm work, and that he has been permanently injured and disabled by reason of the injuries and wrong aforesaid, and has been damaged in the sum of $3,000."

This allegation would seem more especially to refer to the extent and nature of plaintiff's injury than to the fact that by reason of it he had lost time. But it also conveys the idea that by reason of the injury plaintiff had been unable to do farm work, and because of that fact he had lost time of a peculiar and special value. It is not stated in the pleadings that he was a farmer, or had ever been so employed, nor is the damage resulting from his being impaired in his power to follow this special vocation set out.

It is the well-settled rule, and a just one, that a claim for special damages, such as for loss of time, where it is of special value, medical bills, etc., must be specially pleaded before either proof can be heard or a recovery allowed therefor. (Jesse v. Shuck, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 463; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 24 Ky. Law Rep., 1402.)

Appellant had a right to have the matters relied upon so pleaded that it could determine whether it would admit or deny the averments relating thereto. If the petition had been taken pro confesso by reason of the failure of appellant to plead, appellee could, as special damages, have recovered at most but a nominal sum. The instruction, however, is, in our opinion, susceptible of graver criticism than the one just made, in that it authorizes the jury to compensate appellee "for all such further injury, temporary or permanent, which they may believe from all the evidence has accrued, or is reasonably certain to accrue, as the direct result of said injury." What other injury? What standard or measure is here given to the jury? No limitation is placed upon their imagination or conjecture. At best it has been found extremely difficult, if not impossible, to accurately measure damages in such cases under the most carefully guarded legal limitations. The jury should be limited in assessing damages for personal injuries, not resulting in death, independent of punitive damages, to compensation which in its legal signification consists in remuneration for loss of time, necessary expenditures, for mental and physical suffering resulting from the injury, and for permanent disability, if such be the result, and where proper averments relative thereto are made, and the court should so inform the jury, instead of leaving to them to determine the legal import of the true damages sustained by the plaintiff. (Parker v. Jenkins, 3 Bush, 591.) The permanent disability referred to is a permanent reduction of appellee's power to earn money resulting from an injury caused by the negligent act of appellant in question. (Muldraugh's Hill, C. & C. T. P. Co. v. Maupin, 79 Ky., 105; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Case, 9 Bush, 736.)

It was shown in this case that appellee was a man past middle age, and there was some evidence that for some years he had been of infirm health, and that he had frequently complained that he was unable to do more than a half day's or half a man's work. It was not proper, therefore, for the jury to have considered the injury sued for, assuming him to have been a robust person, sound in health, but they should have been told that in estimating the amount of damages they should take into consideration the age and situation of the plaintiff, and his earning capacity, in fixing the damage sustained by the want of the limb injured. (Greer v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 94 Ky., 177.)

The phrase, "and all such further injury, if any, temporary or permanent, which they may believe from all the evidence has accrued, or is reasonably certain to accrue, as the direct result of such injury," should have been omitted.

Appellant asked, and the court refused to give, the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any sum for damage resulting to him from any unskillful or improper treatment of any injury he may have received in the accident complained of as occurring at Pleasant Valley."

This instruction is predicated upon this line of evidence introduced by appellant at the trial; the condition of the injured limb at the time of the trial showed that it was lengthened about two inches more than normal. This was because the thigh bones had left the acetabulum. It was the theory presented by appellee that this condition of the hip joint was caused by the severe wrench and contusion received when he was thrown from appellant's train, by which the ligaments about that joint were ruptured and torn, allowing the femur to slip down. There was evidence, however, for appellant that appellee did not call a competent and skillful physician when injured; that he neglected the advice and directions his physician gave him and refused to obey them; that by his own negligence in persisting in walking about upon the injured limb, and in failing to have it treated by a competent and skillful surgeon at the time, he has so aggravated his injury as to produce the permanent ill effect of which he complains, and that but for this species of his negligence the injury could have been and would have healed entirely, and within a few weeks, or, at most, a few months.

A very satisfactory treatment of this subject may be found in Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, section 202. It is there said, and sustained by the authorities cited: "Undoubtedly the person injured is bound to use ordinary care in treating the injury, and can not recover from the author of the injury enhanced damages growing out of his own want of ordinary care in procuring medical or surgical aid to treat it. In other words, if he neglects to use such means to effect a recovery as an ordinarily prudent person would use, under like circumstances, he can not recover damages for any aggravation of his injury, growing out of such neglect. * * * But his neglect in this regard bears only upon the extent, and not upon his right of recovery for the injuries. * * * It is his duty to use ordinary care, under the circumstances, in employing surgeons, nurses, etc.; but, having done so, the law does not make him an insurer that they will commit no mistakes in treating him. * * * If he employs a reputable physician and surgeon, and follows his directions as to the treatment of the injury, until such physician or surgeon discharges himself from the case, the patient can not be charged with negligence in causing an aggravation of the injury, because the result of it was more severe than was anticipated. * * * Negligent injuries have been some times aggravated by delay in calling in the services of a physician or surgeon. In such a case it seems that it would generally be a question for the jury whether such delay was the result of negligence or of want of ordinary care under all the circumstances of the case." (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Kingman, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 32; Central Passenger Co. v. Rose, 15 Ky. Law Rep., 211; Seord v. St. P., M. & M. R. R. Co., 18 Fed. Rep., 221.)

The court is of opinion that the instruction asked for and quoted above is not broad enough to prevent all the features of this question as they should have been, and furthermore we are of opinion that under the issues in this case an instruction upon the law on this subject was not authorized. In this jurisdiction contributory negligence must be pleaded. In this case it is pleaded in this language: "The defendant for further answer says that the plaintiff, by his own carelessness and negligence, caused the injury or injuries of which he complains in his petition, and but for such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff said injury or injuries complained of by him in his petition herein would not have occurred to, or have been sustained by, him."

This, however, has reference to the act by which the injury was inflicted. If the defendant contemplated putting in issue the plaintiff's contributory negligence subsequent to the occurrence for which he sued, which neglect went to aggravate his damages, the facts constituting it should have been alleged so as to have allowed an issue to be joined thereon, and the production of the proof to meet it. Under the state of pleadings the court is of opinion that the instruction was properly refused. Upon the return of the case, however, the plaintiff should be allowed to amend his petition, if he elects to do so, concerning the loss of time asserted in his proof, and the defendant should be allowed to amend its answer, if it elects to do so, concerning the special matter of contributory negligence discussed.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

REPUBLIC IRON AND STEEL WORKS v. GREGG.

(Filed February 12, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Master and servant—Negligence—Evidence—Appellee was an employe in appellee's employ in its mill, and had been so employed about twenty-five years, and for five years had operated what is known as the alligator shears. At the time the injuries sued for were sustained appellee was engaged in cutting gas pipe with the shears. On the afternoon previous appellee had complained to the millwright that his shears were dull and loose, and he promised to repair same. On the morning following he renewed his complaint to the millwright, who again promised to repair same, but before he did so a piece of pipe was thrown up, catching his hand between the iron and the shears, inflicting severe injuries to his hand. A suit for damages resulted in a verdict and judgment for $850 for appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted. On the trial appellant offered to prove that the same shears were operated for several weeks afterwards without resulting in any injury. On the other hand, appellee offered to prove that subsequent to this injury the shears were screwed up, which prevented any injury afterwards occurring. The court properly rejected the testimony offered by each party, as it was incompetent. The court properly instructed the jury as to the duty of appellant to provide machinery that was reasonably safe for his servants, and directed the jury that appellee was not deprived of his right to recover damages by continuing the operation of said machinery for a reasonable time after the millwright had promised to repair same. The verdict is not against the weight of the evidence, and is not excessive.

Myers & Howard and Ed. W. Strong for appellant.

B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Hobson.

Appellee, George W. Gregg, who is sixty-seven years old, was a laborer in appellant's employ in its mill. He had been employed in the mill twenty-five years, and for five years had operated what is known as the alligator shears, which are in principle like a pair of scissors, the knives being about two feet long; the lower arm is stationary; the upper one is worked by means of a crank set in motion by machinery. Until about five days before the accident he had been employed in cutting sheet iron, but for the last five days had cut gas pipe, one inch in diameter. His duty was to cut the pipe into pieces about eight inches long preparatory to its going into the furnace. On the evening before he was injured, according to his testimony, he complained to the millwright that his shears were out of order, the knives being dull and loose. The millwright promised to fix them, but failed to do so. The next morning he made the same complaint and the millwright again promised to fix them, but before he had done so, about 10 o'clock that morning, when he was holding a piece of pipe about eighteen or twenty inches long, in the effort to cut it with the shears, the pipe was thrown upward against the upper jaw of the shears, catching his left hand between the two, and inflicting an injury which substantially destroyed the use of that hand. The jury to whom the case was submitted found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $850, which is not excessive under the evidence.

The chief complaint relates to the exclusion of evidence by the court. The defendant insisted that the shears were not out of order, and the proof offered by it as to the condition of the shears at the time of the injury was all admitted by the court. In addition to this it offered to show that after the injury, for a period of from four to six weeks, the same shears were operated by three other employees in the same condition as when appellee was hurt, and that no accident or injury resulted therefrom. This evidence was excluded by the court. The plaintiff in rebuttal offered to show that after he was hurt, and before any one else worked with the shears, the assistant of the millwright tightened up the bolts and put them in order. This evidence was also excluded. After reading the entire bill of exceptions we do not see that there was any substantial error in these rulings of the court. On the contrary, we are rather inclined to think that the testimony of the witnesses was substantially gotten before the jury, unless it was competent to show that no accident or injury resulted from the operation of the shears after appellee was hurt. Proof of this sort would only furnish grounds for an argument, and the weight of it would depend on the probability of the conditions being the same. There might be several reasons why no accident occurred after appellee was injured, and yet his cause of action for his injury may have been well-founded in fact. A party can not make evidence for himself. The mere absence of any injury for six weeks after appellee was hurt might have been due to special steps taken in anticipation of a suit, or to precautions suggested by his injury. The court allowed great latitude to the defendant in getting before the jury all its witnesses knew as to the actual condition of the shears at the time of the injury, and, on the whole, we think that the defendant's case was fairly gotten before the jury.

The millwright denied that he had promised to repair the shears, or that they were out of order, but the verdict of the jury is not palpably against the evidence on either of these questions. So short a time had elapsed after the making of the promise to repair, if it was made, that it can not be said that an unreasonable time had elapsed for the execution of the promise, and we do not see that there was any error in the instructions of the court on this subject. It is also complained that the instructions of the court do not submit to the jury whether the shears were in a reasonably safe and proper condition for use by appellee if he was exercising ordinary care; but the phraseology of instruction 1, given by the court, is substantially taken from instruction "A." asked by the defendant. Besides, by the instruction of the court the jury, in order to find for the plaintiff, were required to believe "that the plaintiff at the time of the injury, and in doing his work at said shears, was exercising such care as is ordinarily exercised by ordinarily careful and prudent persons under the same or similar circumstances in the same or similar business;" and also that "the shears mentioned in the proof, and at which plaintiff was injured, were in a defective condition, or in a condition unfit for work, and that the injury to plaintiff was caused solely by the said defective or unfit condition of said shears." The proof for the defendant was directed to showing that there was nothing wrong with the shears, and that the millwright had not promised to repair them. If the shears were in the condition as shown by plaintiff, the operation of them would necessarily be dangerous, for when the knives were loose and would not cut, they would naturally draw the thing between them which was intended to be cut, just as a loose pair of scissors will do when dull. The instructions of the court fairly submitted to the jury the real issue in the case. The question of contributory negligence, under the proof, was for the jury, and this, too, by appropriate instructions was clearly submitted to them. On the whole case, we see no substantial error in the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMAS, &amp;c. v. CONRAD.

(Filed February 12, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Landlord and tenant—Liability of landlord to repair—Correcting mistake in contract—Appellee purchased a building at a cost of $40,000, and leased it to appellants for a period of ten years. Appellee agreed to add improvements to the building to cost $15,200, and appellants agreed to pay as rental therefor annually a sum equal to 7 per cent. per annum on the total cost of the building and improvements, besides taxes and street improvements. Pursuant to the contract the appellants took possession of the property and for a period of five years discharged all the obligations of the lease. At the end of that period the roof, which had been placed upon the building as a part of the improvements, became so worthless by reason of natural wear and tear and natural decay that the building was worthless for a tobacco warehouse, for which it was used. Appellants requested appellee to put a new roof on, and he refused to do so. Appellants put on a new roof and withheld enough of the rent to pay for same, and this appeal involves their right under the lease to compel the landlord to pay for the new roof. One of the provisions in the lease is that the tenant will keep the property in as good condition as same is in when the improvements are completed, natural wear and tear excepted. Another provision is that at the termination of the lease the property is to be returned to the landlord in as good order as when received, natural wear and tear excepted. Held—That as there is no obligation in the lease requiring the landlord to make repairs, appellants can not require him to make same or pay for any that they may make. But as appellants aver that the provision requiring the landlord to make repairs was omitted from the lease by mistake, they are entitled to have the mistake corrected if such mistake was made, so as to conform to the agreement of parties.

Humphrey, Burnett & Humphrey for appellants.

Wm. Krieger and B. K. Marshall for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Law and Equity division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Paynter.

The appellants, W. J. Thomas, &c., leased from the appellee, Conrad, a certain building, situated at the corner of Tenth and Main streets, in the city of Louisville, for a period of ten years. The following facts appear: Conrad purchased the property for $40,000, and agreed with the lessees to remodel the building in a way particularly specified at a cost of $15,200, the work to be done under the supervision of the lessees. The lessees were to keep the property insured during the progress of the improvements and thereafter during the term of the lease. As a rental for the property the lessees agreed to pay the lessor annually a sum equal to 7 per cent. per annum on the cost of the property and improvements, which rental was to be paid quarterly, and, in addition thereto, they were to pay all city, State and county taxes, all street improvements and apportionment warrants assessed against the property by the city.

Pursuant to the contract the lessees took possession of the property, and for a period of five years they, or their assignee, discharged all of the obligations imposed by the lease. At the end of that period the roof, which had been placed upon the building as a part of the improvements, became so worthless by natural wear and tear and natural decay that it no longer served the purposes of a roof, and could not be repaired. The only thing that could be done to enable the parties to occupy the warehouse (the building was to be used as a tobacco warehouse) for the storage of tobacco and the general purposes for which it was used was to place a new roof upon it. The lessees requested the lessor to put it on, but he refused to do so; thereupon the lessees did so, and withheld sufficient rent to reimburse them the expense. This action was instituted to recover the rent and the appellants sought to plead the cost of the roof as an offset against it. The foregoing facts were averred in the answer, to which the court sustained a demurrer.

The question here for consideration is as to the right of the lessees to place the new roof upon the building at the cost of the lessor. It is insisted that as the lessor did not agree to repair the building during the period of the lease, or to restore such parts as might be destroyed by natural wear and tear and decay, he was under no obligation to do so, and the lessees could not do so and compel him to pay the expense.

There are two provisions of the lease bearing upon this question, which read as follows: "And the second parties further agree and bind themselves, their heirs, executors and assigns, to make all repairs on the said property during the pendency of the said lease and to keep the said property in good and substantial repair during the continuance of said lease as the same is in when the improvements are completed by the said first party, natural wear and tear excepted."

Fourth paragraph: "At the termination of this lease, as herein provided, the second parties will surrender peaceable possession of said premises in as good order as when received by them in its completed condition, the improvement herein stipulated for having been made by the first party as aforesaid, natural wear and tear and natural decay and injury or destruction by fire or other cause, not the fault of the second parties, excepted."

At common law the covenant of the tenant to pay rent obligated him to do so, even though the premises were destroyed by inevitable casualty. (Redding v. Hall, 1 Bibb, 539; Bohannon v. Lewis, 3 T. B. Mon., 380; Helburn v. Mefford, 7 Bush, 174.)

If a tenant without any qualification agrees to repair and return the premises at the expiration of the term in substantially as good condition as when received, his violation of his covenant to do so will make him liable. (Brashear v. Chandler, 6 T. B. Mon., 150; Proctor v. Keith, 12 Mon., 254.)

In Brashear v. Chandler the tenant agreed that he would deliver the farm to the landlord in "good tenantable repair in every respect." The court held that he was compelled to do so, although the premises were not in good repair when received.

In Proctor v. Keith the tenant agreed "not to suffer any of the fencing to rot down and was to keep it in good repair, natural wear excepted." The fencing was washed away by a freshet, and the court held that the tenant's covenant imposed upon him the duty of rebuilding the fence.

At that time section 2297, Kentucky Statutes, was not in force. It reads as follows: "Unless the contrary be expressly provided for in the writing, no agreement of a lessee that he will repair, or leave the premises in repair, shall have the effect of binding him to erect similar buildings, if without his fault or neglect the same may be destroyed by fire or other casualty; nor shall a tenant, unless he otherwise contracts, be liable for the rent for the remainder of his term of any building leased by him, and destroyed during the term by fire or other casualty without his fault or neglect."

Had the above statute been in force the court would not have compelled the tenant to restore the fence. (Sun Insurance Office v. Varble, 102 Ky., 758.)

In stating the foregoing conclusion we have practically agreed with counsel for appellee and for appellant. The lessees covenanted to keep the property in good and substantial repair during the continuance of the lease as same was when the improvements were completed, "natural wear and tear excepted." They agreed to surrender the premises in as good order as when received by them, "natural wear and tear and natural decay and injury or destruction by fire or other cause," not their fault, excepted. These stipulations certainly impose no obligation upon the lessees to make repairs upon the building rendered necessary by natural wear and tear and natural decay or injury or destruction by fire or other cause. Against such liability there is an express stipulation. The parties contemplated that it should be occupied for ten years as a tobacco warehouse, and that the rent should be paid during that period unless the appellees were exonerated by their contract or by the section of statutes quoted, or because of the failure of the lessor to keep an obligation imposed upon him by the terms of the contract.

If the building had been damaged or destroyed by fire or other cause, not the fault of the lessees, and the landlord refused to restore it, certainly the tenants could not be compelled to retain the building or premises and pay the rent. They were both exempted from this liability by reason of the statute and their covenants against it. It will be observed that there is no promise contained in the lease that, in the event the property is destroyed by fire or other cause, or that, if it should become untenable by reason of the natural wear, tear and decay, the landlord will repair or rebuild as the case might be. The lessees entered into the contract without providing against such a contingency. At common law, unless there was an express obligation to that effect, the landlord was not required to make repairs upon property during the term of the lease. He was entitled to collect his rent, even if the property was destroyed by fire or other casualty, although no obligation rested upon him to restore the property. The statute which we have quoted does not impose an obligation upon the landlord to repair or rebuild, but its purpose was to modify the rigor of the common law and to relieve the tenant from the liability to rebuild under covenant that he would keep the premises in repair, and to relieve him from the payment of rent during the remainder of the term if the leased building was destroyed by fire or other casualty without his fault or neglect. So the common law prevails, except as modified by the statute.

The authorities do not support the claim of counsel for appellants, that there is an implied obligation arising from the contract upon the landlord to pay the expense of the roof; they are against such claim. In Proctor v. Keith it appeared that there was no covenant in the lease which required the landlord to make the repairs. The tenant was injured by the lessor's failure to restore a fence which had been washed away by a freshet. He claimed that the landlord had verbally promised to do so. The lease, however, did not contain such a stipulation. The court was called upon to consider the question of the alleged promise, and said: "The agreement did not contain any stipulation upon the part of the lessor to make repairs of any kind; nor does it contain any provision exempting the tenant from the payment of rent, in consequence of the deterioration of the premises on account of unavoidable accident. No obligation was imposed upon the lessor either by law or by the terms of the original agreement of the parties, and there was no consideration for his promise, unless the lessee had a right to yield up and abandon the leased premises either because of the loss of the fences or by the terms of the agreement itself."

As the law did not impose the duty upon the lessor to restore the fence, the court looked for a covenant in the lease which would do so, but failed to find it, hence held that the verbal promise was without consideration. If under the terms of the lease under consideration the lessor could be made to put the new roof on the building, he, for the same reason, could have been compelled to replace the building had it been destroyed by fire or other casualty.

The supposed implied obligation would have been as efficacious in the one case as in the other. If lessees desire to protect themselves against such contingencies as has arisen in this case, they must see that it is provided for in the contract. The averments of the answer which tenders the issue discussed were demurrable. But in addition to them it is averred that if the contract can not be construed as imposing an obligation upon the lessor to make repairs, such provision was omitted by mistake of the draftsmen, as there was an agreement to the effect that the lessor was to make the repairs in question, and asked to have the contract reformed. These averments, if true, entitle the lessees to have the contract reformed in accordance with the agreement of the parties.

Judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WHITEHEAD, JR. v. BROTHERS LODGE NO. 132, I. O. O. F.

SAME v. ELLIS.

(Filed February 12, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Interest—Jurisdiction—Appeals—These actions are here on appeal the second time, and involve the questions whether this court has jurisdiction of a judgment involving only the right to interest on the principal sum and whether appellants are entitled to interest on the amount due them on a contract for erecting a building. Held—That this court has jurisdiction of an action to test the right of a party to interest on a claim. Neither the reason nor spirit of section 950, Kentucky Statutes, would carry its provisions to the extent of preventing a party from having the judgment of this court on the question of the right to have interest allowed on his claim, there being a wide difference between the right to claim interest and the mere sum which may or may not happen to be due. Appellant is entitled to interest on the amount due him under his contract for building a house from the date the work was accepted by the architect.

R. A. Miller, Chapeze Wathen and Birkhead & Clements for appellant.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney and H. M. Haskins for appellees.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Barker.

This case is here on appeal for the second time. The question involved is whether or not the lower court erred in refusing to allow appellant interest on the sums due him on the 1st day of May, 1896.

We think the case of the City of Louisville v. Henderson, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 796, is conclusive of the questions involved on this appeal. The money due appellant at the time the building was accepted by the architect was due on contract, and the appellee having had the benefit and use of the building, which was the subject of the contract from that time, and having refused to pay appellant what was due him on said day, are, in law and equity, bound to pay him interest as compensation for being deprived of the use of his money pending this litigation. This question was so decided in the case cited, and it is a correct exposition of the law on the subject. It is also conclusive of the jurisdictional question raised by appellees. An examination of the case will show that the appellant, city of Louisville, only appealed from so much of the judgment as allowed interest on the claim of appellee Henderson. The case had been many years pending in court, and the interest alone amounted to the sum of $25,000; there was involved on the last appeal only the question of the right to charge appellant interest from the day appellee Henderson had finished his contract. This question had been decided adversely to the city in the court below, whereupon it paid the principal, the sum of $28,646.01, and appealed from so much of the judgment as allowed interest on that sum from January 1, 1876, the interest, as said before, amounting to some $25,000. The Court of Appeals took jurisdiction of the appeal and affirmed the judgment of the court below.

Section 950 of the Kentucky Statutes, which regulates jurisdictional questions of appeals to the Court of Appeals, is as follows: "No appeal shall be taken to the Court of Appeals from a judgment for the recovery of money or personal property if the value in controversy be less than $200, exclusive of interest and costs; nor to reverse a judgment granting a divorce or punishing contempt; nor from any order or judgment of the county court except in actions for the division of land and allotment of dower; nor from any order or judgment of quarterly, city, police, fiscal or justice's court; nor from a bond having the force of a judgment. In all other cases the Court of Appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction over the final orders and judgments of all courts."

The object of fixing a minimum sum as constituting the jurisdictional line in appeals to the Court of Appeals, in cases for the recovery of money or personal property, was to relieve this court from the burden of deciding controversies over small and trifling sums of money and personal property, and neither the reason nor the spirit of the statute in question would carry the provisions to the extent of preventing a party from having the judgment of this court on the question of the right to have interest allowed on his claim, there being, in our opinion, a wide difference between the right to interest and the mere sum which may, or may not, happen to be due. This was clearly recognized in the case of the city of Louisville v. Henderson, supra, else the court could not have taken jurisdiction of the appeal in that case, because, as said before, only the right to charge interest on the principal sued for was involved.

The case cited, when it returned from the Court of Appeals the second time, was in precisely the same condition as was the case at bar when it returned to the lower court. This court had, in both cases, named the sums for which the plaintiffs should be given judgment on their contracts, without having, in so many words, mentioned interest. In the case cited, the chancellor allowed interest; in the case at bar he refused it; in both cases the appeals were from the orders relating alone to interest.

We think the opinion in the case cited is sound, and must control the case. The amount in controversy, for the purpose of testing the right to interest as a legal principle on this appeal, is the amount due appellant under his contract in each case. Suppose, for instance, the holder of municipal bonds of the face value of $1,000,000 should, in an action to enforce their payment after maturity be allowed by the lower court a judgment for their face value without interest, thus erroneously depriving the plaintiff of, say, $50,000 of accrued interest; would not that be an anomalous construction of the statute, which would hold that the plaintiff was remediless as to so enormous an injury? A statement of the proposition seems to answer it.

We do not concur in the assertion of counsel for appellees, that the court below carried into effect the opinion of this court on the former appeal. An examination of the opinion will show that the court stated appellant's claim against the Brothers Lodge No. 132, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 81, as follows: "The plaintiff, Whitehead, also instituted an action in the Davless Circuit Court against the Brothers Lodge, I. O. O. F., No. 132, seeking to recover judgment against it for $3,455.10, with interest from May 1, 1896, being balance due upon the contract for the building heretofore referred to, and also instituted suit against W. T. Ellis, claiming judgment for $1,175, with interest from March 1, 1896, being balance due upon contract with Ellis as aforesaid."

After having thus recognized the claim of appellant as bearing interest from a day certain, the court, on page 33 of the opinion, allowed certain parts of appellee's counterclaim against appellant, to wit, the appellee, Brothers Lodge, I. O. O. F., No. 132, was allowed $1,000 in damages for failure of appellant to complete the building by the 1st day of January, 1896, and the appellee, Ellis, was allowed $400 for damages for the same reason. The right of appellees to be credited by any judgments which they had paid in favor of Drach, Thomas & Bohne was also allowed, and perhaps some other small sums not necessary to be here enumerated; and then the court concludes its opinion as follows: "The judgments appealed from in the two cases of appellant against the Brothers Lodge, I. O. O. F., No. 132, and the judgment in the case of appellant against W. T. Ellis, are reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of appellant for the sums due him as balance upon his contract, after deducting the credits indicated herein.

Clearly, taking the opinion as a whole, it recognizes the right of appellant to interest on the claim due him, and it is certainly the law that he is entitled to such interest. This view of the opinion disposes of the question of res adjudicata. We think the judgment tendered by appellant upon the last hearing in the court below contained a correct exposition of the law as enunciated in the opinion of this court on the former trial herein.

Wherefore, the judgment is reversed, with directions for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JORDAN, &c. v. FENNACY, &c..

(Filed February 18, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Title—Possession—This appeal involves the question of title to the boundary of land. Held—That appellant acquired no title by purchase as his vendor had previously conveyed her interest to others. The proof fails to show that appellant has acquired a title by possession alone.

J. R. Ward for appellants.

E. B. Wilhoit for appellees.

Appeal from Carter Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

The land in controversy is claimed by appellees under the Izrigg 1,000-acre patent and this court, in Smith v. Fennacy, 20 Ky. Law Rep., 1007, affirmed a judgment of the Carter Circuit Court which adjudged to appellees the legal title to the lands embraced in the Grayson patent of 7,000 acres, and the Izrigg patent of 1,000 acres. The appellant, Jordan, seems to have been a party to that action.

It appears that one Floyd previous to 1840 entered upon lot 11 of the Grayson survey and marked out a boundary of about 200 acres, extending into lot No. 10 of the Grayson survey, and lapping over the Izrigg survey, embracing a strip running entirely across lot No. 11. Floyd had, however, shortly theretofore settled on 50 acres of lot No. 10, which had been given him by Carter, the then owner of all these lands. The additional boundary seems to have been marked secretly by him, at any rate his claim thereto, which appears to have been purely possessory, was never successfully asserted by him or his children, and was never recognized by the holders of the legal title. After Floyd's death one of his daughters, Athellale, married Jake Perkins. She seems to have had, before this marriage, a daughter known as Sarah Floyd, who first married one Keith, from whom she was divorced. She then became the wife of the appellant, Jordan, who claims to have purchased of her the land in controversy before their marriage.

It is reasonably apparent from the record that Jordan derived no title by this alleged purchase, for it appears that Sarah Floyd, or Sarah Keith, as sometimes called in the record, had in the case of R. B. Carter, &c. v. Charles Pearce, &c., decided in the Carter Circuit Court some twenty-five years ago, and before the alleged purchase of Jordan, compromised with the Carters, and by deed conveyed to them her entire interest in the Floyd boundary in consideration of which the Carters conveyed her the title to the 50 acres upon which her ancestor, old man Floyd, had settled.

The only remaining question is as to the sufficiency of appellee's possession. A great amount of proof was taken upon this point, and much of it is conflicting. The chancellor, whose judgment is appealed from, came to the conclusion that appellant's possession is not of such a character as to overthrow appellee's legal title, and as our examination of the record has failed to disclose any error in that conclusion, the judgment is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE, HENDERSON & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY CO. v. McCUNE.

(Filed February 13, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Railroads—Negligence—Instructions—Appellee was a motorman on an electric car and his car was struck by a freight train at the crossing on Frederica street, in Owensboro, and knocked off the track, and appellant was thrown a considerable distance and suffered severe, painful and permanent injuries. An ankle and wrist were permanently injured. Appellee recovered a judgment for $3,000 on the ground that said injuries were caused by the negligence of appellant's servants in backing said train at a high rate of speed, without giving warning of its approach. A reversal is asked on account of alleged prejudicial errors in instructions given. It is urged that the court improperly gave an instruction, which permitted the jury to give damages for expense incurred for medical or surgical treatment. Held—That this instruction was harmless, as appellee did not make any claim in his petition for special damages, nor did he prove any expense incurred for medicine or such treatment. Appellant claims that the permanency and seriousness of his injury was caused by getting out and walking too soon. Held—That this contention is not maintainable. There was no issue made in the pleadings on this matter, and, besides, the court confined the jury to the damages he sustained by reason of his being thrown from the car as the direct and proximate result of the injuries he received as the result thereof.

Helm, Bruce & Helm and Chapeze Wathen for appellant.

Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney for appellee.

Appeal from Davless Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

The appellant asks a reversal of this case for several reasons. The facts, as shown in the record, are, in substance, that appellant's railroad crosses the street railway at right angles on Frederica street in the city of Owensboro, Ky., a street, and at a point that is used extensively by the public, and where street cars cross appellant's tracks about every ten minutes.

The appellant's servants in charge of a freight train, composed of engine, tender and from eight to twelve cars with caboose, without any warning and without any one being on the caboose or cars, backed this train from the east at the rate of eight to twelve miles per hour and struck a street car, on which appellee was the motorman, and knocked the car off of its track and threw appellee a considerable distance and injured his hip, back, wrist and ankle. The jury gave him a verdict for $3,000.

The appellant's witnesses fix the rate of speed at which the train was running at not more than four miles per hour, and that the bell was rung continuously, and two of the witnesses place one of the servants on the caboose, and say that he tried to attract appellee's attention to his danger. The appellant excepted to all of the instructions given by the court, which, taken all together, were more favorable to it than it was entitled to. The main contention of appellant is that instruction No. 2 authorized the jury, in fixing the amount of damages, to consider the expense incurred for medical or surgical treatment. The appellee did not claim anything in his petition for special damages, nor did appellee prove any sum incurred for medicine or such treatment.

The language used in instruction No. 2, referred to, was evidently inadvertently used, and under the evidence in this case the error was harmless, and if the jury believed the appellee's evidence, and the evidence of his witnesses, appellant's servants in operating said train did not use "the highest" or any degree of care for the protection of persons using, or about to use, the crossing at Frederica street. The evidence at the trial, which was about a year after the injury, showed that the injured wrist was still enlarged and his injured ankle was in bad condition, and by four physicians that it was permanently injured; that one of the smaller bones was enlarged, the ligaments that held the foot in position on one side were torn loose from the bone and caused his foot to turn and he walked on the side of his foot, and that his power to earn money was lessened, at least one-half, and would so continue.

Appellant claims that the permanency and seriousness of his injury was caused by his getting out and walking too soon, i. e., about four or five weeks. There was no issue made in the pleadings on this matter, and, besides, the court confined the jury to the damages he sustained by reason of his being thrown from the car, as the direct and proximate result of the injuries he received as the result thereof. The jury by the instructions given were not allowed to give appellee anything for injuries caused or produced by his own improper or imprudent acts, if any, which enhanced his injuries. Instruction No. 6 was harmless, and not subject to the criticism made by the appellant, but it was not necessary for the court to give it, for the law on that point, as applicable to both appellant and appellee, was given in instruction No. 7.

Perceiving no error prejudicial to appellant the judgment is affirmed.

HOME INSURANCE CO. v. WOOD.

(Filed February 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Insurance—Waiver of payment of premium—Instructions—In this action to recover the amount of loss on a policy of fire insurance issued by appellant, it was pleaded in defense that appellant was not liable for the loss on account of the failure of appellee to pay the premium when due, as agreed. In reply appellee pleads a waiver by the agent of the prompt payment and a waiver of the forfeiture of the policy. Held—That appellee's proof failed to show a waiver of prompt payment, and the court should have given a peremptory instruction to find for defendant. Appellee can not avail himself of the defense of sickness as preventing prompt payment of the premium. It is a well-settled rule of law that where the law itself creates a duty the nonperformance of it will be excused by an unavoidable accident previous to its performance. But this principle has no application to a case where a person has created a charge or obligation upon himself by an express contract. In the latter case he will not be permitted to excuse himself therefrom by pleading an act of God rendering performance impossible.

Sims & Grider and Guy H. Herdman for appellant.

McQuown & Bradburn for appellee.

Appeal from Warren Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The appellant issued to appellee a policy insuring his barn and contents for five years from the 7th of December, 1895, which contained the following stipulation: "It is expressly agreed that this company shall not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur to the property herein mentioned while any installment of the installment note, given for premium upon this policy, remains past due and unpaid, or while any single payments of the premium remains past due and unpaid."

In consideration of the policy the appellee paid to the agent of the appellant $7 in cash, and executed the following obligation: "For value received in policy, dated the 9th day of December, 1895, issued by the Home Ins. Co. of New York, I promise to pay said company, or order, by mail, if requested, at the office of its Western Farm Department in Chicago, Ill., $28, in installments as follows: $7 upon the 1st of December, 1896; $7 on the 1st of December, 1897; $7 on the 1st of December, 1898; $7 on the 1st of December, 1899, without interest. It is hereby agreed that in case any one of the installments herein named shall not be paid at maturity, * * * this company shall not be liable for loss during such default, and the said policy shall lapse until payment is made to this company at the Western Farm Department at Chicago."

The installment, due on the 1st day of December, 1899, was not paid at maturity, and the insured barn with its contents were burned up on the 2d day of December, 1899, whilst the installment premium remained unpaid. The company having declined to pay, appellee brought this suit to coerce payment. Appellant plead and relied on the foregoing provisions of the policy and note to avoid liability. Appellee in his reply seeks to escape the forfeiture provided for in the policy and note, for default in the payment, upon two grounds:

1st. Because this provision, he alleges, was waived by the defendant through its agent, Dearing, before the last installment of the premium became due.

2d. He alleges that about the last of November, 1899, he was taken violently ill, and was unable to attend to any of his business matters; and that whilst in this condition his barn and other property insured by the defendant was burned up. The defendant, in its rejoinder, denies the alleged promise or agreement made with Dearing, and alleges that on the 15th day of November they mailed to appellee the following notice:

"Chicago, November 15, 1899.

"John T. Wood:

"Your fifth installment of premium for insurance in the Home Ins. Co. of New York, $7, falls due on the 1st day of next month. Please remit immediately the above-name sums by draft on Chicago or New York; or by postoffice order, or express money office order, payable to the Home Ins. Co. of New York. * * * *

"We inclose herewith an addressed envelope, in which please return this sheet with the amount designated.

"Respectfully yours,

"H. H. WALKER, Secretary.

"P. S.—Do not fail to fill and sign the following blank attached below, and return this whole sheet with remittance in the return envelope. Write your name plainly, also the name of the postoffice at which you now receive your mail, so that we may change our records if your name or address is not recorded correctly."

Plaintiff testified upon the trial that three or four months before the installment became due he had an interview with John Dearing, the agent of the company, who called upon him to pay an overdue premium upon a policy of insurance upon his dwelling house, which he paid, and that at this time he asked Dearing if he had the note for the last premium on his barn, which fell due on the first day of the following December; that Dearing answered no; that he then said to Dearing: "If you will get that note and send it to the bank, I will pay. I had rather pay it now;" that in response, Dearing said that it was all right; that he would bring it down some time when he came on other business. Plaintiff admitted, upon cross-examination, that Dearing told, at that time, that it was not the rule of the company to send the note, and the way for him to do was to send the money, and the company would forward the notes; that in response to this he said it was not his rule, and was not customary throughout the county; that when his note was paid he wanted it, and would require it, but that he never sent it to the bank. Dearing denied the whole of this conversation.

This conversation is not as definite and specific as it might be, but, even if we concede that it amounted to a waiver of the express stipulation of the note that the installment was to be paid direct to the company at their home office in Chicago, it was based upon a mere voluntary agreement without consideration, which the company had the power to withdraw upon notice. And we are of the opinion that the notice of November 15, 1899, which appellee admits he received, amounted to a revocation of the alleged waiver made by Dearing.

Nor can appellee avail himself of the defense of sickness, relied on in the second paragraph of his reply. It is a well-settled rule of law that where the law itself creates a duty, the nonperformance of it will be excused by an unavoidable accident previous to its performance. But this principle has no application to a case where a person has created a charge or obligation upon himself by an express contract. In the latter case he will not be permitted to excuse himself therefrom by pleading an act of God, rendering performance impossible. (A. & E. Ency. of Law, 2d edition, volume 1, page 588, and authorities there cited.) This doctrine has also been repeatedly announced by this court. (Beatty & Skinner v. Scrivner, 19 Ky., 139; Bohanan v. Lewis, 19 Ky., 380; Sinclair v. Carrol, 29 Ky., 527; Hilburn v. Mofford, 70 Ky., 174.)

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the court erred in failing to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant upon their motion at the close of plaintiff's testimony.

For reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MOAYON, &c. v. MOAYON.

(Filed February 13, 1903.)

1. Husband and wife—Specific performance of contracts—Appellant and appellee are husband and wife. They have two children who are infants, and the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. is the guardian of these children. Prior to December 4, 1900, they had separated on a ground which, as is alleged, entitled the wife to a divorce a vinculo. The wife had retained counsel, who had prepared for filing a petition for divorce from the husband. On that day, at the instance of the husband, a written contract of settlement of their differences was entered into. The contract recites the fact that the parties have been living separate and apart for some months, and they have agreed mutually to forego their differences and to be reconciled and live with each other as husband and wife after the full execution of this agreement. It further recites that the parties have agreed that a settlement is to be made upon the children in order to insure a sufficient estate for them and for their maintenance, education and support and future welfare, and in consideration of love and affection and the further consideration of $1 cash in hand paid. Then follows the agreement on the part of the husband to transfer and convey to the trust company for the benefit of said children one-third of all his property, real and personal, and providing that in the case of the death of either child its share should vest in the wife. The wife resumed her relations as wife, but the husband refused to comply with the terms of the contract by making a transfer to the trust company, and this suit was brought to enforce specific performance of same. Divers objections are urged against the enforcement of said contract.

2. Consideration of contract—It is urged that it is not founded upon a valuable consideration, and that it is disfavored upon principles of public policy. Held—That the facts and circumstances constitute a valuable consideration for the contract. The amount agreed to be paid for the benefit of the children was no more than the law would have given her as alimony, and was fair and reasonable. It is the policy of the law, because it has been found best for social happiness and progress, that the state of marriage be encouraged. Certainly if an agreement between husband and wife, settling the obligations of the husband to provide for the wife in contemplation of their living permanently apart, will be specifically enforced as being based upon a sufficient legal consideration, and as being not contrary to the policy of the law, a fortiori must be a contract between them under like conditions founded on the consideration of the restoration or preservation of the marital relation. The contract was based upon sufficient consideration, and is not opposed to a sound public policy. The contract is definite, certain, fair and equitable. It is urged that the contract can not be enforced because lacking in mutuality of obligation and remedy on the part of the wife. Held—That there were several mutual obligations. The mutual agreement to forego differences that was executed; the mutual agreement to be reconciled, which was executed, and the remaining consideration to be performed of living together as husband and wife. This feature of the contract was executed by resumption by the parties of the marital relation and duties.

3. Sufficiency of description of land in contract—Statute of frauds—The description of the property to be transferred to the trustee as "one-third of all the real and personal estate" of the husband is sufficiently definite to be enforced. "All" means "all." "All of my land" is a description by necessary implication and common understanding, referring to such land as I may own, evidenced by the public records where land titles are required to be recorded, or to my actual and continuous possession for such time as under the law constitutes a title. This identification is complete, and admits of no possibility of mistake in this case. Applying to it the familiar usage of the courts in such matters, parol testimony may be allowed to designate the particular properties described and identified by the writing and in the contemplation of the parties in making the contract.

4. Parties to actions—A court of equity has authority to grant the wife relief as against her husband where her property rights are involved, besides, section 34, Civil Code of Practice, expressly authorizes the wife to maintain an action of this nature.

Barker & Woods, Kohn, Baird & Spindle and Hunter Wood & Son for appellants.

Landes & Allensworth, John C. Duffy, John Feland, Jr., John Phelps and Hazelrigg & Chenault for appellee.

Appeal from Christian Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge O'Rear.

Appellant, Birdie Moayon, and appellee, Max Moayon, are husband and wife. They have two children who are infants. The Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. is the guardian of these children.

Prior to December 4, 1900, there was a separation of these parties on a ground, as is alleged, which entitled the wife to a divorce a vinculo. It is not material to this decision as to the nature of this cause. The wife had retained counsel who had prepared for filing a petition for divorce from appellee. On the 4th of December, 1900, at the instance of appellee, the parties treated for a settlement of their differences, resulting in a contract, in writing between them, which we copy in full, as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 4th day of December, 1900, by and between Max J. Moayon and his wife, Birdie Moayon, and the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., trustee for Beatrice and Jessamine, children of the said Max and Birdie Moayon, witnesseth: That whereas, the said Max and Birdie are now, and have been for some months past, living sep-separate and apart from each other; and whereas, the said parties have this day agreed mutually to forego their differences and to be reconciled and live with each other as husband and wife after the full execution of this agreement; now, and in view of the fact that the parties have agreed that a settlement is to be made upon the said children by the said Max Moayon, in order to insure a sufficient estate for them and for their maintenance, education and support and future welfare; now, in consideration of the love and affection which the said Max Moayon bears the said children, Beatrice and Jessamine, and in consideration of $1 cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and in consideration of the acceptance of the trust by said Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., under this agreement, the said Max Moayon hereby agrees to convey, transfer and deliver, in fee simple, to the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., as trustee, for the use and benefit of the said Beatrice and Jessamine Moayon, his children, one-third of all of his estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right, which he acquired under the will of Hannah Moayon, his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired or now owned by him, the said personal property to be delivered according to the rules of law, and the real estate to be conveyed by deed properly acknowledged and recorded as soon as the deeds can be prepared. The absolute estate is to be conveyed to said trustee for the use and benefit of the said children, and in the event of the death of either of said children the estate of such child shall go and belong to said Birdie Moayon, for her own sole and separate use forever. Said trustee shall have the authority to collect all income from said estate so conveyed, and pay the same over to the said Birdie Moayon for the use and benefit of the said children's care and education. She shall not be required to render any account of the moneys thus received by her, but her receipt shall be an absolute acquittance of the trustee. Said trustee shall be authorized to convey, sell, exchange or dispose of any part of the estate so conveyed, and transfer a fee-simple title whenever the said trustee deems it proper to do so, and conveyance by the said trustee shall convey the fee-simple title, and the said trustee shall hold the proceeds received from any such conveyance for the same use, purposes, and to the same extent and in the same manner as the original estate is held under this agreement. It is agreed between the parties that within ten days a full inventory of all the estate of the said Moayon shall be delivered to the said Birdie Moayon and said Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co., and the deeds executed in accordance with this agreement, and the transfers of personalty made in accordance with the terms of this agreement and to carry into full effect the same

"Witness the hands of the parties this 4th day of December, 1900, at Louisville, Ky.

"MAX J. MOAYON,

"BIRDIE MEYERS MOAYON.

"The Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Co. joins in the foregoing arrangement for the purpose of signifying its acceptance of the trust to be created by the deed of conveyance contemplated by its terms.

"FIDELITY TRUST AND SAFETY VAULT CO.,

"By JOHN W. BARR, Vice-President."

The foregoing facts are gathered from appellants' petition filed in this case, seeking a specific performance of the above contract, it being also alleged that in pursuance thereto appellant Birdie had forgiven the wrongs of appellee and had returned to his home and resumed her relations as a dutiful wife, and from the date of this contract, and in performance of her part thereof, had continued to live with appellee as his wife, and was yet doing so. It was also averred that appellee had wholly failed to comply with his part of the agreement, the one above copied, and that he refused to do so. A full description of his property, alleged to be that intended by the parties to be, and that was, embraced in the terms of the written contract was given in the petition. It shows a number of pieces of real estate in Christian county, this State, and personal property of the value of about $30,000. Appellee interposed a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained, and the petition dismissed.

In support of the judgment it is argued that the contract is unenforceable, for the following reasons:

1st. That it is not founded upon a valuable consideration, and that it is disfavored upon principles of sound public policy.

2d. That it is indefinite and uncertain, and inequitable and unreasonable.

3d. That it is lacking in mutuality of obligation and remedy on the part of the wife.

4th. That the description of the property to be conveyed is not sufficiently certain, nor is it sufficiently identified to satisfy the statute of frauds.

5th. That the wife can not contract with her husband concerning her property rights, nor can she sue him therefor, other than in an action for divorce and alimony.

As a determination for appellee of any one of the questions just outlined must result in an affirmance of the judgment, we will take them up and discuss and dispose of them in the order stated:

1st. It is conceded by the demurrer that Mrs. Moayon had legal grounds for her separation and divorce; that she and her husband were then living apart, because of those grounds, and that she had retained counsel, to prepare, and he had prepared, a suit for her seeking a divorce from her husband. She, at her husband's solicitation, forgave his wrong; resumed a relation which he by his conduct had forfeited, and had no legal right to longer claim, and saved to him the costs of the threatened litigation. Also, under the facts admitted, she was certainly entitled to recover from him substantial alimony, including maintenance for herself and children pending the action, and including a sum sufficient to enable her to employ counsel and defray the costs of her suit against him. As between other persons, where one has a cause of action against the other, and is about to begin a suit on it, its abandonment and satisfaction will constitute a consideration to support a contract based upon that fact. (Clark v. McFarlan, 5 Dana, 48; Brown v. Buford, 3 Ben Mon., 508; 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 2d edition, 947, and cases.) Nor is it even necessary that the party sought to be charged shall have been benefited by the abandonment of the suit. If the other party has thereby been put to an irretrievable disadvantage, that fact will equally constitute what is termed a valuable consideration. (Ford v. Crenshaw, 1 Litt., 70; Gaines v. Scott, 3 Ky. Law Rep., 418.)

able offense, will be a bar, as a condonement, to the suit of the wife for divorce based upon the original facts. Independent of the question whether the fact of the reconciliation was not of as much value to the wife as to the husband, and that a mere claim or right to a divorce is of no legal value, yet her right to a settlement upon herself and children, as alimony and maintenance, was a right possessing money value. When she abandoned and obliterated her cause for divorce in this case it likewise nullified her right to sue for and recover alimony.

It is argued, though, that it is the duty of the wife, no less than of the husband, to maintain in good faith the marital relation; that a promise of one to pay money to the other to continue the married relation is at best but an agreement to pay for the performance of a duty already undertaken for a sufficient consideration (to wit, the mutual undertaking to live together in the married state), and that, therefore, there is nothing upon which to rest the new promise.

Were it the fact that there was no cause for the separation, this argument of appellee would be good. The other side of this proposition, that is, an agreement between husband and wife by which the former undertook to pay the latter a stipend in consideration of their living apart, has been before this court frequently. In all those cases it was shown that the marital relations had become unendurable to the parties, whether because of statutory grounds of divorce or not was not always shown. The contract of the husband to pay the wife a stipulated sum, or to convey to her certain property, was upheld on the theory that it was the legal and moral duty of the husband to support the wife; and that these contracts were but another form of, and were in lieu of, the original undertaking, and were consequently valid. (Gaines v. Poor, 3 Met., 303; Flood v. Flood, 5 Bush, 170; Loud v. Loud, 4 Bush, 455; Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky., 510.)

Nor was it held in those cases to be necessary that the suit for divorce should be pending in order to support the agreement. It was sufficient if there was an actual, or impending separation and suit for divorce. (Gaines v. Poor, supra.)

It is the policy of the law, because it has been found best for social happiness and progress, that the state of marriage be encouraged. Certainly if an agreement between husband and wife, settling the obligations of the husband to provide for the wife, in contemplation of their living permanently apart, will be specifically enforced, as being based upon a sufficient legal consideration, and as being not contrary to the policy of the law, a fortiori must be a contract between them under like conditions founded on the consideration of the restoration or preservation of the marital relation. (Bishop on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, section 1279.)

As said in Adams v. Adams, 91 New York, 381: "While the law favors the settlement of controversies between all other persons, it would be a curious policy which would forbid husband and wife to compromise their differences, or preclude either from foregoing a wrong committed by the other." To same effect is the case of Phillips v. Meyer, 92 Ill., 70.

In Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J., 429, the wife had abandoned her husband because of certain violations by him of the marital duties. She brought suit for divorce and alimony. He sought a reconciliation. Among other inducements offered by the husband was the agreement to convey her certain real estate owned by him if she would be reconciled to him. Relying upon his assurance and promises she did become reconciled, and again took up her former relations with him as wife. He then refused to comply with his agreement to convey her the property as he had agreed. The court, at her suit for specific performance, granted the relief prayed for. In the course of the opinion it was said: "The agreement is an agreement respecting the conveyance of land. The consideration was a valuable one. No consideration can be named of higher importance or of more solemn significance. It is difficult to measure it. Dollars and cents afford no adequate conception of the true nature of the consideration moving upon the one side to the execution of this agreement. This agreement is thus brought within every case that recognizes the doctrine of part performance in the slightest degree. Upon the part of the wife it is not only partially, but entirely performed. She not only agreed to become reconciled to him, but in the sincerest manner, by her conduct, manifested her determination so to continue."

In addition to the foregoing, we think the principle is also sustained by the following authorities: Smith v. Smith, 35 Hun, 378; Shepherd v. Shepherd, 7 Johns., chapter 57; Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va., 449.

We are consequently of opinion that the contract was based upon sufficient consideration, and is not opposed to a sound public policy.

2d. That the contract is definite, certain, fair and equitable, we have no doubt. The wife agrees to abandon, and it is alleged has abandoned, her suit for divorce, and has forgiven its cause. She agrees to resume the wifely relation, and has done so in pursuance to the agreement. The husband undertook, besides his promise of a fulfillment of the conjugal duties, to convey to a named trustee one-third of all his property for the maintenance and education of their two children, it in event of their death to go to the wife. It also was provided for the management of the trust. The only serious criticism of the paper as to its indefiniteness or lack of equity, besides the matter of description and mutuality, which will be discussed further on, is the suggestion that it is unfair and inequitable to appellee to enforce a contract that may let into joint ownership with him in his property, and in his mercantile establishment, other persons probably not desirable, and whose interference would jeopardize, if not destroy, the value of his business. As to the real property, it not infrequently happens that it is owned jointly by persons of incompatible tastes. Yet we have never before heard it urged as a defense against the specific performance of one's contract to sell an undivided interest in his land that his vendee might sell the interest to some undesirable person, entailing probably a disastrous suit to sell the whole property because of its indivisibility. Those are questions that might properly influence one in determining whether he will sell an undivided interest in his property. But after he has contracted to do so, for an adequate consideration, we perceive no reason why equity should relieve him from a specific execution of his contract on such a ground. Upon the face of the contract it does not appear to us to be unfair. It settles upon the wife's children certainly no more than the allegations of her petition show would probably have been set apart to her as alimony had she prosecuted her suit.

That she saw proper to have this sum settled on her children, instead of upon herself, is not a ground for objection by appellee.

3d. It is very earnestly argued that the contract should not be enforced because of lack of mutuality in obligation and in remedy. It is asserted by appellee that before a contract will be specifically enforced in equity it must not only be reasonable and practicable, and supported by an adequate consideration, and be certain and definite in regard to the property to be conveyed, but it must be mutually binding upon the parties, and the remedy for its enforcement must also be mutual to the parties. It is the latter condition that we now address ourselves to. We concede the correctness of appellee's proposition. Yet it may be satisfied with less than an ideal fulfillment of its full text. For example, it is generally held that, under the statutes of frauds and perjuries, where the contract is not in writing, if one party relying on the agreement and induced thereby has executed his part of the contract, the other party may be compelled to perform, or to respond in damages if specific performance is withheld. Not to do so would be to make the statute, enacted to prevent frauds, an instrument for effectuating a fraud.

To examine minutely that part of the agreement bearing on this question, we again quote from it: "Whereas the said Max and Birdie Moayon are now, and have been for some months past, living separate and apart from each other; and whereas, the said parties have this day mutually agreed to forego their differences and to be reconciled and live with each other as husband and wife after the full execution of this agreement; now, in view of the fact that the parties have agreed that a settlement is to be made upon the said children by the said Max Moayon, in order to insure a sufficient estate for them and for their maintenance, education and support and future welfare; now, in consideration of the love and affection which the said Max Moayon bears the said children, Beatrice and Jessamine, and in consideration of one dollar cash in hand paid, etc."

We have not rested this contract on the consideration of the "love and affection" of the father to his children (though it seems that might alone have been sufficient in this State) any more than upon the one dollar recited as having been paid. In the case of an executed contract, reciting several matters as constituting the consideration, if any one of them is sufficient, probably that would satisfy the inquiry. But in an executory contract, the execution of which is resisted by one of the parties, the inquiry should embrace all the matters recited as the consideration, because we can not say that the complaining party would have entered into the contract in the absence of any of the matters recited as the moving consideration for his action. The consideration of this contract may be thus stated:

- (a) The mutual agreement to forego differences.
- (b) The mutual agreement to be reconciled.
- (c) The mutual agreement to live with each other as husband and wife.
- (d) Love and affection of the husband for his children.
- (e) One dollar.

The last two are not questioned. Appellant, Mrs. Moayon did forego the cause of their difference—that part of the contract is unquestionably executed; she did become reconciled to appellee—that is executed. The only remaining part of the contract is (c) "the mutual agreement to live with each other as husband and wife, after the full execution of this agreement." The parties saw proper to anticipate the time of execution of this clause of the contract, and resumed their living together before the full execution of the agreement. This was necessarily by mutual consent, and neither party can take advantage by complaint of that act. The case is rested, however, on this point upon the argument by appellee that the contract contemplated not merely going back to their former relation, but permanently continuing in it; that the wife's undertaking on this score can not be fulfilled short of the death of one of the parties, for so long as they both live she might leave him. It is then argued that so long as she owes him any part of this undertaking, i. e., to live with him as his wife, it is a duty that could not be enforced against her by the court; that no civil court ever has attempted to compel two people to so live together, no matter which was in fault, therefore, it is claimed there is lacking that mutuality of remedy necessary to the enforcement in equity of this contract. Marriage contracts and marriage articles have been upheld and enforced by the courts from earliest times. They involve an agreement between a man and woman to assume the marital relation, to live together as husband and wife, in consideration of which each relinquishes his or her claim to the other's property, or one agrees to convey or deliver to the other certain property or money. If they, in pursuance of the agreement, did marry and live together as husband and wife, the contract has been considered always as executed, so far as that part of the undertaking was concerned. It has been held that neither misconduct of a party after marriage (Moore v. Moore, 1 Atk., 272; Sidney v. Sidney, 3 P. Wins., 269; Seagrave v. Seagrave, 13 Ves., Jr., 439; Fisher v. Koontz, 110 Iowa, 498), nor the subsequent divorce of the parties, in the absence of some term in the contract providing against such contingency (or of some statutory regulation of the subject), do not affect the validity of the marriage settlement. (Evans v. Carrington, 2 De G. F. & J., 481; Barclay v. Waring, 58 Ga., 86; Babcock v. Smith, 24 Pick., Mass., 61; Child v. Pearl, 43 Vt., 224.) Bonds for the payment of money have been enforced upon the executed consideration of marriage. (Smith v. Patterson, Cheves' Eq., 29; Ancker v. Levy, 3 Strobb. Eq., S. Car., 197; Logan v. Winholt, 1 Cl. & F., 611.) The promise of a woman to marry a man was held a sufficient and valuable consideration to support his deed to her, where it appeared that she had been prevented from executing the promise without her fault, but by his death. (Smith v. Allen, 5 Allen, 454, S. C.; 81 Am. Dec., 758.) The marriage contract, that is, the agreement to marry, is complete and executed when the parties to it have entered into the married relation in the manner required by statute. Undoubtedly every valid marriage contemplates that the parties shall live together as husband and wife "till death them do part." In a case like the present one, the agreement to live together as husband and wife could include nothing more on this point than the original vows of matrimony did. To say that marriage was not an execution of that part of a marriage settlement between a man and woman, competent to marry, as would require the performance of the other undertakings in the settlement, would be to practically destroy that which for time out of mind has been regarded as a subject of such contracts, for it would necessarily postpone the execution of the remaining part of such contracts till the death of one of the parties, thereby substantially destroying their value in many instances to the party benefited and intended to be protected by them.

We must hold, in reason and under the authorities, that this feature of the contract under consideration was executed by the resumption of the parties of the marital relation and duties. What relief appellee would be entitled to, as to a restoration of the property, or some part thereof, if Mrs. Moayon should subsequently abandon him without cause, is a question we do not determine.

4th. Does the contract sufficiently describe the property to be conveyed?

The description in the contract is: "One-third of all his (appellee's) estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right which he acquired under the will of Hannah Moayon, his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired or now owned by him."

Can the intention of the parties, and the property to be affected by the writing, be gathered from this description? If so, the statute is complied with. It is the purpose of the description of the property, concerning which a contract is made, to identify it. As said in Warvelle on Vendors, volume 1, section 96: "While an unequivocal description, giving location, area and boundaries, is a literal and perfect observation of the rule, a less particular statement will usually suffice, provided it contains within itself the proper means of identification, as by reference to extrinsic facts or other instruments by means of which the land can be ascertained with sufficient certainty."

The ideal, perfect description, is preferred. But we can not compel its adoption. It is our business to treat with such contracts as the parties have made, enforcing them when lawful and practicable. It is not necessary then that the writing should do more than indicate clearly what property is to be affected by it, if its description or identification can be gotten from the contract or from any extrinsic fact or writing referred to in the contract. A portion of the property may be identified by the will of Hannah Moayon, specifically referred to in the contract. It is necessarily of record to be a will, and that record will satisfy so much of the contract as treats of so much of appellee's property as derives its title from that source. The remainder of the description is: "All the other estate otherwise acquired or owned by me."

In Warvelle on Vendors, section 135, it is said that a description as "my house and lot" imports a particular house and lot, rendered certain by the description that it is the one that belongs to "me."

The following descriptions have been held sufficient: "My lot on the plat in the town of S., on the plat of said town, on the river bank" (Colenck v. Hooper, 3 Ind., 816); the "Snow farm" (Hollis v. Burgess, 37 Kansas, 487); "H.'s place at S." (Hodges v. Korving, 58 Conn., 12); the "Knapp Home Property" (Goodman v. Curtis, 18 Mich., 298). An agreement to convey land described as "occupied" by the vendor or a third person (Angel v. Simpson, 85 Ala., 53; Tarle v. Carmels Land and Coal Co., 99 Cal., 397; Doctor v. Hellberg, 65 Wis., 415.) In all such cases parol evidence was admitted not to identify, but to designate the subject-matter already identified in the minds of the parties, in the language of the contract when read in the light of the facts.

In this State, in Overstreet v. Rice, 4 Bush, 3, the expression "we have swapped farms," naming the terms, but without further description of either farm, was held sufficient after the parties had themselves identified the lands intended to be affected by taking possession of them.

In Ellis v. Deadman's Heirs, 4 Bibb, 466, the writing was: "4th January, 1808. Received of Jesse Ellis, $—, in part pay for a lot he bought of me in the town of Versailles, it being the cash part of the purchase of said lot. Nathan Deadman." This court said: "Had the receipt specified the terms of the agreement, there would have been no doubt of the propriety of decreeing the specific execution." It is as essential that the terms be specified as the description of the property. "Ten acres adjoining him on the north" in a bond for title to land of the vendor adjoining the vendee, was held sufficient in Hanly v. Blackford, 1 Dana, 2.

In Henderson v. Perkins, 94 Ky., 211, the description was "my home place and store house." It was held sufficient on the authority of Ellis v. Deadman, supra, and Hanly v. Blackford, supra.

In the case of Varnum v. State, 78 Ala., 28, the description was: "My entire crop of every description, raised by me or caused to be raised by me, annually, till this debt is paid." While that was not concerning real estate, it was such a contract (one not to be performed within a year) as was by the statute of frauds required to be in writing. Concerning that description that court said: "It is objected to the admission in evidence of this mortgage that it was void for uncertainty in the description of the crops intended to be included in it. Whatever force there may be in this objection to the instrument on its face, this alleged uncertainty was capable of being removed, when read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the contracting parties at the time of its execution, by extraneous parol identification."

Parol evidence can not be introduced to vary, enlarge or restrict the written terms of the contract. But frequently it is the case that application of apparently vague descriptions must be by parol testimony, which puts before the court the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties when the contract was made, or is to be executed, that its terms may be interpreted by the light from such surroundings. From this rule springs the maxim, "that is certain which can be made certain."

In this case it has been said "all" means all. "All of my land" is a description by necessary implication and common understanding referring to such lands as I may own, evidenced by the public records where land titles are required to be recorded, or to my actual and continuous possession for such time as under the law constitutes a title. This identification is complete, and admits of no possibility of mistake in this case. Applying to it the familiar usage of the courts in such matters, parol testimony may be allowed to designate the particular properties described and identified by the writing, and in the contemplation of the parties in making the contract.

5th. It is true that by the common law contracts between husband and wife were void. Yet equity recognized numerous instances in which the parties had peculiar property rights which they were allowed to personally control, and to make contracts concerning. It would be an anomaly, and a reproach to the law, to say that it recognizes a legal property right in one, to whom all the doors of every court were closed. Therefore, it was early held (Story's Eq. Jur., 1872) that although contracts between husband and wife are void at law, they are not always so in equity. This court has repeatedly affirmed the same doctrine. In Evans v. Evans, 98 Ky., 510, it was said: "Generally, if a contract between husband and wife merely be just and reasonable, and would be good at law when made by the husband with a trustee for the wife, it will be upheld in equity." This case was followed in Bohannon v. Travis, 94 Ky., 59.

In Ward v. Crotty, 4 Met., 59, it was affirmed that the husband's contract with the wife would be specifically enforced against him in equity, without the intervention of a trustee. This has been adhered to in Maraman v. Maraman, 4 Met., 89, and Campbell v. Galbreath, 12 Bush, 459.

It is further re-enforced by legislative enactment looking to the same end, viz., section 34 of the Civil Code, as follows: "In actions between husband and wife; in actions concerning her separate property; and in actions concerning her general property, and in actions for personal suffering of or injury to her person and character, in which he refuses to unite, she may sue or be sued alone."

The wife may maintain her action.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

MERCER COUNTY v. CITY OF HARRODSBURG.

(Filed February 18, 1908.)

Contracts—Failure of consideration—Nuisance—In 1888 appellant made a contract with appellee, by which it surrendered seven feet of ground on the north and south sides of its public square, and appellant agreed to build a good fence on the new line and a good brick pavement on the land surrendered, in consideration of which appellee granted to appellant the right and privilege to erect hitching racks on the old line, and to perpetually maintain them. Appellant fully complied with its part of the contract and enjoyed the privilege of the hitchrack until 1900, when appellee forcibly tore down the hitchrack and enjoined appellant from erecting them again. Appellee removed same because they had become a nuisance, and it had been so declared by order of the council. Appellant brought this suit to recover $2,500, the value of the ground, and $700, the cost of the improvements it had made. Held—That appellant can not recover. This contract was binding on both parties when it was made, and each party continued to receive the benefits of the consideration from the date thereof until 1900. The hitching rack was not per se a nuisance, but it became so by reason of the increase of population in its increased use. At the time this contract was entered into, in 1883, and appellant accepted the hitching posts as the consideration for the strips of land, it so accepted same with the knowledge that it might, on account of the growth of the county and city, and the great and continued use of same, become a nuisance, and, therefore, be compelled to surrender same for the public good and health.

W. C. Bell and Gaither & Vanarsdall for appellant.

Robt. Harding for appellee.

Appeal from Mercer Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

On October 8, 1888, the appellant and appellee made a contract, by the terms of which the appellant surrendered to appellee seven feet of ground on the north side of its public square in Harrodsburg and a like amount on the south side, both strips extending the width of the square from east to west, and appellant agreed to build a fence on the new line and a good brick pavement on the land surrendered, for which land and the improvements made the appellee granted to the appellant the right and privilege to erect hitching racks on the old line and to perpetually maintain them.<sup>6</sup> Appellant's petition sets up this contract, and that in keeping with it the county surrendered the lands, which were of the value of $2,500, and made the improvements, at a cost of $700, to recover which this action was brought; after which it erected the hitching racks and maintained them as contemplated by the contract until May 19, 1900, when appellee forcibly tore down the racks, removed them and then denied the right and privilege of appellant to erect and maintain the racks. The petition fails to state that the racks were torn down without right, but says that they were prohibited from re-erecting the racks "by injunction proceedings in this honorable court." And further, that the city, by an ordinance duly passed, and entered on its records, had prevented all persons from hitching horses on the courthouse square under a penalty of $5 for each violation. To the plaintiff's petition appellee filed a demurrer, which the lower court sustained, and this cause is here on appeal from that judgment.

From the petition it seems clear that this contract was valid and binding upon the parties when made, and each party continued to receive the benefits of the consideration from the date thereof until the year 1900, a period of seventeen years. This court also gathers from the petition that in 1900 the use of the racks became a nuisance, and that they were necessarily removed. A hitching rack is not per se a nuisance, and this court has so held in the case of Harrison County v. Wall, 11 Ky. Law Rep., 223. And also in the case between the same parties to this action (23 Ky. Law Rep., 1744.) In the last case referred to the court said: "While the hitching posts and chains were not a nuisance in themselves, they became a nuisance from the hitching of horses to them. They were placed there for horses to be hitched to them, and the removal of the posts and chains was the only way to abate the nuisance." * * * And again the court said: "The city was not estopped by the contract made in the year 1888. As population increases things become nuisances which occasioned little inconvenience when the population was not so dense or the traffic so great. The contract of 1888 did not contemplate the creation of a nuisance; the town trustees could not have legalized a nuisance if they had contemplated it."

At the time this contract was entered into in 1888, and appellant accepted the hitching posts as the consideration for the strips of land, it so accepted same with the knowledge that it might, on account of the growth of the city and the county, and the great and continued use of the same, become a nuisance, and, therefore, be compelled to surrender same for the public good and health. And it appears from the petition that this occurred in 1900. Appellant received a good and valuable consideration and had the benefit of it for seventeen years, but owned and used it all the time subject to the public welfare, and the appellee did not, by any act or omission, cause it to become a nuisance, but it was caused by the natural and to be expected growth of the city and the county, and the great use to which it was put by reason thereof. Ashbrook v. Commonwealth, 1 Bush, 148, these principles are enunciated: "The pursuit of a noxious trade is lawful so long as it does not interfere with the rights of the public, but when it does so interfere with these superior rights it becomes illegal, and no length of time can sanctify it as its exercise is a daily renewal of the offense. Whilst many private rights will be protected from public invasion, because not necessary to the public good, yet most of the individual rights are held subordinate to the public welfare."

The appellant entered into this contract with the knowledge that the ditching rack might become a nuisance; the contract was fairly made and appellant took upon itself the risk of its becoming and being declared a nuisance, and whatever may be the apparent hardship of losing the use and benefit of its consideration, it was brought about by its own voluntary undertaking, and it is, therefore, entitled to no relief. To this effect is Griswold v. Taylor's Adm'r, 1 Metcalf, 281.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SANDY RIVER CANNEL COAL CO. v. WHITE HOUSE CANNEL COAL CO.

(Filed February 18, 1908—Not to be reported.)

Action to quiet title—Reservation of mineral rights and passway in conveyances—Appellee instituted this action to quiet its title to a tract of land and minerals rights and a road to the river against appellant, who is claiming same. The lands and mineral rights in controversy are included in a patent granted to S. Appellee claims title to the land, mineral rights and road by conveyances from S., his grantees and children. It is admitted that the surface of land in which the appellee claims the mineral rights and road belongs to appellant. S. conveyed to B. a tract of land, expressly reserving the mineral rights and a roadway over the land to the river. B. accepted the deed from S., reserving to the grantor all mines and minerals on the land as well as a road to the river, with full knowledge on the part of B. of said reservation. But appellant claims title to the mines and minerals under a patent to B. B. testifies that he never got a patent to the land, and the record shows that he never claimed the property in controversy, besides, in his deposition he disclaims ownership thereof. B. will not be permitted to disavow his vendor's title, and appellant claiming under him, is in no better position to do so than he. The court properly quieted appellee's title and referred the case to the commissioner to take an account as to the value of coal taken by appellant from appellee.

W. S. Harkins and John P. Wells for appellant.

Hager & Stewart for appellee.

Appeal from Johnson Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Appellant and appellee own adjoining lands and valuable mineral rights in Johnson county, and both are engaged in the business of mining coal.

This action was instituted by appellee in the circuit court of Johnson county to quiet its title to certain mines, mineral rights and a roadway to Big Sandy river. The petition, and amendments thereto, charge in substance that appellee owns and is in actual possession of certain lands therein described, the mines and minerals under a certain other boundary, the surface of which is owned by appellant, and that it (appellee) also owns a roadway leading therefrom to the river. It is further averred by appellee that appellant is interfering with its possession of, and is claiming to own, its lands, minerals and roadway mentioned, giving it out in public speeches that this property is owned by it (appellant), and that appellee is unable to make a valid deed thereto. It is also averred that appellant is engaged in mining on its land, and removing coal therefrom, by means of an entry made upon appellant's own land, and is threatening to further mine and remove appellee's coal. An injunction was obtained by appellee to restrain appellant from further acts of trespass to its property.

The answer traverses the allegations of the petition as amended, and sets up a claim of title in appellant to the lands, mines, minerals and roadway in controversy. Upon the issues thus formed proof was taken on both sides, and the trial resulted in a judgment in favor of appellee, which was declared to be the owner of the land and road in controversy. Appellant was perpetually enjoined from the further mining of coal thereon, and the cause was referred to the master commissioner to take proof, and report the quantity and value of coal mined or removed from appellee's land by appellant. Appellant complains of that judgment, hence this appeal.

The land in dispute is situated in the valley of White House creek, and on the White House side of the dividing ridge that separates White House creek from Lick creek. These two creeks flow into the Levisa fork of the Big Sandy river, and on the east side thereof some eight or ten miles below the town of Paintsville. One John Stafford, who died in 1865, formerly owned a large boundary of land on each side of the river, including the land in controversy. Stafford had several children, one of whom, Calista, married first a man by the name of Wilson, who soon died, after which she married a man by the name of Ash. Stafford, by deed of March 16, 1861, conveyed to his daughter, Calista Wilson, or Ash, a large tract of land, nearly all of which was on the Lick creek side of the dividing ridge between Lick and White House creeks.

Appellee owns nearly all of the Calista Wilson land, but a part thereof belongs to appellant. The easterly line of the Calista Wilson tract is shown on the map in the record as the red line running from a point near the bottom of the map to a point marked "maple," on Big Sandy river, just below the mouth of Lick creek. The land included in the deed lies on the west side of this line. As the minerals in controversy lie upon the east side of this line its correct location is one of the points at issue in this case. If appellant's contention is sustained, the line would run from the point indicated near the bottom of the map to a point on the bank of Big Sandy river 34 poles below the mouth of Lick creek. We think, however, that this line was correctly fixed by the lower court, and as laid down on the map is, after allowing the proper variation, north  $6\frac{1}{2}$  east, running to a point just below the mouth of Lick creek as indicated on the map. The line in question passes through the mines as shown upon the map, and all the coal that was removed by appellant from the land on the right or east of this line as indicated was taken from the land adjudged to appellee by the lower court.

On March 25, 1865, Stafford, by deed, conveyed to Gabe Brown, his former slave, whom he had theretofore voluntarily emancipated, a tract of land, the boundary of which began at the mouth of White House creek; thence running up the river to the upper end of the cliff, from which it passes to the top of the dividing ridge between White House and Lick creeks, and following the top of the ridge around a certain hollow; thence down the point on the upper side of the hollow to White House creek, a short distance below Gibson branch shown upon the map; thence down White House creek to the beginning. But by the terms of the deed the grantor reserved to himself the mines, minerals and road to the river, in controversy in this case.

It appears that the description as given of the boundary of Gabe Brown's deed makes the line following the top of the ridge between the creeks lap in some places over upon the land previously conveyed by Stafford to his daughter, Callista Wilson, but Brown does not, by that means, become entitled to any part of her land that may fall within his line, as hers is the older deed and title. It is conceded by appellee that appellant is the owner of the surface of the lands in controversy. So the only question to be considered is as to the ownership of the mines and minerals contained therein.

Stafford seems to have secured many patents for lands, and the one for fifty acres, bearing date July 22, 1833, copied into the record covers all the mines and minerals in controversy herein. It is, we think, well established by the evidence that Stafford was at the time of the conveyance from him to Brown, in 1865, the owner in fee of the land on which the mines and minerals in controversy are situated, and there is no doubt whatever of his having reserved the mines, minerals and road in the deed executed to Brown.

We are of opinion, too, that the mines, minerals and roadway passed by the subsequent deeds of conveyance from Stafford, his vendees successively, and children to appellee, and, besides, the construction placed upon the deeds by the parties shows that such was the intention of all the grantors, beginning with Stafford himself. If it be true, as contended by appellant, that Stafford in the deed to King never parted with his title to the mines and minerals, appellee nevertheless derived title thereto from the heirs at law of Stafford, who conveyed to it their title, either directly or through intermediate parties. We are unable to see how Gabe Brown acquired by the patent from the Commonwealth covering the land he got of Stafford any better title than he had already received thereto by the deed from Stafford, and as the deed reserved to Stafford all mines and minerals on the land, as well as the road to the river, it was accepted by Brown with knowledge of that reservation. We are likewise unable to see how the patent procured by him can destroy, or otherwise remove, the reservation. Appellant claims title to the mines and minerals in controversy under the Gabe Brown patent, and yet Brown testifies in his deposition that he never got a patent to the land, but in this he is certainly mistaken, and he also says that he got the patent to annoy King, appellee's vendor, and the immediate vendee of Stafford.

It is not disclosed by the record that Brown ever claimed the property in controversy. In fact in his deposition he disclaims ownership thereof. Brown will not be permitted to disavow his vendor's title. Appellant claiming under Brown, is in no better position to do so than he. We are also of opinion that the several deeds under which appellee claims title to the mines, minerals and road in dispute contain a sufficient description of the interest and estate they purport to convey, and taken, altogether, they present a reasonably well-connected chain of title from Stafford to appellee.

Upon the facts presented by the record the chancellor was authorized to render the judgment appealed from, and the same is, therefore, affirmed.

E. H. TAYLOR, JR. & SONS v. LOUISVILLE PUBLIC WAREHOUSE CO.

(Filed February 17, 1903—Not to be reported.)

Contracts—Damages—Instructions—Appellant brought this action to recover of appellee $8,000 damages for a breach of contract. Appellant alleges in its petition that in the spring of 1895 it had in its warehouse 736 barrels of whisky which was worth 50 cents per gallon; that it made a contract, by its vice-president, that it would ship said whisky to Louisville and deposit it in appellee's warehouse on a storage charge of 5 cents per barrel per month, and that appellee agreed to loan appellant $10 on each barrel, and would renew, or cause to be renewed, the loan from time to time as long as the whisky remained in appellee's warehouse, appellant to pay the regular bank rates of interest and discounts and 5 cents per barrel per month storage to appellee; that under this contract appellant shipped said whisky to appellee's warehouse and obtained the loan of $10 per barrel, and appellee issued its warehouse receipts and attached said receipts as collateral to the notes and the notes were due and payable four months after date. Before the expiration of said four months part of the whisky was sold and the proceeds credited on the notes. There then remained 448 barrels unsold. The notes were renewed, and when the renewed loan matured appellee violated and broke its contract by refusing to renew and carry said loan. Appellant notified appellee of the sale, and demanded that it comply with its contract and renew said loan, and that appellant was unable to carry the same, and that at the sale 200 barrels of the whisky sold at 18 cents per gallon and 248 barrels sold at 19 cents per gallon, the whisky at the time being reasonably worth 50 cents per gallon, and that appellant thereby suffered a loss of $8,412. Appellee in its answer put in issue every allegation of the petition except those stating that appellant was unable to carry said loan, and that appellee knew of appellant's inability to do so, and that it did not contract to bind itself to loan said money, or cause it to be loaned, to appellant for a longer period of time than four months, as specified in said notes. The first trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellant for $3,100, and the court set this aside and granted a new trial, which resulted in a judgment for defendant. Appellant on this appeal asks that the last judgment be reversed, and that the lower court be directed to enter judgment on the first verdict. Held—That the lower court erred in telling the jury that the appellee had the right.

to terminate the contract after the expiration of a reasonable time, and that a reasonable time had elapsed in contemplation of law between the making of said contract and the forced sale of the whisky. This question should have been left to the jury. The instructions given on the first trial, except the first part of No. 3 as indicated in the opinion, were correct. This court will not disturb the action of the lower court in setting aside the first verdict. The lower court could better determine whether the parties had a fair and impartial trial, and as the defense is supported by strong evidence, this court will not direct that a judgment be entered on the first verdict.

Hargis & Duncan for appellants.

Helm, Bruce & Helm for appellee.

Appeal from Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas division.

Opinion of the court by Judge Nunn.

This was an action brought in the Jefferson Circuit Court by appellants against appellee for damages on an alleged breach of contract whereby they claim to have suffered to the extent of more than $8,000.

The appellant alleges in substance, in its petition, that in the spring of the year 1895 it had in its bonded warehouse in Woodford county, Kentucky, 736 barrels of whisky, containing fifty gallons to the barrel, of the "Old Taylor" brand, which was worth 50 cents per gallon; that on the 27th day of May, 1895, J. S. Taylor, vice-president of appellant, it being a corporation, made and entered into a contract with one Coldewey, who was then the president of appellee, a corporation, that appellant would ship to Louisville, Ky., and deposit in appellee's warehouse said 736 barrels of "Old Taylor" whisky on a storage charge of 5 cents per barrel per month, and that appellee, in consideration therefor, agreed with appellant to loan, or cause to be loaned, to it $10 per barrel on said whisky, and would renew, or cause to be renewed, the loan from time to time as long as the whisky remained in the appellee's warehouse, the appellant to pay the regular bank rates of interest and discounts, and 5 cents per barrel per month storage to appellee; that under this contract appellant shipped said whisky to appellee's warehouse in Louisville, Ky., and obtained the loan of $10 per barrel, and appellee issued its warehouse receipts for the whisky and attached said receipts as collateral to the notes given by appellant for said loan; that after getting possession of the whisky appellee claimed that, in order to keep its contract and renew and carry this loan, it was necessary for appellants to execute its note for $9 per barrel to the Citizens National Bank of Louisville and a note for $1 per barrel to appellee, these notes due in four months. Before these notes became due appellant sold a portion of said whisky, and the proceeds were credited on said notes. There was left of said whisky, at the expiration of said four months, 448 barrels on the same terms and conditions as the first loan.

That on the 30th day of January, 1896, when the renewed loans matured, the appellee violated and broke its contract by refusing to renew and carry said loan, notwithstanding it had contracted to carry the loan, and the fact that appellant was unable to carry the same, and that appellee knew that appellant was unable to carry and renew the loan, and that appellant notified appellee of the contemplated sale of the whisky by the Citizens National Bank, and requested appellee to protect appellant's whisky from sale and sacrifice by performing its contract to renew the loan, and that appellee failed to perform its contract and allowed the whisky to be sold at a sacrifice; that 200 barrels of the whisky sold at forced sale at the price of 18 cents per gallon and 248 barrels at the price of 19 cents per gallon, the whisky at the time being reasonably worth 50 cents per gallon, to the appellant's loss of $8,412.

The appellee's answer put in issue every allegation of the petition, except those stating that appellant was unable to carry said loan, and that appellee knew of appellant's inability to do so, and that it did not contract to bind itself to loan, or cause to be loaned, to appellant, nor contract that the loan would be renewed or continued for a longer period of time than that named in the notes, viz., four months; that its effort in securing and continuing the loan made by the Citizens National Bank were simply for the accommodation of its customers. And by counterclaim set up two notes which it held against appellant, amounting to the sum of $584, which counterclaim the appellant, by reply, admitted, but controverted the affirmative allegations of appellee's answer.

Upon these issues a trial was had which resulted in a verdict for appellant for the sum of $3,100. Upon motion of appellee, with reasons filed, the court set aside that verdict and judgment and granted appellee a new trial, and afterwards another trial was had which resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for the full amount of its counterclaim. Appellant filed grounds and asked that this verdict and judgment be set aside, which motion the court overruled. Appellant is here on appeal, asking that the last judgment be reversed, and that the lower court be ordered to enter judgment on the first verdict.

The instructions given by the court to the jury on the second trial were erroneous and prejudicial to the appellant. The court, under the facts and circumstances in issue in this case, should not have told the jury that the appellee had the right to terminate the contract after the expiration of a reasonable time, and that a reasonable time had elapsed in contemplation of law between the making of said contract, as alleged in the petition, and the forced sale of the whisky. Under the evidence in this case, as appears from the record, this question should have been left to the jury. Counsel for appellee on this point refer this court to the case of Blackwell, &c. v. Fosters, &c., 1 Metcalfe, 88, as sustaining said instruction of the court. We do not so understand the decision. In that case the appellant in October, 1851, sold to appellee 500 hogs, to be delivered between the 10th of October and 1st of November, 1852, more than a year after the making of said contract. And in the contract this language was used: "And the said parties bind themselves to give security for their respective performance of this contract, if at any time required." The parties lived about seven miles from each other. The testimony in the case showed, and it was admitted by the appellees, that before January 1, 1852, that the appellants had given notice that they required security for the performance of said contract. The appellees failed to give the security, and on the 6th day of March, 1852, the appellants gave to appellees written notice that their said contract was annulled in consequence of their failure to give the security as required, and this court said the facts being admitted that four months' time to comply with the stipulation of their written contract was, as a matter of law, reasonable time. And in the same case the court said: "It is a well-settled rule of law that wherever one party is required to do an act upon the demand of another, performance, or an offer to perform, must be within a reasonable time after demand, that is, so much time as is necessary to do conveniently what the contract requires to be done."

That case is unlike this case for the reason that, according to appellants' contention, it transferred this whisky, at considerable expense, from its warehouse in Woodford county, Kentucky, to appellee's public warehouse in the city of Louisville, and there deposited it, under a contract with appellee to hold it for the consideration of 5 cents per barrel per month, and to loan, or secure to be loaned, and renew the loans thereon at $10 per barrel, so long as the whisky remained in appellee's warehouse, appellee violating its said contract, and failing and refusing to renew the loan, thereby forcing the sale of the said whisky at a sacrifice, and knowing at the time appellant was unable to protect itself and save itself from loss. Under these alleged facts the question of reasonable time, under all the circumstances, should have been submitted to the jury.

There are other errors in the instructions given on the second trial, but we do not think it necessary to refer to them, as the instructions given on the first trial were correct, except instruction No. 8.

If the appellee had contracted to loan and renew the loan so long as the whisky remained in its warehouse, and knew that appellant was unable otherwise to obtain or renew the loan, we can not understand the application of the first part of instruction No. 8, "that if the appellee gave the appellant a reasonable notice that the loan would not be renewed or continued, then they should find only in such sum as they may believe from the evidence represents the amount the plaintiff would have been compelled to pay to carry the said loan without the defendant's assistance under the said contract."

We are not inclined to disturb the action of the court in the setting aside the verdict of the jury on the first trial. That court presided and witnessed the conduct of the trial from its inception to the end, and could better determine whether or not the parties had a fair and impartial trial. And while in some cases this court has directed the entry of the first judgment, when it was erroneously set aside, yet in a case where the defense is supported by strong evidence and, in the opinion of the trial judge, presents a good defense, we are not inclined to apply the rule contended for. And, besides, it was error for the court to permit the advertisement for the sale of appellant's whisky to be sent to the jury after the cause had been submitted to them, and the court may have observed other small errors in the progress of the trial which caused him to exercise his discretion in the setting aside the verdict.

For these reasons the case is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a new trial and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HALL, &amp;c. v. METCALFE.

(Filed February 17, 1903.)

Decedents' estates—Personal representatives—Unnecessary allowance of attorney's fees—H. died intestate, leaving a widow and son surviving him, owning no personal estate and only a small farm on which was a mortgage lien to appellee. P. was appointed as administrator. Appellee instituted this action to enforce his mortgage lien, making the administrator, the widow and son defendants. The petition alleges that appellee and S. were the only creditors of the estate, but failed to allege that the decedent left no personal estate, or not enough thereof to pay his debts, nor does it state the amount or nature of the claim held by S. against the estate. The prayer of the petition asks a sale of the mortgaged real estate to pay appellee's debt and a reference to the commissioner for a settlement of the estate, and that appellee be allowed his costs and attorney's fees. Prior to the trial the land was sold at private sale and the debts paid, but the case was prepared and the judgment entered, directing the sale and allowed appellee's attorney a fee of $40, and a fee of $15 to the attorney for the administrator. Held—That the judgment was altogether erroneous. There was no necessity for the appointment of an administrator, as there was no personal estate left to be administered. The action was not one to settle an estate. The original petition contained no statement of fact that would have authorized a reference of the case to the commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining the estate's indebtedness, or to make a settlement thereof. The manner in which this action has been instituted and conducted is well calculated to excite suspicion that the recovery of attorney's fees, and their payment out of the estate of the decedent, is the end mainly sought to be maintained. It is not the policy of the law nor the aim of this court to permit estates, small or great, to be consumed by unnecessary costs. No attorney's fees should have been allowed by the lower court, either to appellee's attorney or the attorney of the administrator. Appellee was only entitled to his costs from the institution of the suit until the payment of his debt, to include a taxed attorney's fee of $5. The appellants should be allowed their costs.

Walker C. Hall for appellants.

L. L. Manson and B. F. Graziani for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Judge Settle.

Charles L. Hall died in Kenton county, Kentucky, intestate. The appellant, Julia A. Hall, is his widow, and the appellant, Edward Hall, his son and only heir at law.

On November 21, 1900, one R. J. Perry was appointed and qualified as the administrator of his estate; on November 24, 1900, this action was instituted by appellee in the Kenton Circuit Court to enforce a mortgage lien that had been given him on a small tract of land by the decedent and his wife to secure a note of $500, in which action R. J. Perry, as administrator of the estate of the decedent, the latter's widow and son, and Samuel Stephens were made defendants. The petition alleges that appellee, T. T. Metcalfe, and Samuel Stephens were the only creditors of the estate, but failed to allege that the decedent left no personal estate, or not enough thereof to pay his debts, nor does it state the amount or nature of the claim held by Samuel Stephens against the estate. The prayer of the petition asks a sale of the mortgaged real estate to pay appellee's debt, and a reference of the cause to the master commissioner for settlement of the estate, and that appellee be allowed his costs, including attorney's fees.

The administrator filed answer, in which he states his appointment and qualification as administrator; that so far as he knows Metcalfe and Stephens were the only creditors of C. L. Hall's estate; and further, that the mortgage note of appellee contained usury, as it calls for 8 per cent. interest, when only entitled in law to bear 6, and asks that the note be purged of usury, which would leave $468.16 due appellee, instead of the larger sum claimed. The answer, like the petition, is silent as to the nature and amount of the Stephens debt, and it also fails to state what personal estate, if any, was left by the decedent, but concurs in the prayer of the petition for a reference and settlement, and asks an allowance to himself and attorney.

It appears from the record that the appellant, Julia A. Hall, had ascertained that her deceased husband owed about $250 in addition to appellee's debt, and a part of this sum she paid, but being desirous of paying all his debts, she effected a sale of the little farm covered by appellee's mortgage, which was all the estate left by her husband, at $850, which sum was sufficient to pay the debts in full and leave her and her son $50 or $75. The answer of appellants averred that all the debts of the decedent, including that of appellee, had been fully paid by them, and they exhibited with their answer a schedule containing the names of the creditors, and the sums paid them respectively, which showed the aggregate indebtedness to be $832.59 paid out of the proceeds realized from the sale of the farm, leaving to appellants $32.48.

Appellee filed reply, traversing the averments of appellants' answer, and appellants thereupon took the depositions of several witnesses, which were duly filed with the clerk of the Kenton Circuit Court before the submission of the case as appears from an order of court. It is contended by counsel for appellee that the depositions were taken without notice, or upon insufficient notice, and, therefore, they should not be considered by this court. If they were taken without notice, exceptions should have been filed to them in the lower court, and before the submission of the case, but as the record fails to show that they were excepted to in that court, it is too late to object to them now and in this court. The depositions furnish indisputable evidence to the effect that as far back as December 21, 1900, which was less than a month after the institution of appellee's action, one J. C. Cotton, who afterwards became the purchaser of the farm from appellants, learning of the mortgage debt of appellee, went to see him and advised him of his purpose to purchase the farm, and appellee told him that he did not wish to buy the farm, but would buy it for him (Cotton), and the latter then placed in his hands $600 as a guaranty that he would take the farm if appellee would buy it for him at commissioner's sale, and for the $600 then left with him appellee executed to Cotton his due bill.

It is further shown by the proof that Cotton then learned that appellants were endeavoring to sell the farm through Foster, a real estate agent, and he bargained for the place through Foster at the price of $850, and paid to appellant, Julia A. Hall, and certain of the creditors, all of the purchase price over and above the $600 in appellee's hands, and upon receiving of appellants a deed conveying him the farm Cotton again saw appellee, who settled with him by paying back to him $42 out of the $600, which had been left with him by Cotton, and after paying the $42 to Cotton, he claimed that the sum retained by him only equalled the principle and interest of his mortgage debt, and a medical bill of $15, which appellant, Julia A. Hall, owed him.

Thus we find that appellee not only received the amount of his mortgage debt, but in addition that he appropriated to the liquidation of a medical bill which he had against the widow the pittance going to her out of the money left in his hands after satisfying his mortgage debt. Notwithstanding the payment of his debt, appellee refused to release the mortgage lien which he held upon the farm purchased by Cotton of appellants. It appears that appellee's attorney, upon being informed of the sale of the land to Cotton, presented himself while the parties were making out a list of the debts to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, and demanded the payment of a fee of $75 for services rendered by him in this action in the lower court, a fee of $50 for the attorney of the administrator, and a bill of $19.35 costs, the payment of which fees and costs appellants refused.

Appellee was also present when these fees were demanded, and he then stated, in the presence of his attorney and without contradiction from him, that the latter had agreed with him on a fee of $20 for his services in the case. The administrator, upon being asked by the attorney of Cotton about the fee demanded by his attorney, denied that he had employed him, yet in an affidavit afterwards filed by him in the case he demanded the allowance of a fee to that attorney.

The lower court, in the judgment rendered upon the submission of the case, allowed appellee's attorney a fee of $40, a fee of $15 to the attorney for the administrator, and ordered a sale of the land described in the mortgage of appellee to pay the debt sued on, and the costs of the action. This court is now asked to reverse that judgment. We do not hesitate to say that the judgment in question is altogether erroneous. There was no necessity for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of the decedent, C. L. Hall, as there was no personal estate left by him. No proof of the appellee's debt was necessary other than the statutory affidavit thereto attached, which seems to have been properly made by the holder of the note, and no demand for its payment before suit would have been necessary had there been no administrator. The action to enforce the mortgage lien of appellee could have been maintained by simply making the widow and heir at law parties. Other creditors, if known, should also have been made parties.

A reference to the commissioner in such a case would have presented their claims fully to the court, and given such relief as they were entitled to. The manner in which this action has been instituted and conducted is well calculated to excite suspicion that the recovery of attorney's fees, and their payment out of the estate of the decedent, is the end mainly sought to be attained. It is not the policy of the law, nor the aim of this court, to permit estates, small or great, to be consumed by unnecessary costs. The action was not one to settle an estate. The original petition contained no statement of fact that would have authorized a reference of the case to a commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining the estate's indebtedness, or to make a settlement thereof. In fact the amended petition, which contained the only averment in the pleadings, to the effect that the decedent left no personal estate, was not filed until after appellee and all other creditors had been paid what was due them from the estate.

We are of opinion that no attorney fees should have been allowed by the lower court, either to appellee's attorney, or the attorney of the administrator. We are also of the opinion that the lower court erred in decreeing the enforcement of appellee's mortgage lien, and a sale of the land in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, for, according to the evidence, his debt was paid some months before the rendition of the judgment. But inasmuch as the debt was not paid until after suit was instituted, appellee is entitled to his costs incurred in the proceeding to enforce his lien down to the time of the payment of his debt, say February 1, 1901. The costs to which he will be entitled should include a taxed attorney's fee of $5 as is usual in actions in equity. In all other respects the appellants should be allowed their costs.

For the reasons indicated the judgment of the lower court is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion herein.

COMMONWEALTH v. BAVARIAN BREWING CO.

(Filed February 17, 1903.)

Appeals—Mandamus—Suspension of judgment by motion for new trial—Appellee and other brewing companies were indicted for a violation of section 8915, Kentucky Statutes, prohibiting combinations for the purpose of regulating, controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured article or property of any kind. On the trial had on the 8th day of October, 1902, a verdict was rendered for defendant under a peremptory instruction of the court. On the following day the Commonwealth's attorney filed grounds and entered a motion for a new trial. This motion was continued from time to time until December 26, 1902, when it was overruled, to which the Commonwealth's attorney excepted and asked the court to grant an appeal. The court did not dispose of the motion for an appeal until January 21, 1903. On the 28th day of January, 1903, the attorney general appeared in this court and filed a certified transcript of the orders of the court below, and moved the court to issue a mandamus against the circuit judge, requiring him to grant an appeal from the judgment overruling the motion. To which the judge filed a response that in his judgment the Commonwealth was not entitled to file a motion for a new trial in the case; and further, that the court had no power to grant an appeal as the motion for an appeal was not made until more than sixty days had expired after the rendition of the judgment. Held—That the Commonwealth had the right to make a motion for a new trial. The motion for a new trial had the effect to suspend the judgment until it was finally overruled, or, in other words, that the judgment only became final when the motion for a new trial was finally overruled, and that under section 348 of the Criminal Code it was the duty of the defendant to have granted the appeal prayed, and he is directed to conform his rulings to these requirements.

C. J. Pratt and D. A. Glenn for appellant.

George Washington and Joe L. Ellison for appellee.

Appeal from Kenton Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by Chief Justice Burnam.

The Bavarian and other brewing companies were indicted by the grand jury of Kenton county for a violation of section 3915 of the Kentucky Statutes, which is a section of the act of May 20, 1890, prohibiting combination by corporations, partnerships, individuals, or persons, or associations of persons, for the purpose of regulating, controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured article, or property of any kind. Section 8917 prescribed a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for the violation of the preceding section. A trial of the defendants under the indictment on the 8th of October, 1902, resulted in a verdict for the defendant which was rendered under a peremptory instruction from the court. On the following day the Commonwealth's attorney for that district filed grounds, and entered a motion for new trial. At the sitting of the court on October 20, 1902, the motion was continued by consent. On October 20, 1902, the motion was again continued for two weeks, but the record does not show at whose instance. On November 4 the motion was again continued for two weeks. On November 24, 1902, the motion for a new trial was set for oral argument on December 8, 1902. On December 8, 1902, the defendants moved the court to strike the motion and grounds for a new trial from the file, and the argument on the motion for a new trial was continued until December 15. On December 23 both motions were submitted, and on December 26 the trial court overruled the motion of the Commonwealth for a new trial, to which the plaintiff excepted, and asked the court to grant them an appeal to the Court of Appeals. Defendants objected to this time, and the court took time. On December 30 the Commonwealth's attorney moved the court to dispose of his motion for an appeal, which was first made on December 8, 1902, and this motion was finally submitted on January 12, 1903. At a sitting of the court on January 21, 1903, the motion of the Commonwealth for an appeal to the Court of Appeals was overruled, and the appeal refused, to which the Commonwealth excepted. On the 28th of January, 1903, the Commonwealth of Kentucky, by C. J. Pratt, attorney general, appeared in this court and filed a certified transcript of the orders of the court below, and asked that a writ of mandamus should issue against the Hon. James P. Tarvin, judge of the Kenton Circuit Court, requiring him to grant an appeal from the judgment of the Kenton Circuit Court, overruling the motion. To which the Hon. James P. Tarvin, as judge of the Kenton Circuit Court, filed a response, in which he says in substance that he had reached the conclusion that the Commonwealth was not entitled to file a motion for a new trial in the case; and that he, as judge of the Kenton Circuit Court, had no jurisdiction to pass on same; and that more than sixty days having elapsed since the rendition of the judgment on October 8, 1902, before the Commonwealth moved for an appeal, that its motion came too late, and was consequently overruled.

By section 347 of the Criminal Code the Court of Appeals is given appellate jurisdiction of penal actions and prosecutions for misdemeanors, if the judgment be for the defendant in cases in which a fine exceeding $50 might have been inflicted. Section 348 provides: "The appeal must be prayed during the term at which the judgment is rendered, and shall be granted upon the condition that the record be lodged in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals within sixty days after the judgment.

"Section 850. When the Commonwealth's attorney prays an appeal, the clerk shall forthwith make and certify a complete transcript of the record, and transmit the same to the attorney general, or deliver it to the Commonwealth's attorney for that purpose. And if the attorney general on inspecting the same believes it proper to take the appeal, he shall do so by filing the transcript in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals in sixty days after judgment."

There has been no change in these provisions of the Code since it took effect on the 1st of July, 1854. In the Commonwealth v. Adams, 55 Ky., 270, which was decided in 1855, this court construed these sections of the Code, and held, first, that appeals from judgment of circuit courts in misdemeanor cases must be taken at the term at which the judgment was rendered, and the record filed in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals within sixty days after judgment. In Commonwealth v. McCready, 59 Ky., 377, the ruling in the Adams case was adhered to. But it appears that in that case, after judgment was rendered and the motion for a new trial had been overruled, time was given by consent of parties until the first day of the next term to file a bill of exceptions. And it was held to be still incumbent upon the appellee to file the record within sixty days after the judgment.

In the case of the Louisville Chemical Works v. Commonwealth, 71 Ky. 179, it was held that a motion for a new trial suspended the judgment, and that no appeal could be prosecuted until after the motion for a new trial had been disposed of. The court, through Judge Pryor, said: "No appeal can be taken by either party, plaintiff or defendant, to this court from the judgment of an inferior court in a case like this without first making a motion for a new trial in the court where the error complained of occurred. Upon the hearing of the motion, if overruled, the party complaining files his bill of evidence, and is then in a condition to bring his case to this court, and not before. If either party should bring the case here upon the judgment alone, with the motion for a new trial pending in the lower court, or without having made such motion, the dismissal of the appeal would be the inevitable result. If appellants had appealed from the judgment in this case at the time it was entered, viz, at the November term, and filed their record in this court, with the motion for a new trial pending in the lower court, and continued over until December term, we are at a loss to perceive how this court could take jurisdiction and try the appeal.

"There is no judgment in fact upon the verdict of a jury until the motion for a new trial, if made in proper time, is disposed of. This motion suspends the judgment, and it has no more effect than the verdict of the jury until the application for a new trial is overruled. Any other construction of the law would deprive the parties of the right to an appeal in all cases where the court, for prudential reasons, or otherwise, saw proper to continue the motion from one term to another, a right that the court can exercise, and over which neither the counsel nor his client have any control."

It seems to follow from these provisions of the Code, and from the construction given them in the case quoted, that a motion for new trial was necessary to enable this court to correct errors growing out of the evidence or instructions given to the jury in the court below. This court has uniformly held that a motion for a new trial suspends the judgment in a civil case, and may be continued and passed on at a subsequent term. (Louisville Rock Lime Co. v. Curr, 78 Ky., 12; Harper v. Harper, 10 Bush, 447; Turner v. Johnson, 18 Ky. Law Rep., 203; Trip, & Co. v. Aldrich, 23 Ky. Law Rep., 2432.)
